> The Commission shall make a complete study and investigation of all matters relating to the policy, administration and effect of title III of the Immigration and Nationality Act, including but not limited to, the effect of Federal judicial decisions in recent years on any of the provisions of such title and an analysis and evaluation of the fairness of the laws and regulations, and their administration and effect, relating to nationality and naturalization.

Mr. President, this important segment of public policy has been ignored and overlooked by the Congress, since the codification and amendment of nationality and naturalization laws in 1952.

There is little doubt that many provisions in the basic statute are products of a harsher period in our Nation's history, and should have no place in the public policy of a free society.

But aside from this, court decisions in recent years have altered the statute considerably. The situation clearly demands a comprehensive review and evaluation of our nationality and naturalization policy. I strongly feel this will be more easily and fairly accomplished through the efforts of an independent select commission.

Mr. President, I am extremely hopeful that extensive hearings on the bill will be held early in the next session.

But I would be remiss in my comments if I did not urge that the appropriate committees also consider at least two other important items.

The first relates to the need for legislation and administrative rulings to regulate the flow of workers from Mexico.

The grinding poverty, high unemployment, and low wages in many of our communities along the Mexican border is well known and a national disgrace.

The readily available and low-paid work force from Mexico is an important factor contributing to this distressing situation. Some measure of relief is urgently needed.

The issue should be given high priority by the Judiciary Committees of both Houses.

The second item relates to the administration of the labor clearance procedures for employable visa applicants without a family preference.

I am sure this has been a matter of some concern to nearly every Member of the Senate.

There are many problems, and the clearance procedure requires a continuing review by the appropriate committees of Congress.

Mr. President, I have outlined what I feel are today's principal issues in the immigration field.

The bill we introduce suggests some remedies. In all candor, I must say that it is difficult at this time in our Nation's life—when we are faced with convulsive problems at home and abroad—to concentrate effort and concern in the currently less dramatic aspects of our country's progress and pursuit of justice.

But there is work to do in perfecting the policy which governs the oldest theme in our Nation's history.

And I strongly feel that unless informed citizens, the Congress, and the administration give immigration issues the attention they need and deserve, much chaos will result in a significant area of public policy—which will shorten the hopes of many, and needlessly injure our relations with countries throughout the world.

I urge Senators to join the movement for continuing reform.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill I introduce today, and a summary of its provisions, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection the bill and summary will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The bill (S. 3202) to revise the Immigration and Nationality Act, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3202

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1969."

SEC. 2. Section 101 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101) is amended as follows:

(1) Subsection (a)(15) is amended

(A) by adding at the end of subparagraph (H) the following new clause: "or (iv) who immediately preceding the time of his application for admission into the United States has been employed by an individual or by a corporation or other legal entity and who is coming temporarily to the United States in order to continue to render his services to the same employer at a branch office, affiliate, or subsidiary in a capacity that is executive or managerial or involves specialized knowledge;"; and

(B) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (J) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "or", and by adding after subparagraph (J) the following new paragraph:

"(K) an alien who is the fiance or fiancee of a citizen of the United States or of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence and who seeks to enter the United States solely to conclude a valid marriage within 90 days after entry into the United States.

(2) Subsection (a)(27) is amended—

(A) by striking out subparagraph (A) and redesignating subparagraphs (B), (C), (D), and (E) as subparagraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D), respectively; and

(B) by striking out "carrying on the vocation of minister of a religious denomination" in the subparagraph redesignated as subparagraph (C) and inserting in lieu thereof "performing duties which are related to the religious activities of a religious denomination."

SEC. 3. Section 104 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1104) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g)(1) There is hereby established within the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs a Board of Visa Appeals (hereafter referred to in this subsection as the 'Board'), to be independent of the Visa Office. The Board shall consist of five members to be appointed by the Secretary of State, who shall designate one member as Chairman. The practice and procedure before the Board shall be in accordance with this subsection and, subject to paragraph (4), such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe.

"(2) Upon petition—

"(A) by any citizen of the United States claiming that an alien outside the United States is entitled to (i) a preference status by reason of a relationship to the petitioner described in paragraph (1), (4), or (5) of section 203(a), or (ii) an immediate relative status under section 201(b), or

"(B) by any alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence claiming that an alien outside the United States is entitled to a preference status by reason of the relationship to the petitioner described in paragraph (2) of section 203(a), the Board shall have jurisdiction to review any determination of a United States consular officer refusing an immigration visa, or revoking an immigrant visa issued, to any such alien outside the United States who has applied for classification as a preference immigrant described in any such paragraph or as an immediate relative. Each alien shall be informed of the review procedure available under this subsection when a determination refusing or revoking an immigrant visa to him is made by a consular officer. No petition for review may be filed with the Board more than sixty days after the date of notification to an alien of the making of the determination with respect to which review is sought.

"(3) Any review by the Board under this subsection shall be conducted solely upon the basis of the visa application and any other supporting documents submitted in connection with such application by or on behalf of the alien concerned, and any other documents, materials, or information in the possession of and considered by the consular officer, together with any briefs, memoranda, or arguments submitted in writing by or on behalf of the alien. No alien, solely by virtue of a petition for review by the Board under this subsection, shall be entitled to entry or admission into the United States.

"(4) The decision of the Board in each case shall be in writing and shall be communicated to the petitioner and the alien concerned. Decisions of the Board under this subsection shall be final and conclusive on all questions of law and fact relating to the issuance or revocation of a visa and shall not be subject to review by any other official, department, agency, or establishment of the United States; but, nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit the application of section 221(d)."

SEC. 4. (a) Subsection (a) of Section 201 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1151) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Exclusive of special immigrants defined in section 101(a)(27), of alien refugees who may apply for adjustment of status to that of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence under the Act of November 2, 1966 (80 Stat. 1161); 8 U.S.C. 1255 note), and of the immediate relatives of United States citizens specified in subsection (b) of this section, the number of aliens who may be issued immigrant visas or who may otherwise acquire the status of an alien lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence, (i) shall not in any of the first three quarters of any fiscal year exceed a total of 80,000 and (ii) shall not in any fiscal year exceed a total of 300,000: Provided, That, during the period from the effective date of the Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1969 through June 30, 1973, the number of aliens specified in this subsection (a) shall not in any of the first three quarters of any fiscal year exceed a total of 45,000 and shall not in any fiscal year exceed a total of 170,000 for aliens ascribed to independent foreign countries of the Eastern Hemisphere, and (B) shall not in any of the first three quarters of any fiscal year exceed a total of 35,000 and shall not in any fiscal year exceed a total of 130,000 for aliens ascribed to independent foreign countries of the Western Hemisphere."

(b) Subsections (c), (d), and (e) of such section are repealed.

SEC. 5. (a) Subsection (a) of section 202 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1152) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and the number of conditional entries" in the first proviso—

(2) by amending the second proviso to read as follows: "Provided further, That, notwithstanding the preceding proviso, the total number of immigrant visas made available to natives of any country contiguous to the United States shall not exceed 35,000 in any fiscal year."; and

(b) Subsection (c) of such section is amended by striking out "shall not exceed 1 per centum" and insert in lieu thereof "shall not exceed 3 per centum".

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (a) of section 203 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1153) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or their conditional entry authorized, as the case may be," in the portion which precedes paragraph (1);

(2) in paragraph (1), by striking out "20" and insert in lieu thereof "10";

(3) in paragraph (2), by inserting a comma and "or parents" after "unmarried daughters" and insert after "permanent residence" the following: ": Provided, That in the case of parents, such alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence must be at least twenty-one years of age";

(4) in paragraph (3), by striking out "10" and insert in lieu thereof "15", and insert after "201(a)(ii)," the following "plus any visas not required for the classes specified in paragraphs (1) and (2),";

(5) in paragraph (5), by striking out "24" and insert in lieu thereof "20", and by striking out "brothers or sisters" in that paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "unmarried brothers or unmarried sisters";

(6) in paragraph (6), by striking out "10" and insert in lieu thereof "15", and insert after "201(a)(ii)," the following: "plus any visas not required for the classes specified in paragraphs (1) through (5),"; and

(7) by amending paragraph (7) to read as follows:

"(7) (A) Visas shall next be made available, pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe and in a number not to exceed 10 per centum of the number specified in section 201(a)(ii), to alien refugees described in subparagraph (B), who are not firmly resettled and apply for admission to the United States while in any non-communist or non-communist dominated country or area.

"(B) The term 'alien refugee' means (i) any alien (I) who has fled or shall flee from and is unwilling to return to any communist or communist-dominated country or area, owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion, or (II) who has fled or shall flee from and is unwilling to return to any country owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion, or (III) who has been uprooted by natural calamity or military operations and who is unable to return to his usual place of abode, and (ii) the spouse and children of any such alien, if accompanying or following to join him.".

(b) Subsections (g) and (h) of such section are repealed.

SEC. 7. (a) Paragraph (4) of subsection (a) of section 212 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)) is amended by striking "or a mental defect";

(b) Paragraph (14) of subsection (a) of such section is amended by striking out "to special immigrants defined in section 101(a)(27)(A) (other than the parents, spouses, or children of United States citizens or aliens lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence),";

(c) Paragraph (24) of subsection (a) of such section is amended by striking out "(A) and";

(d) Subsection (b) of such section is amended by striking out "paragraph (25) of subsection (a)" at the first place it appears, and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (1) or (25) of subsection (a)";

(e) Paragraph (5) of subsection (d) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(5) (A) The Attorney General may in his discretion parole into the United States temporarily under such conditions as he may prescribe for emergent reasons or for reasons deemed strictly in the public interest any alien applying for admission to the United States, but such parole of such alien shall not be regarded as an admission of the alien and when the purposes of such parole shall, in the opinion of the Attorney General, have been served the alien shall forthwith return or be returned to the custody from which he was paroled and thereafter his case shall continue to be dealt with in the same manner as that of any other applicant for admission to the United States.

"(B) Notwithstanding the numerical limitations specified in any other section of this Act, any alien who has been paroled into the United States as a refugee pursuant to subparagraph (A), whose parole has not theretofore been terminated by the Attorney General pursuant to such regulations as he may prescribe, who has been in the United States for at least two years and who has not acquired permanent residence, shall forthwith return or be returned to the custody of the Service and shall thereupon be inspected and examined for admission into the United States, and his case dealt with in accordance with the provisions of sections 235, 236, and 237.

"(C) Any alien who, pursuant to subparagraph (B), is found upon inspection by the immigration officer or after hearing before a special inquiry officer, to be admissible as an immigrant under this Act at the time of his inspection and examination, except for the fact that he was not and is not in possession of the documents required by section 212 (a) (20), shall be regarded as lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of his arrival."

(f) Subsection (e) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(e) No person admitted under section 101(a)(15)(J) or acquiring such status after admission (1) whose participation in the program for which he came to the United States was financed in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, by an agency of the Government of the United States or by the government of the country of his nationality or his last residence, or (2) who at the time of admission or acquisition of status under section 101(a)(15)(J) was a national or resident of a less developed country which the Secretary of State, pursuant to regulations prescribed by him, had designated as clearly requiring the services of persons engaged in the field of specialized knowledge or skill in which the alien was engaged, shall be eligible to apply for an immigrant visa, or for permanent residence, or for a nonimmigrant visa under section 101(a)(15)(H) until it is established that such person has resided and been physically present in the country of his nationality or his last residence for an aggregate of at least two years following departure from the United States, except that upon the favorable recommendation of the Secretary of State, pursuant to the request of an interested United States Government agency, or of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization after he has determined that departure from the United States would impose exceptional hardship upon the alien's spouse or child (if such spouse or child is a citizen of the United States or a lawfully resident alien) or that the alien cannot return to the country of his nationality or last residence because he would be subject to persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion, the Attorney General may waive the requirement of such two-year foreign reisdence abroad in the case of any alien whose admission to the United States is found by the Attorney General to be in the public interest. Provided: That the Attorney General may waive such two-year foreign residence requirement in any case in which the foreign country of the alien's nationality or last residence has furnished the Attorney General a statement in writing that it has no objection to such waiver in the case of such alien."

(g) Subsection (g) of such section is amended by striking out "who is excludable from the United States under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section, or any alien".

SEC. 8. Section 214 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1184) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) A visa shall not be issued under the provisions of section 101(a)(15)(k) until the consular officer has received a petition filed in the United States by the fiance or fiancee of the applying alien and approved by the Attorney General. The petition shall be in such form and contain such information as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe it shall be approved only after satisfactory evidence is submitted by the petitioner to establish that the parties have a bona fide intention to marry and are legally able and actually willing to conclude a valid marriage in the United States within a period of 90 days after the alien's arrival."

SEC. 9. (a) Section 224 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1204) is amended by inserting "alien refugee," immediately after "special immigrant" each place it appears.

SEC. 18. Section 323 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1434) is amended as follows:

(1) In subsection (a)—

(A) by inserting "and" at the end of clause (1);

(B) by striking out the semicolon and the word "and" at the end of clause (2) and insert in lieu thereof a period; and

(C) by striking out clause (3).

(2) In subsection (b), by striking out "only two years' residence and one year's physical presence in the United States during the two-year period immediately preceding the filing of the petition" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "physical presence in the United States at the time of naturalization."

(3) By striking out subsection (c).

SEC. 19. The third sentence of section 336 (c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1447(c)), relating to final hearings upon petitions for naturalization, is amended by striking out "sixty" and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty".

SEC. 20. Section 338 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1449) is amended by striking out "and personal description of the naturalized person, including age, sex, marital status, and country of former nationality" and inserting in lieu thereof "and personal description of the naturalized person, including age, sex, and marital status".

SEC. 21. (a) There is hereby established a Select Commission on Nationality and Naturalization (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of nine members as follows:

(1) three members appointed by the President, at least one of whom shall be from each of the major political parties;

(2) three members of the Senate appointed by the President of the Senate, with the consent of the majority and minority leaders, two of whom shall be from the majority party of the Senate; and

(3) three members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives with the consent of the majority and minority leaders, two of whom shall be from the majority party in the House of Representatives.

The President shall designate one of the persons appointed under clause (1) of this subsection as chairman.

(b) The Commission shall make a complete study and investigation of all matters relating to the policy, administration, and effect of Title III of the Immigration and Nationality Act, including but not limited to, the effect of Federal judicial decisions in recent years on any of the provisions of such title and an analysis and evaluation of the fairness of the laws and regulations, and their administration and effect, relating to nationality and naturalization.

(c)(1) The Commission shall make a preliminary report to the President and the Congress on or before the first day of the seventh month after the effective date of this Act. The Commission shall make a final report to the President and the Congress not later than six months after the submission of its preliminary report. Such reports shall include the results of its study and investigation, together with such legislative and administrative recommendations relating to Title III of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as the Commission considers appropriate.

(2) The Commission shall cease to exist sixty days after the submission of its final report.

(d) All Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities shall cooperate fully with the Commission to the end that it may effectively carry out its duties.

(e) (1) Each member of the Commission who is not otherwise employed in the service of the Government of the United States shall receive compensation at the rate of $100 for each day he is engaged in the performance of his duties as a member of the Commission and shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, while away from his home or regular place of business, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) Each member of the Commission who is otherwise employed in the service of the Government of the United States shall serve without compensation in addition to that received in his regular employment, but shall be allowed travel, transportation, and subsistence expenses while engaged in the performance of his duties as a member of the Commission, as authorized by subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) The Commission may appoint such personnel as it deems necessary in accordance with the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and shall fix the compensation of such personnel in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(g) The Commission is authorized to obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but at rates not to exceed $100 a day for individuals.

SEC. 22. (a) Any alien who is eligible for important status under section 203(a)(5) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, as it existed immediately prior to the effective date of this Act, on the basis of a petition filed with the Attorney General prior to January 1, 1969, and the spouse, and children of such alien, if accompanying or following to join him, shall be held to be special immigrants and if otherwise admissible under the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act, shall be issued special immigrant visas if, upon his application for an immigrant visa and at the time of his admission to the United States, such alien is found to have retained his relationship to the petitioner and status as established in the approved petition.

(b) The Secretary of State shall make reasonable estimates of the number of visas which shall be issued under subsection (a) and, based on such estimates not more than 35 per centum of such visas may be issued in each of the first two fiscal years beginning July 1, 1970. The visas authorized to be issued under this subsection shall be issued to eligible immigrants in the order in which petitions in their behalf were filed with the Attorney General under section 204 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

SEC. 23. Section 21 of the Act of October 3, 1965 (79 Stat. 916, 920), is hereby repealed.

SEC. 24. This Act shall become effective on the first day of the first month which begins at least 30 days after enactment.

The summary, presented by Mr. KENNEDY, is as follows:

SUMMARY OF IMMIGRATION BILL, INTRODUCED BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY, 91ST CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION

Section 1 designates the bill the Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1969.

Section 2 facilitates the temporary admission of aliens who are executives, managers of possess specialized knowledge, and are transferred by their employer to a branch office, affiliate or subsidiary in the United States; and facilitates the admission of aliens who are fiances or fiancees of United States citizens or permanent resident aliens; and provides special immigrant status to aliens "performing duties which are related to the religious activities of a religious denomination."

Section 3 establishes a Board of Visa Appeals as an independent office within the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs of the Department of State. The Board will consist of five members, including a chairman, to be appointed by the Secretary of State. The Board shall have jurisdiction to review the denial of an immigrant visa to a relative of a United States citizen or permanent resident alien, upon the petition of such citizen or alien.

Section 4 provides for establishing a worldwide ceiling of 300,000 immigrants annually, exclusive of special immigrants, to become operative on July 1, 1973. In the interim the current ceiling of 170,000 for the Eastern Hemisphere continues to operate, and the current ceiling of 120,000 for the Western Hemisphere is increased by 10,000. Cuban refugees who adjust their status to aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence are removed from ceiling considerations.

Section 5 extends to Western Hemisphere countries the 20,000 annual limitation on immigration from any one country which is currently applicable to countries in the Eastern Hemisphere, and raises the limitation on dependent areas from 200 to 600 annually.

Section 6 amends the preference system.

(a) The preference system, currently operative only in the Eastern Hemisphere, becomes operative on a worldwide basis simultaneously with the effective date of the world ceiling. In the interim the preference system operates separately in each hemisphere.

(b) The percentum of first preference (unmarried sons and daughters of U.S. citizens) is changed from 20 to 10.

(c) The second preference, currently the spouses and unmarried sons and daughters of aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence, is expanded to include parents of permanent resident aliens. The percentum of 20 remains.

(d) The percentum of third preference (members of professions or persons of exceptional ability in the sciences and arts) is changed from 10 to 15.

(e) The fourth preference (married sons or daughters of U.S. citizens) and its percentum of 10 remains unchanged.

(f) The fifth preference, currently the brothers and sisters of U.S. citizens, eliminates those who are married. The percentum is changed from 24 to 20.

(g) The percentum of sixth preference (skilled and unskilled workers in short supply) is changed from 10 to 15.

(h) The percentum of seventh preference (refugees) is changed from 6 to 10. Instead of being given "conditional entry" in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Attorney General, refugees are issued regular immigrant visas in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Department of State. The definition of a "refugee" is broadened to establish a worldwide asylum policy for the United States: "The term alien refugee means any alien who has fled or shall flee from and is unwilling to return to . . . any country owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion, or who has been uprooted by natural calamity or military operations. . . ."

(i) to permit maximum flexibility in the use of visas, available visas not required in any one preference are to be used in meeting excessive demands in succeeding preference categories.

Section 7 facilitates the granting of waivers to certain exchange visitors who wish to remain in the United Sates; provides a permanent authority to adjust the status of refugees paroled into the United States, for emergency reasons, by the Attorney General; and facilitates the admission of the mentally retarded.

Sections 8, 9, 10, and 11 contain technical amendments.

Section 12—except in the case of natives of Canada, Mexico and adjacent islands—provides for the adjustment of status of Western Hemisphere natives on the same basis as aliens from the Eastern Hemisphere.

Section 13 establishes a new Section 293, entitled, "Limitations on Deportations." The Statute of Limitations would prevent the deportation:

(1) of aliens lawfully admitted to the U.S. for permanent residence solely by reason of any conduct or conditions which occurred or existed ten years prior to the institution of deportation proceedings;

(2) of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence if such aliens entered the U.S. prior to age 14 and have resided in the U.S. for a period of ten years immediately preceding the institution of deportation proceedings;

(3) of aliens lawfully admitted to the U.S. for permanent residence if such aliens have resided continuously within the U.S. for a period of at least 20 years immediately preceding the institution of deportation proceedings against him.

The Statute of Limitations will not apply to aliens who received their residence status illegally.

Section 14 facilitates the naturalization of persons over 50 years who have been living in the United States for at least 20 years.

Sections 15 and 16 facilitate the naturalization of permanent resident aliens employed overseas by an accredited American philanthropic organization, or the alien spouse of a U.S. citizen employed by such organization.

Section 17 permits the derivative acquisition of citizenship by a minor child, through his parents' naturalization, through 18 years of age instead of 16 as currently provided.

Section 18 facilitates the naturalization of an alien child adopted by a U.S. citizen parent who is employed overseas by an accredited American philanthropic organization.

Section 19 provides that final hearings upon petitions for naturalization can be held as late as 30 days before a pending general election, rather than 60 days as currently provided.

Section 20 eliminates the question of "Country of former nationality" from the naturalization certificate.

Section 21 establishes a Select Commission on Nationality and Naturalization to "make a complete study and investigation of all matters relating to the policy, administration, and effect of title III of the Immigration and Nationality Act, including but not limited to, the effect of Federal judicial decision in recent years on any of the provisions of such title and an analysis and evaluation of the fairness of the laws and regulations, and their administration and effect, relating to nationality and naturalization." The Commission shall be composed of nine members—three from the Senate, three from the House, and three appointed by the President—and shall file its final report one year following enactment of this bill.

Section 22 cleans up backlog in fifth preference (brothers and sisters of U.S. citizens), by authorizing the issuance of special immigrant viasas to applicants whose petition for admission was filed prior to January 1, 1969.

Section 23 contains a technical amendment.

Section 24 contains enactment date.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, a few months ago, I noted with great pleasure and satisfaction that after 4 years of experience under the historic Immigration Reform Act of 1965, immigration to the United States from all over the world has become more evenly distributed.

This result unequivocally attests to the fact that we have achieved one of the principal avowed purposes of the new law; that is, to wipe out all traces of racial discrimination from our laws and policies.

However, as the distinguished and able senior Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) has so eloquently pointed out, a number of shortcomings still exist in our basic immigration law. Some of these shortcomings were noted during the consideration of the 1965 act, but those of us who strongly favored that law decided not to push them at that time, because we felt that the more basic reforms should come first.

Now that these basic changes have been accomplished, I believe that it is timely for the Congress to consider and promptly enact further corrective legislation, to plug most of the loopholes which still exist in our laws.

I am pleased, therefore, to join Senator KENNEDY and Senator HART in sponsoring an omnibus bill to achieve the following ends:

First. To reinforce and clarify the system of allocation of visas which we first enacted in 1965; to extend this system to applicants in countries of both the Western and Eastern Hemispheres, all on a first-come, first-served basis.

Second. To recognize the tremendous transnational growth of business, educational, artistic, and other organizations by facilitating entry on a temporary basis of nonimmigrant personnel who possess ability, skills, and ideas required in the Nation.

Third. To further the objective which was written into the 1965 law of reuniting families by facilitating the entry of fiances or fiancees of American citizens or permanent resident aliens, and accord second preference status to the parents of permanent resident aliens.

Fourth. To broaden the humanitarian policy of granting asylum to refugees from all areas of the world by allowing 10 percent of the total annual quota to enter as immigrants rather than as conditional entrants.

Fifth. To establish a world-wide ceiling of 300,000 immigrants annually, exclusive of immediate family members of U.S. citizens and other special immigrants; the ceiling would become effective July 1, 1973—and in the meantime the existing ceiling of 170,000 immigrants from the Eastern Hemisphere would continue and the ceiling of immigrants from the Western Hemisphere would be increased from 120,000 to 130,000; because of the exceptional status accorded the Cuban refugee program, such refugees who elected to adjust their status under the act of November 2, 1966, would not be counted against this Western Hemisphere ceiling; the present 20,000 annual limit on immigrants from any single country in the Eastern Hemisphere would be made applicable to countries of the Western Hemisphere, except that Canada and Mexico are given individual ceilings of 35,000 each.

Sixth. To establish an independent Board of Visa Appeals within the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs of the Department of State, which would have jurisdiction to review the denial of an immigrant visa to a relative of a U.S. citizen or permanent resident alien upon the petition of such citizen or resident alien.

Seventh. To establish a statute of limitations to prevent deportation of permanent resident aliens: First, for the sole reason of conduct which occurred or conditions which existed 10 years prior to the institution of deportation proceedings; or second, who entered the country prior to age 14 and have resided in the United States for 10 years immediately preceding the institution of deportation proceedings; or third, who have lived continuously in the United States for at least 20 years immediately preceding the institution of deportation proceedings.

Eighth. To waive the naturalization requirements of literacy in the English language for aliens who are 50 years of age and who have been living in the United States for at least 20 years.

Ninth. To establish a Select Commission on Nationality and Naturalization, to make a full and complete study and investigation of all aspects of the naturalization policies under the immigration laws.

Mr. President, during the first session of the 90th Congress, I introduced several pieces of legislation containing some of the provisions which I have outlined and I am happy that they are included in this omnibus bill.

As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and one who helped to draft the landmark Immigration Reform Act of 1965, it is my firm hope that both Houses of Congress will move promptly and expeditiously to enact this very meritorious omnibus bill.

By enacting these changes, we will be bringing the Immigration and Nationality Act into even closer harmony with the traditional American precepts of fairplay and equal justice for all under the law.

I shall urge the Committee on the Judiciary to schedule comprehensive and complete hearings on this measure early in the next session.

In 1965, 76 Senators joined to write reforms to our basic immigration laws which were the most far reaching in our history, but we have yet to give the last full measure of our devotion to the first principles of our Nation insofar as our immigration policies are concerned, and it is my hope that the Congress will wholeheartedly support this legislation and thereby further the ends of immigration reform.

S. 3203—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO ESTABLISH WITHIN THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR THE POSITION OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I introduce today a bill to establish within the Department of the Interior the position of Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs.

Since the establishment of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, this agency has been under the direction of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Public Land Management. The Assistant Secretary presently is responsible for the conservation, development, and management of over 400 million acres of the Nation's public lands—more land area than Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and New Jersey all put together—18 States. His duties also involve the administration of mining and mineral leasing on federally owned lands. He is also the focal point of Federal activities related to outdoor recreation. Another major responsibility involves the Office of Territories of the United States. On top of this monumental task, the Assistant Secretary has the responsiblity to oversee the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which deals with our Nation's 600,000 American Indian citizens.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs was established in the War Department of 1824 and was transferred to the Department of the Interior when it was established in 1849. Since 1849, 36 men have served this country as Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Since 1849, the policy of our country has varied greatly in regard to the administration of the affairs of our Indian citizens.

Mr. President, I feel that the time has come for this country to take a firm position on the future of these native Americans. I can think of no better way to accomplish this than to elevate the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and to give him both the responsibility and the authority to cope with the serious and complex problems faced by our Indian citizens. This move will help elevate the Bureau of Indian Affairs to its proper role and strengthen the agency in its operation.

The present arrangement is both unworkable and dehumanizing so far as Indian citizens are concerned. To place the welfare of 600,000 Americans under an agency called "the Bureau of Land Management" is to infer that Indians are not really people, but some lesser order of creatures that can be managed along with the wildlife that roams the public lands. This is an unintended, but gross insult that Indians should not be expected to bear.

In addition, Indian problems are people problems, best understood and solved by educators, sociologists, economists, and others trained and experienced in the humanities. Under the present arrangement, as recommendations regarding Indian needs and services move through the many echelons of decisionmaking in the Bureau of Land Management, they must be acted upon by officials whose expertise is far afield from the social sciences.

The sad lot of the American Indian is well known. The failure of our Government to assure him the opportunity and the means of gaining an equal share in American progress is one of the most shameful pages in our history.

The creation of the position of Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs and the restructuring of the Bureau of Indian Affairs along humanitarian lines will increase the opportunity for progress for American Indians.

As a former member of the Indian Education Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I am aware that the committee will shortly propose legislation to make many changes to accomplish some of the objectives I have in mind in introducing this measure; but the matter of reorganizing the Bureau of Indian Affairs and of giving additional authority and responsibility to the man who is presently Commissioner by elevating him to the position of Assistant Secretary is a matter of great immediacy. Therefore, today I introduce the bill and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3203) to establish within the Department of the Interior the position of Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs, introduced by Mr. BELLMON, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 3204—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO AMEND PUBLIC LAW 84-930

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, it is my privilege to introduce, at the request of the administration, a bill that will be of interest to all who are concerned with the continuing problem of child entrapment in certain home appliances. This bill will amend the act of August 2, 1956—Public Law 84-930—that requires household refrigerators shipped in interstate commerce to be equipped with doors that can be opened easily from the inside. While the original act has done much to decrease the number of tragic entrapments of children, it is now seen to have two major shortcomings which this amendment will rectify.

The 1956 statute was enacted in response to the growing danger to children from increasing numbers of abandoned and idle refrigerators. At that time the potential danger of entrapment and suffocation in household freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations was not fully recognized because sales of those appliances were not widespread. However, a recent survey conducted by the National Bureau of Standards in cooperation with the Refrigeration Service Engineers Society indicates that of 140 entrapment deaths occurring during the past 10 years, 30 involved freezers or refrigerator-freezer combinations. The remaining 110 involved refrigerators believed to have been manufactured prior to the introduction of safety devices required by Public Law 84-930. I fear that the number of entrapments in abandoned freezers may increase drastically in coming years because of the recent rapid increase in their popularity and resultant sales.

Fortunately, many producers of freezers and combination units have voluntarily incorporated the same safety features in their products that are required by law for refrigerators. Not all such units comply, however. The proposed amendments are intended to assure that all homefreezers are equipped with adequate safeguards against accidental entrapment. The National Commission on Product Safety, which also has been concerned with entrapment deaths among our children, has strongly recommended such extension of existing Federal law.

In addition to extending coverage to homefreezers, the proposed bill amends existing law to provide for standards covering additional or different forms of safeguards that may be conceived as new technology is developed. This amendment would permit increased flexibility in product safety design so that the children of our Nation may be protected by improved safety standards whenever they may prove to be practical and necessary.

I believe that this bill is necessary to carry out the job begun in 1956 and I hope that favorable action may be taken on it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and the explanatory statement submitted by the Department of Commerce be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3204) to amend the act entitled "An act to require certain safety devices on household refrigerators shipped in interstate commerce," approved August 2, 1956, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1 of the Act of August 2, 1956 (70 Stat. 953; 15 U.S.C. 1211) is amended to read as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to introduce or deliver for introduction into interstate commerce any household refrigerators, household freezers, or household refrigerator-freezer combination manufactured on or after the date this section takes effect unless such refrigerator, freezer or refrigerator-freezer combination is equipped with safety devices which conform with standards prescribed pursuant to section 3, which are in effect on the date of manufacture."

SEC. 2. Section 3 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe and publish in the Federal Register performance standards for devices which when used in or on household refrigerators, household freezers, or household refrigerator-freezer combinations will protect children against unreasonable risk of entrapment leading to death or personal injury. The provisions of sections 551 through 559 of title 5, United States Code, shall apply to the issuance of all standards or amendments thereto under this section."

SEC. 3. Section 5 of such Act is amended by deleting the word "commercial" in the phrase "Commercial standards" wherever it appears.

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding the provisions of this Act, the standards in effect under the provisions of the Act of August 2, 1956 (70 Stat. 953) on the day preceding the date of enactment of this Act, shall continue in effect for the household refrigerators to which they are applicable until superseded or modified by the Secretary of Commerce pursuant to the authority conferred by the amendments made by this Act.

The statement, presented by Mr. MAGNUSON, is as follows:

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE AND NEED

The Act, entitled "An Act to require certain safety devices on household refrigerators shipped in interstate commerce," was approved as Public Law 84–930 on August 2, 1956 (70 Stat. 953; 15 U.S.C. 1211). That statute prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce, after the effective date of safety standards which were published by the Secretary of Commerce, of any household refrigerator unless equipped with a device enabling the door thereof to be opened from the inside, which conformed to such standards. The law was designed to protect small children from accidental entrapment and suffocation in abandoned or idle household refrigerators by requiring that they be equipped with doors capable of being opened from the inside by a child.

Public Law 84–930 appears to have been very successful in accomplishing the purpose for which it was designed in that there have been no reports of deaths resulting from entrapment in refrigerators that meet the current standard. However, the law applied only to household refrigerators and not to home freezers or the freezer portions of household refrigerator-freezer combinations. Yet, a similar hazard of entrapment exists with respect to abandoned or idle freezers. It is the purpose of these amendments to extend the law's coverage to include home freezers and household refrigerator-freezer combinations in order to reduce further the type of hazard to small children that made Public Law 84–930 necessary.

Since the passage of the Act of August 2, 1956, there has been a rapid increase in the use of freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations in the home. Within the next several years, this Nation may be confronted with a situation similar to that which existed with the increased manufacture and use of refrigerators: an abundance of what appears to an adult as simply an abandoned freezer, but what a child views as an inviting hiding place. An additional complication exists with home freezers in that many are top-opening, rather than side-opening, appliances. This tends to increase the possibility of accidental entrapment.

It is to the credit of the home appliance industry that most freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations now on the market are equipped with doors that can be opened easily from the inside as required by the standard for refrigerators published by the Secretary of Commerce on August 1, 1957 (22 F.R. 6058; 15 C.F.R. 260) pursuant to Public Law 84–930. A recent survey conducted by the National Bureau of Standards concerning the forces required to open the doors of home freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations now being sold indicated widespread voluntary compliance with the existing standard. Of 187 refrigerator-freezer combinations tested, only 10 of the freezer compartment doors required opening forces greater than 15 pounds, which is the maximum permissible force established for refrigerator doors by the standard issued pursuant to Public Law 84–930. Among the 50 upright freezers tested, 8 required opening forces greater than 15 pounds. All of the chest type (horizontal) freezers were found to contain counter balancing mechanisms for the lids, but 3 of the 20 checked required forces in excess of 15 pounds to open.

As these figures indicate, the extent of voluntary compliance by makers of home freezers and combination units with the safety standard for refrigerators published under the present law has been remarkably good. However, not all units comply and there is no statutory requirement that they do so. The proposed amendment to Public Law 84–930 would give the Secretary of Commerce authority to require that all such freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations comply with the standard concerning the opening force on doors now voluntarily observed by the makers of most such units.

In addition, the proposed amendment would authorize the Secretary of Commerce to require additional and different forms of safeguards against entrapment in refrigerators, as well as freezers or combination units, should he determine that a need for such protection exists. As presently stated, the law provides only for devices to permit refrigerators to be opened easily from the inside. This, of course, assumes that the entrapped child will make a positive effort to free himself, which unfortunately may not always be the case. During tests conducted at the National Bureau of Standards in 1956, a small but significant number of the younger children studied made little or no effort to free themselves from a mock refrigerator enclosure. If they behaved similarly during a prolonged period in a real refrigerator or freezer (even one complying with current standards) they could suffocate.

It may be, therefore, that more effective protection against entrapment would be afforded through devices to prevent unintentional closure of a refrigerator or freezer compartment of a unit not in service, that is, not connected to an electrical power source. Such a safeguard might be particularly appropriate in the case of refrigerator-freezer combinations that utilize a drawer type freezing compartment. The technical difficulties of devising a drawer that can easily be opened from the inside may be far greater than devising means to prevent accidental closure of the drawer of a unit not in service.

Standards providing for this sort of solution to the entrapment problem are not authorized under the present Act. However, the proposed amendment would enable the Secretary to establish any reasonable and technologically practicable standard or amendment thereto needed to protect against unreasonable risk of entrapment. The proposed legislation also provides that the administrative procedural requirements set out in sections 551 through 559 of title 5, United States Code, would apply to the issuance of all standards or amendments issued by the Secretary under section 3 of the Act. This would provide adequate opportunity for all affected parties to express their views with respect to proposed standards or amendments issued by the Secretary under that section.

Unfortunately, data concerning the number and nature of child entrapments that have occurred in recent years are not adequate to permit a reliable assessment of the extent of the hazard that may remain. It is known that at least 31 children lost their lives in this manner during 1966, the last year for which records are available. Since there have been no reports of entrapments in refrigerators that comply with the present standard, it would appear that these recent accidents continue to occur primarily in refrigerators manufactured prior to 1958 when the standard took effect. In short, we are still suffering as a result of the massive supply of hazardous units produced before the problem was fully recognized in 1956.

Fortunately, due to the excellent voluntary action of the appliance industry, the number of possibly hazardous home freezers and refrigerator-freezer combinations that may exist today is believed to be relatively small. However, in view of the increasing use of these units and the improved technology now available to deal with the special problems posed by freezers, it is believed that the Secretary should be given the authority to require full compliance with the most effective and practical safety standards that can be devised to protect the children of the future.

S. 3205 and S. 3206—INTRODUCTION OF BILLS RELATING TO THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, at the request of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, I introduce today for myself, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT), two bills relating to the Smithsonian Institution. I ask that they be appropriately referred.

One bill is to authorize the construction of pavilions as additions to the National Museum of History and Technology for the Smithsonian Institution, including the preparation of plans and specifications and all other work incidental thereto.

The other bill is to appropriate a site for a museum of man for the Smithsonian Institution.

I ask unanimous consent that these bills be printed in the RECORD, together with statements of justification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and statements of justification will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3205) to authorize the construction of pavilions as additions to the National Museum of History and Technology for the Smithsonian Institution, including the preparation of plans and specifications and all other work incidental thereto, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, for himself and other Senators, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are hereby authorized and directed to have prepared drawings and specifications for and to construct suitable pavilions as additions to the National Museum of History and Technology Building at Fourteenth Street and Constitution Avenue Northwest, Washington, District of Columbia (with requisite equipment) for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, to be used for special exhibits in support of the Bicentennial of the American Revolution and thereafter for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, at a cost not to exceed $6,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the preparation of said drawings and specifications, the design and erection of the building, and all work incidental thereto may be placed under the supervision of the Administrator of the General Services Administration in the discretion of the Board of Regents.

SEC. 3. That there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution such sums, not to exceed $6,000,000 as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act: Provided, That appropriations for this purpose, except such part as may be necessary for the incidental expenses of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in connection with this project, may be transferred to the General Services Administration for the performance of the work: Provided further, That when so specified in the pertinent appropriation act, that amounts appropriate under this authorization are available without fiscal year limitation.

The material presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

JUSTIFICATION

The National Museum of History and Technology (NMHT) is the center of historic research and education at the Smithsonian. It is fitting, therefore, that the Institution's observance of the Nation's Bicentennial in 1976 should be focused principally upon this Museum.

Yet this Museum, which has far surpassed all expectations in its popularity and in demands upon its resources, is already inadequate to accommodate the increased numbers of visitors and to display to best advantage its historic resources. Unless action is taken immediately to fit the Museum for its role in the Bicentennial, the Museum may prove unable to make the contribution the occasion demands.

INCREASED VISITORS, LIMITED SPACE

The number of visitors to NMHT is increasing steadily, even without the Bicentennial. In 1967, for example, the number of visitors to NMHT was nearly six million. The year 1976 will bring much larger numbers to the Mall and to the Museum.

Exhibit space in NMHT is already scarce. The historic collections are growing and special acquisitions of historic artifacts will be a part of the Museum's Bicentennial preparations. If the Museum is to fulfill its educational role, to make a coherent and comprehensive statement about the growth of the United States, it must now construct appropriate exhibit space.

To accommodate new permanent exhibits and to handle an unprecedented influx of Bicentennial visitors, the Smithsonian Institution proposed that two Bicentennial pavilions be added to the Museum of History and Technology.

THE BICENTENNIAL PAVILIONS

The Bicentennial Pavilions will bcome the focus of a great effort of research to interpret the first 200 years of the United States. Long after 1976, they will be the scene of important educational presentations revealing the special international nature of America's history.

As proposed, the two Pavilions will, with the present museum, provide a three-part complex in the National Museum of History and Technology.

THE FIRST PAVILION

The first pavilion, "A Nation From the Nations," will present the people who have settled America: their contributions, their trials, and their character. The theme would be the distinctive immigrant experience of each period of American history and of each part of the country.

Topical exhibits would illuminate the rise of American civilization, emphasizing the contributions of all the different ethnic groups: political institutions and law influenced by other nations; technology, from English factory organizations to Dutch diamond cutting; the scientific, agricultural and mathematical contributions of the Germans, Danish, Swiss and Italians, and the many contributions of various peoples to American religion, art, architecture, education, science, sports and other fields.

THE SECOND PAVILION

The present Museum will continue to show the achievements of America: what the American people have accomplished together, from folk art to physics to human rights.

The second pavilion will provide the final phase of the Museum's Bicentennial presentation: "A Nation to the Nations." Its goal: to trace the influence of America on the world: the shaping power of our thought, industry and politics upon the world.

A final segment of this pavilion, entitled "Toward World Community," will show how Americans and their ideas of cooperation have helped shape and cement a world community.

A SCHOLARLY EFFORT

It should be noted that the Bicentennial Pavilions promise not only an effort in bricks and mortar, but a focal point for new and important scholarly activity.

As Secretary Ripley has said:

"We have failed to give the true historical picture, to describe the whole panorama of our cultures. Young people representing Negroes, Indians, Spanish, Chinese, Japanese and other subcultures are nct given the evidence that they are part of the stream of history of the United States with a noble past, a vital present, and an unlimited future. If our Institution is to play a valid role in the Bicentennial of the American Revolution in 1976, we should be prepared to correct what is in effect a series of oversights in history, the history of our country and of the multiplicity of our people."

To this end, the Pavilion project will call upon many of the nation's greatest scholars as consultants. The Smithsonian hopes that such eminent social historians as Oscar Handlin, Samuel Eliot Morison, John Hope Franklin, Oscar Lewis, Richard Hofstadter, and others, will contribute to the Bicentennial Pavilion effort.

The paucity of scholarship both in immigration-history and in the history of American influence abroad gives us the opportunity to promote a deeper and wider discovery and understanding of our role in the world.

At a time when our nation is preoccupied with its internal divisions, when we are tempted to identify "minority" status with poverty and inequality, the Pavilions will channel our concern into a broad humanistic pride. They will remind all Americans that our "minorities" are the symbol of our peculiar strength and of our ties to all mankind.

COST

Each pavilion will provide approximately 25,000 square feet of additional floor space. Design, construction, site improvements and completion of interior furnishings are estimated to cost $6,000,000.

The bill (S. 3206) to appropriate a site for a museum of man for the Smithsonian Institution, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, for himself and other Senators, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the portion of the Mall bounded by Third Street, Maryland Avenue, Fourth Street and Jefferson Drive, in the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution as the permanent site for a museum building. Subject to further authorization for design and construction, the museum shall be known as the National Museum of Man, and shall be under the administration of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The material presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT, is as follows:

JUSTIFICATION

Long standing policies guiding the development of the Mall have restricted land use to museums, galleries and other similar uses. With construction of an addition to the National Gallery of Art on the square bounded by 3rd Street, Madison Drive, 4th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, the north side of the Mall becomes fully committed to use. Attention is now directed to the south side and the panel bounded by 3rd Street, Maryland Avenue, 4th Street and Jefferson Drive. To insure that this last square is used for public purposes, legislation is proposed to have it appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution for museum purposes, without cost to the Institution.

An exchange of correspondence in February 1969 with the Chairman of the National Capital Planning Commission confirmed their view that the site should be used for museum purposes.

A new building will be constructed on the site to house the National Museum of Man. The availability of an appropriate and properly designed building will permit removal of the sciences of man from the Museum of Natural History and for the first time put in a single worldwide context all studies and exhibits of cultures and peoples from the earliest time to the present. The Museum of Man will coordinate and carry out programs involving research, education and service in facilitating the study of man in a comprehensive and scholarly manner.

Since 1879 the Smithsonian's Bureau of American Ethnology has been gathering, recording and publishing information on the American Indians and natives of lands under the jurisdiction of the United States—their languages, material culture, history, social and religious organization and mythology. The initial researches of the Bureau were studies of the language and culture of the existing Indian tribes; but within a few years, the study of prehistoric Indian remains also was undertaken with Congressional approval. Nearly 300 publications devoted to American Indian linguistics, ethnology, and archaeology constitute the Bureau's tangible record of the achievement in the study of the original inhabitants of America.

The Bureau of American Ethnology was later expanded to the Office of Anthropology encompassing more comprehensive studies in the science of man. In 1968 the Center for the Study of Man was established to assure responsibility for the operation and development of the research components of the Office of Anthropology and to concentrate on areas of urgent anthropology because of many of the unique characteristics that distinguish various cultures and subcultures are being destroyed by the spread of mass media, rapid transportation, greater literacy, and the general mobility of groups in our civilization.

With the restructuring and redefining of anthropological programs, to meet the urgent demand for knowledge concerning man's intersocietal relationships, the Smithsonian has established the National Museum of Man by the consolidation of the Office of Anthropology of the National Museum of Natural History and the Center for the Study of Man. Thus the foundation is laid for a major new museum to carry on work started in 1879 and to provide a base for study and education for the future.

The proposed site will, within zoning requirements and good planning standards, permit construction of a building containing approximately 350,000 square feet of floor space.

The proposed legislation reserves the site for museum purposes. Since the land is now in Federal ownership, there will be no cost to the Smithsonian. Future legislation will be proposed, at some appropriate time, to authorize design and construction as national policies may permit.

S. 3207—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL RELATING TO THE LIABILITIES OF THE FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill for myself and Mr. BENNETT, relating to the liabilities of the Federal National Mortgage Association to the United States. The preferred stock of Federal National Mortgage Association, all of which was held by the Secretary of the Treasury, was retired on September 30, 1968. At that time FNMA was required by section 303(a) to "pay to the Secretary of the Treasury for covering into miscellaneous receipts an amount equal to that part of the general surplus and reserves of the corporation—other than reserves established to provide for any depreciation in value of its assets, including mortgages—which shall be deemed to have been earned through the use of the capital represented by the shares held by him from time to time." That part of the general surplus and reserves of the corporation deemed to have been earned through the use of preferred stock and carried on the books of the corporation as representing the earnings attributable to the portion of the capital supplied by the United States, approximated $52 million. At the time payment of this amount was due to be paid to the United States, FNMA asserted a claim against it based upon a contention by its counsel that it should establish a reserve for depreciation in the value of its mortgages which would wipe out its entire surplus and leave nothing to be paid to the United States. Pending resolution of the issue the $52 million was placed in a special status account in the Treasury, subject to withdrawal upon the joint order of the Secretary of the Treasury and the corporation.

Subsequently, on December 12, 1968, after the preferred stock had been retired and after FNMA ceased to be a Government corporation, its board of directors attempted retroactively to transfer all its surplus to an account called "surplus reserves." The resolution stated that instead of the board endeavoring to resolve legal questions or ambiguities, it would be more appropriate that such legal questions or ambiguities be resolved either by clarification from the Congress or by authoritative interpretation from the courts.

Shortly before its becoming a private corporation, FNMA had changed its accounting procedures in such a way as to reduce its surplus and the tax equivalent payments made to the Treasury by approximately $16 million. This change in accounting procedures was disallowed by the Treasury Department so that the total indebtedness of FNMA to the Treasury now exceeds $68 million.

After several consultations between counsel for the Treasury and counsel for the corporation, it was concluded by the Treasury that there is no alternative but to bring suit against the corporation to recover the amounts due. Before suit could be brought, however, the president of the corporation indicated a willingness on the part of the corporation to pay the full amount due but, because of an alleged concern over possible potential liabilities of officers and directors of the corporation, he requested that Treasury Department sponsor legislation. The Treasury Department agreed to this approach but made clear that if legislation is not enacted it sees no alternative but to pursue the matter in the courts.

I ask unanimous consent that two letters relating to the bill I am introducing be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3207) relating to the liabilities of the Federal National Mortgage Association to the United States, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. BENNETT), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The letters, presented by Mr. SPARKMAN, are as follows:

THE GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C.

HON. JOHN SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: Pursuant to the discussion which Jim Smith and I had with you a few days ago, I am enclosing copies of legislation which we propose be enacted in order to finally settle the dispute between the Federal National Mortgage Association and the United States Treasury.

Agreement has been reached between Counsel for the Treasury and FNMA concerning the settlement of this dispute and the proposed legislation would accomplish its final resolution.

I am also enclosing a brief memorandum giving the factual background, and copies of correspondence which I have had with the President of FNMA.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL W. EGGERS.

THE GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C.

MR. RAYMOND H. LAPIN,
President, Federal National Mortgage Association,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LAPIN: This is to confirm our understanding concerning the submission of legislation pertaining to the liabilities of Federal National Mortgage Associaton to the United States.

As you know, the Corporation became liable to the United States on September 30, 1968, in an amount in excess of $52 million representing earnings attributable to capital provided by the United States. Tax equivalent payments in excess of $16 million are also due to the United States. $52,190,693 was paid to the Treasury on September 30, 1968, but at your request it was placed in a special status subject to withdrawal on the joint order of the Treasury Department and the Corporation. You have specifically declined to agree to the withdrawal of this sum from the special status account for payment into miscellaneous receipts of the United States.

At the meeting in my office on May 13, 1969, you indicated a willingness on the part of the Corporation to pay these sums to the United States, but expressed concern over possible potential liability of officers and directors of the Corporation to its shareholders for doing so. Because of this concern, you requested that the Treasury Department sponsor legislation to specify the amounts due the United States and to protect the officers and directors of the Corporation against liability.

While we are satisfied that there is no necessity for such legislation, and while we are certain that the officers and directors of the Corporation would incur no liability because of paying its just obligations, as an accommodation to you and in order to avoid the necessity for litigation I advised you on May 14, 1969, that the Treasury Department would be amenable to legislation as suggested by you. This was done with the understanding that should legislation be enacted the Corporation will promptly pay the sums due the United States. In no way, however, should our acquiescence in your request be regarded as indicating any uncertainty as to the legal liability of the Corporation to the United States, nor as derogating from our legal position should litigation become necessary.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL W. EGGERS.

FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., June 11, 1969.

PAUL W. EGGERS, ESQ.,
General Counsel, Department of the Treasury, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EGGERS: This letter relates to your letter to me dated May 29, 1969, concerning our mutual interest in the authoritative and final disposition of various issues referred to in your letter.

It is our mutual desire that all legal, tax, tax equivalent, accounting, and other uncertainties preceding or arising from the transition of FNMA effected on September 1, 1968, pursuant to Public Law 90–448, and expressly including such problems as are incidental or related in time to the final retirement of all outstanding FNMA preferred stock on September 30, 1968, be resolved by clarifying legislation. For your convenient reference, a copy of the draft legislative provisions that were recently discussed between Mr. Englert and our representatives is attached.

We acknowledge that your participation in this matter does not indicate any uncertainty on your part as to the fact and extent of the liability of the corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury, nor does it derogate from your legal position should litigation become necessary.

I am sure that you likewise understand that our participation in this matter is not to be construed as an admission, nor should it be considered as derogating from the positions of the corporation, as determined by our Board of Directors, with respect to the matters in issue between the Treasury and the corporation.

All of us will, of course, cooperate in every possible respect with you and other Treasury representatives to seek prompt passage of legislation required to resolve these issues.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND H. LAPIN,
President.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS

S. 2312

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) be added as a cosponsor to S. 2312, to establish a Department of Conservation and the Environment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3163

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) I ask unanimous consent that at its next printing the names of the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Florida (Mr. HOLLAND), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) be added as cosponsors to S. 3163, to provide for a White House Conference on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF A RESOLUTION

S. RES. 292

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, my name be added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 292, to express the sense of the Senate with respect to troop deployment in Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, December 4, 1969, he presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 564. An act for the relief of Mrs. Irene O. Queja;

S. 2019. An act for the relief of Dug Foo Wong;

S. 2185. An act to authorize a Federal contribution for the effectuation of a transit development program for the National Capital region, and to further the objectives of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 (79 Stat. 663) and Public Law 89-774 (80 Stat. 1324); and

S.J. Res. 143. Joint resolution extending the duration of copyright protection in certain cases.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969—AMENDMENTS

AMENDMENT NO. 351

Mr. YARBOROUGH submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 13270) to reform the income tax laws, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 352

Mr. BELLMON submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 353

Mr. MCCARTHY (for himself and Mr. RIBICOFF) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 354

Mr. RIBICOFF (for himself and Mr. CURTIS) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 355

Mr. JAVITS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 356

Mr. GORE (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MONDALE, Mr. MONTOYA, and Mr. YARBOROUGH) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 357

Mr. HOLLINGS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 358

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the amendment I am submitting for myself, Senator BAKER and Senator ALLEN is consistent with the action taken by Congress last year in assuring tax exempt status for municipal industrial revenue bonds. Unfortunately, the effect of the congressional action last year has been impaired because of an administrative ruling of the Securities and Exchange Commission that the interests upon which these bonds are issued be registered in accordance with SEC regulations. This registration is time consuming and prohibitively expensive. It is estimated that the expense would amount for a typical small issue to a range of $50,000 to $75,000 in legal, auditing, and printing costs along with a deadly delay of 4 to 6 months.

In 1968 the Senate curtailed large issues and firmly fixed a ceiling of $1 million or, under special circumstances, $5 million for any one company in any county. This was designed to stop large corporate issues from escaping tax payment.

It was designed, however, to permit the smaller issues to continue and to be considered on the same basis as regular municipal general obligation bonds. The Congress recognized the public interest which these smaller issues serve. My amendment makes meaningful this congressional intent.

Alabama has had its law permitting industrial revenue bonds since 1949. Millions of dollars of the bonds have been sold during this period. I am informed that there is no record available of anyone who has lost any money or suffered economic injury during this 20-year period. At the same time, many lives have been bettered, jobs have been created, and the general economic status of the community has been enhanced. I am confident that a similar statement could be made of other States throughout the Nation. I urge the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. MILLER (for himself and Mr. METCALF) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 360

Mr. ERVIN submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 361

Mr. SCOTT submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 362 AND 363

Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. MCCARTHY) submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 364

Mr. MCCARTHY (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 365 AND 366

Mr. SPARKMAN submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 367

Mr. LONG (for himself, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. GORE, Mr. MONTOYA, Mr. CANNON, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. YOUNG of Ohio, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, and Mr. MCINTYRE) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 368

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. CANNON, Mr. HART, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. METCALF, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 369

Mr. HARTKE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to H.R. 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 370

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by us, jointly, to House bill 13270. All of the issued and outstanding common stock—1,085 shares—of American Cast Iron Pipe Co.—"Acipco"—is owned by the trustees of the trust created by the codicil to the will of John J. Eagan, who died on March 30, 1924. The trustees, as provided in the codicil to the will, are the members of Acipco's board of management and board of operatives, all of whom are officers or employees of Acipco and none of whom are members of the Eagan family. The trust, which is commonly referred to as the Eagan Trust, is for the benefit of employees of Acipco and their families. The will provides, in essence, that income from the trust shall be used by the trustees to insure to the employees an income equivalent to a "living wage," to pay an income to any employee, or to the wife and minor children of any employee, at such times as the plant of Acipco may be shut down, or at such times as an employee through accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause shall be unable to work, and to provide other benefits for employees and their families. The Eagan Trust has been held to be a charitable trust by both Federal and State courts in the cases of Eagan v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue (5th Cir., 1930), 43 F. 2d 881, and Mrs. Susan Young Eagan and Marion M. Jackson, as Executors of the Last Will and Testament of John J. Eagan, Deceased, v. W. D. Moore, et al. (No. 61106, Superior Ct. of Fulton County, Georgia, 1924). The trust is presently exempt from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(3), having received a ruling from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by letter dated February 15, 1946, that it was exempt from Federal income tax under the provisions of section 101(6) of the Internal Revenue Code, the predecessor section of 501(c)(3).

The trust also bought from Acipco at par, and now holds $1,400,000 par value of 5 percent noncumulative preferred stock of Acipco. The common stock has a book value of approximately $40,000,000. The Eagan Trust has no assets other than the Acipco common and preferred stock and there have been no donations to the trust by anyone since Mr. Eagan died.

Acipco employs approximately 3,000 people directly at its plant and offices in Birmingham, Ala. Acipco's payroll in Birmingham will amount to over $25,000,000 this year. The company spends approximately $30,000,000 annually in the Birmingham area for raw materials, goods and services. In addition to wages and salaries Acipco provides very substantial fringe benefits for its employees and members of their families in the form of bonuses based on profits, medical services, pensions, and retirement benefits and group insurance. The effect of providing such benefits is to further the purposes of the trust. Each year Acipco retains a portion of its earnings—in 1968, $2,754,398—for general corporate purposes, principally to protect, preserve and maintain its facilities. Of course, Acipco pays income taxes on its net earnings on exactly the same basis as any other business corporation—in 1968, approximately $2,883,000 to the Federal and State governments—and all amounts paid by Acipco to its employees as wages or other compensation are fully taxable to the employees.

The definition of a "private foundation" contained in H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, could be held to include the Eagan Trust. Other provisions of the act would, in effect, require "private foundations" to divest themselves of stock constituting in excess of 50 percent—20 percent in the House bill—of the stock of any corporation. In addition, under the act "private foundations" would be required to distribute all of their income currently and, in determining income, the act would impute income to the foundation of 5 percent of the fair market value of its assets.

As indicated above, the Eagan Trust owns all of the outstanding common stock of Acipco and $1,400,000 of preferred stock. Furthermore, the income of the Eagan Trust does not even approach 5 percent of the value of its assets, that is the value of the Acipco common and preferred stock or approximately $41,400,000. In view of the substantial fringe benefits provided by Acipco to its employees and their families as indicated above, the trustees, as owners of the Acipco stock, have requested the company from time to time to distribute to the trust as dividends only such amounts as have been reasonably required to carry out fully the purposes of the trust. In 1968 the trust received $42,000 in dividends which it used exclusively for purposes of the trust. The requirement for distribution of income not less than 5 percent of the value of assets of the trust would substantially eliminate the benefits that Acipco furnishes and seeks to furnish to its employees. If 5 percent of $41,400,000, which is $2,070,000, has to be distributed each year there would be no way to furnish substantial fringe benefits and to maintain the plant and operate the company. Any sales of stock to create funds for distribution would be impossible because of the provisions and purposes of the trust.

The effect of the provisions of the proposed act referred to above, if applied to the Eagan Trust, would be to require the trustees, in some fashion and probably only after litigation, to divest themselves of 50 percent—80 percent under the House bill—of the stock of Acipco, contrary to the terms of the will and probably ultimately to destroy the trust estate entirely by forcing the trust to distribute principal as imputed income. As to any amounts required to be so distributed beyond what is required for the charitable purposes of the trust, it is, of course, impossible to say to whom, for what purposes and with what effect amounts in excess of those required for the purposes of the trust would be distributed. There is certainly no reason to limit to 40 years the tax-free status of such a trust.

Application of the provisions of the proposed act to the Eagan Trust would not only result in little or no additional revenue to the Government, but would completely defeat the testator's benevolent, praiseworthy, and legitimate intent. It could well be disastrous to Acipco by forcing it to pay out as income greater amounts than would be prudent. It would without question materially adversely affect the employees of Acipco and members of their families by depriving them of the benefits of the trust.

Since tax avoidance is not in any manner involved in this trust, the bill should be amended to remove it from the definition of private foundations subject to new rules and taxes aimed at preventing abuses. Indeed, the Eagan Trust is probably unique in this country and is entitled on its merits to continue because of the social and charitable advantages that it affords to its beneficiaries and to the public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

AMENDMENT NO. 371

Mr. JAVITS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF AN AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT NO. 332

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) be added as a cosponsor to Amendment No. 332 of H.R. 13270, to authorize the use of tax exempt foundation funds for voter registration and voter education programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 11:30 a.m. having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the further transaction of routine morning business at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the time for the transaction of routine morning business?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Not to extend beyond 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON FOOD, NUTRITION, AND HEALTH—REMARKS OF SENATOR MONDALE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on this, the fourth day of December, we see the conclusion of the 3-day White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health. Three thousand participants from all over the Nation were invited to take part in panel discussions and consultations about hunger, malnutrition, and the needs of the poor.

Experts familiar with every phase of nutritional needs and nutritional problems contributed to these sessions. Conference panels covered the most minute aspects of everything from evaluation of nutritional needs to food-delivery systems and nutrition education.

But there is no doubt that the most fundamental cry at that conference was made by the poor—those who are forced to go through life suffering food deprivation because they have no money to buy a full meal. They expressed, with full emotion, what it means to go day after day with that dull, gnawing pain that signals an empty stomach. They came here to Washington, along with all the others, to let us know that whatever is said about proteins, vitamins, hemoglobin, and iron levels and all the other jargon professionals use when they discuss nutrition—whatever may be said about all those things, there were people at that conference who know what must be done. They came here to make one and only one recommendation—feed the hungry now.

When Robert Kennedy returned from the Mississippi Delta in 1967 he said: "Just get some food down there."

That is what we need. Let us feed hungry Americans and let us feed them right away.

The Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) spoke at that White House conference this afternoon, and he eloquently reviewed our Nation's sorrowful response to the needs of hungry people. He eloquently chronicled the way we have promised and flattered hungry Americans. But, we have continually failed to feed them.

Senator MONDALE properly cites the powerlessness of the poor as the real cause of hunger and deprivation. He clearly sees that because the poor have not been able to bring to bear the pressures and influences of their demands they have been doomed to continue to suffer.

I join with the Senator from Minnesota in his call for a declaration of a national emergency to set the needs of hungry Americans on top of all other national priorities.

Therefore, I am pleased to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD Senator MONDALE'S remarks before the conference this afternoon, in which he called for immediate action to eliminate hunger in America.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF SENATOR WALTER F. MONDALE'S REMARKS TO THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON FOOD, NUTRITION, AND HEALTH, DECEMBER 4, 1969

Senator McGovern sends his best wishes.

Since those doctors found hunger in Mississippi 2½ years ago, we have flattered America's hungry with a mammoth amount of publicity; surveys; reports; TV documentaries; Presidential messages; testimony; touring committees; and now, even a White House Conference.

We have flattered them with everything—except food.

Along with many of you, I have been privileged to be part of the liberal road show. It's quite a sight. Shriveled infants on the Navajo; blank-eyed, unlearning children in Nome; unbelievable proportions of anemia in a migrant community in Texas; a Florida migrant county with no food program at all, but with a death rate for nonwhite infants over six times the national average. Hunger everywhere—including a ghetto less than a mile from this hotel, where we saw children's lives being ruined by lack of food.

We set up a Nutrition Committee under the chairmanship of one of the truly remarkable leaders of our time, George McGovern. At latest count, our committee has heard over 6000 pages of testimony; 300 witnesses and traveled thousands of miles.

We weren't the first to look at hunger and deprivation—many of the poor remember visits by Eleanor Roosevelt, John Steinbeck, and others. Like them, we were shocked by what we saw; like them, we promised reform.

The case is now beyond dispute.

The problem is not that we lack facts about hunger and malnutrition—the problem is that we have lacked the will to eliminate it.

Our policies have not left us unscarred. For just as a war in Vietnam brutalizes us as well as the Vietnamese, so our willingness to permit hunger and deprivation in our land takes its toll on us as well. We might be able to live with our platitudes—but thank God, our children cannot. We may be losing them because we first lost our commitment to our professed ideals.

Many of your recommendations involve further nutrition studies and surveys, and, in exquisite detail, set forth a plan for an army of trained nutritionists to move among the poor and educate them. Undoubtedly, some of it is needed.

But I believe it would be far more valuable—we might even end hunger—if the education process were turned around and directed at ourselves, our society, to find out why in the name of heaven we have lost our capacity to respond quickly and adequately to starving Americans.

We would find, I believe, that the real cause of hunger and deprivation is the powerlessness of the poor, a powerlessness resulting from our desire to hold the poor in a guardian-ward relationship.

At times, our paternalism is benevolent. Often, it is abusive. But always it carries the self-seeking tone of wanting to do minor good works while preserving the power and the institutions of the dominant society. And in the end, those who are made dependent upon our continued interest and our voluntary sacrifices remain miserable and hungry.

Call the roll: Indians; Eskimos; migrants and farm workers; ghetto dwellers; the rural poor; millions of children who never have a chance; the elderly who are left alone or Americans confined to institutions of "care." These impoverished Americans, as Michael Harrington observed, "see life as a fate, an endless cycle from which there is no deliverance."

It is the powerlessness of the poor which results in the hunger we are discussing today—not ignorance or lack of will. I have never yet met a hungry person who liked it that way. But unlike us, they cannot do anything about it.

Until the poor have power—political power, legal power, and most of all purchasing power, they will stay poor and they will stay hungry.

I am convinced, in short, that poverty and hunger will not be eliminated until we tap the vast wisdom, understanding, loyalty, and pride of the poor. What an awful, unutterable waste not to realize that above all it is the poor themselves who know most about the details and the solution to their predicament!

But we must enjoy our paternalism. Why else do we fight so hard to preserve it? Why do we constantly attack those institutions attempting to afford the poor some control over their lives? Why the current effort to cripple foundations—an attack aimed primarily at foundations which are financing efforts to increase political participation by the poor and programs to make bureaucracies responsive to the needs of the poor? Why do we support efforts to destroy those same foundations which first exposed hunger in America and made this conference possible?

Why did the Senate adopt the Murphy Amendment—to turn over control of OEO's Legal Services Program to Governor Reagan and his colleagues? How many lawsuits against the government to feed the hungry will be brought by lawyers hired and directed by the Governor?

Perhaps this Conference should have tackled the real cause of hunger—powerlessness. You have squarely met the need for purchasing power in your income maintenance recommendations. But there are other types of power which could have been considered.

For example, why not endorse Cesar Chavez's attempts to organize the table grape growers—a first essential step in granting the same bargaining power to migrants and farm workers which nearly all other workers enjoy?

Why discuss the hunger of the Eskimo without mentioning the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act—which would give the Alaskan native more hope, more pride, and more income from a fair share of oil properties than anything we could do here?

Why not recognize that if the Southern Black were permitted to participate fully and effectively in state and local government—in part, by extension of the Voting Rights Act—he could do more to help himself than we can.

Why is there no mention of one of the greatest sources of powerlessness in this country today—our government's policy permitting the thousands and thousands of desperate, impoverished, unskilled Mexicans daily crossing the borders of Texas and California, depressing working conditions, taking jobs, breaking strikes and refueling the cruelest and most destructive institution in America today—the migrant stream?

My point is perhaps most clearly evident in the case of the American Indian. For 130 years they have been the special responsibility—special wards—of the Federal government. We permit the average Indian family barely to exist on $1,500 a year—but if the annual budget of the BIA and related federal programs would be divided among the Indian people, the average Indian's family's income would rise to $6,500.

Instead, our first Americans are now indisputably the last. Of all Americans, they have been most dependent upon us for the longest. Our paternal policies have resulted in their breaking all records—of ill health, joblessness, school failure, alcoholism, suicide, and, yes, hunger. Yet the recommendations here did not call for Indian control of their schools or any basic remedies which would empower the Indian to do something to save himself.

But despite these omissions, your panel recommendations and the reports of your task forces do propose a clear program for an end to hunger in America.

Most important, the Conference has recognized the greatest single need of the hungry—money for an adequate diet.

Many of you have made the first priority of this program a national system of income maintenance—a recommendation which I strongly support. By offering economic power to the beneficiaries, income maintenance offers an answer to both the immediate problem of hunger and the more fundamental problem of powerlessness.

Cash income means far more than adequate nutrition. It conveys dignity and self-respect, which have no value and yet all value.

But let's not delude ourselves. $1,600 a year, with or without food stamps, does not constitute adequate income maintenance for a family of four. And we would compound our self-deception if we accept government statistics which assume that a family of four with an income of $3,600 is not poor.

We need a program that provides real—not token—income maintenance and that offers incentives—not threats—for meaningful employment. A combination of good jobs and income help without demeaning and unnecessary investigations would go far toward ending both poverty and paternalism.

Studies show that "the poor make better use of their investment dollar than the well-to-do," that they will spend the money they receive more wisely to meet their needs than we can. This income and employment program must be a central and crucial objective in our pursuit of a just America.

Because of distorted priorities—with which most of us do not agree—we cannot accomplish this goal overnight.

But children cannot go hungry while we seek to reverse our priorities. As you have pointed out, there are important measures which can and must be adopted immediately.

1st. I join with those who have urged the President to declare at once a National Emergency, and to harness all resources to eradicate hunger—just as he would deal with other kinds of national disasters. The President had a perfect opportunity to make such a declaration at this conference, I regret that he did not. If the President and the nation can move so fast and effectively to aid victims of hurricanes, surely we can respond similarly to the victims of hunger.

2nd. It is time to stop making vague commitments to end hunger. If "the time has come to end hunger," that time is now. Let that national commitment contain a national deadline—just as a deadline was set by President Kennedy and met one year early for landing a man on the moon!

3rd. The key threshold objective of those totally committed to ending hunger must be the passage and full funding of the McGovern-Javits Food Stamp program adopted by the Senate.

It is carefully designed to assure adequate food assistance to the estimated 5 million poorest of the poor, 1.3 million of whom have no cash income at all. It is among those desperate Americans that hunger often becomes starvation.

The Administration alternative would serve far fewer of these most desperately poor if it worked—and it won't work. It won't because it assumes that State and local governments will all participate and will all find and feed the hungry. There is no basis for that sunny expectation. Today, several years after local governments could have implemented food stamp programs, 5 states and over 300 counties do not have them at all, and most counties have only token programs, in fact, the average food stamp county reaches only 10% of the poor.

The Administration program, unlike the Senate measure, lacks a national responsibility to end hunger. That is the gimmick—the "rhetoric" of the Administration position. Unless some national officer is finally responsible for finding and feeding the hungry, they won't be found or fed.

The Senate bill, which now languishes in the House Agriculture Committee, was not a Democratic measure—it enjoyed wide bipartisan support. I therefore plead with the President, whose representatives lobbied against its passage in the Senate; and whose Secretary of Agriculture now lobbies against it in the House, to stand up and clearly support this essential measure to end family hunger among this nation's most desperately poor.

If after everything—including this conference—we cannot enlist the President's clear support for the Senate bill and assure its passage, then we can do nothing meaningful to eliminate hunger.

The President spoke about working within our system. But that system responds to leadership; we need his now.

4th. We must immediately pass your recommended Children's Emergency Food Service Program to bring nutritious lunches and breakfasts to the 5 million low income children not now receiving them. An adequate diet should come first, before textbooks. Textbooks are useless to hungry children.

The President has set a target of feeding every needy school child by next June. But his Administration is fighting that goal. His current budget assures that almost 5 million needy school children will remain unfed. And they have opposed a House-passed measure to increase that budget.

Nor has this Administration pursued a creative and meaningful program for early childhood pre-school nutrition, beginning with mothers during pregnancy. Our failure to do so now destroys millions of our young before they even enter school.

5th. We clearly need Congressional reform. Obviously, all blame does not rest with the Executive.

The first step must be the extension for at least one more year of the Senate's Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs. The Senate-adopted food stamp bill would not have been possible without the bipartisan push by this Committee. This Committee can help monitor passage of your recommendations.

In addition, legislative jurisdiction for all nutrition programs should rest in those Committees primarily concerned with human problems—the Labor and Public Welfare Committee in the Senate and the Education and Labor Committee in the House.

Now, where do we go from here? What happens to these recommendations? Do we simply await the Conference's final report and place it, perhaps, alongside the report of the Kerner Commission?

Or do we join in a call for an immediate end to hunger and malnutrition as the central and overriding goal of this Conference?

Your recommendations must be implemented. But that job requires pressure—unrelenting public pressure.

Our responsibility—your responsibility—does not end with this conference—it only begins. You represent most of America. With your constituencies and your concern, you are ideally suited to move both Congress and the President.

We know the stakes.

As Nick Kotz observed, we once resisted the conclusion of widespread hunger in our land. We said, "We don't know." But the most disturbing answer was, "We don't know because we have not looked: we have not looked because we feared what we would see; and we were afraid because seeing would indict us."

We knew that seeing it raised not only questions of hunger but questions about our society.

It is now too late to say "We don't know." We have looked. We have seen, and we stand indicted.

The only question that remains is what we mean by the Politics of Hunger.

Will the hungry continue to eat promises or will they eat food?

LACK OF UNIFORM DESEGREGATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in recent days, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) has been doing some excellent work in connection with the lack of uniformity in insisting upon desegregation in public schools. Within the last few days, he has shown how wide is the practice of having dual school systems and an apparent disregard of desegregation of the public schools in the manner in which HEW has insisted upon for southern schools.

Certainly, there can be no justification for a different treatment in different sections of the country.

This point was discussed very clearly in an editorial published in the Mobile Press Register of November 16, 1969.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Press Register, Nov. 16, 1969]

WHY PUT PRESSURE ON SOUTH ALONE?

"Government sources" not otherwise identified have been quoted by the Associated Press in Washington, D.C., to the effect that the Nixon administration "will apply new pressure on some 130 holdout southern school districts in a first positive response to the Supreme Court's desegregate at once mandate."

These same "sources" are quoted to the effect that the Nixon administration "will not demand faster action from the 109 Southern districts that already have signed up to desegregate next fall."

Politicians who specialize in ridiculing and harassing the South can be counted on to rejoice over the reported prospect of "new pressure" being put on "holdout" school districts in this region of the nation.

Assorted leftist radicals in general may be expected to join in the rejoicing, for they, too, are overflowing with prejudice against the South.

But if new so-called desegregation pressure is to be applied, why single out "holdout" school districts in the South when racial segregation is practiced so widely and conspicuously outside the South.

In the words of Sen. John Stennis of Mississippi, "If it is the law, it ought to apply in Chicago the same as it does in Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas or anywhere else."

And in the words of Sen. Russell B. Long of Louisiana, "It seems to be hard for everyone to understand that if it is the law, everyone should abide by it."

It is preposterous to claim that equity and justice can be found in persecuting the South while other regions have a field day in segregation and go scotfree.

From Sen. Clifford P. Hansen of the western state of Wyoming, this statement: "I see no reason or justification for applying a national law any more leniently or any more strenuously in one part of the country than in another."

Expressly pointing out that he was "not trying to imply that the Civil Rights Act is wrong or that it is right," Senator Hansen said: "It is the law and as part of this country it should apply uniformly throughout the country."

Anti-South politicians and anti-South radicals who rejoice over seeing the South singled out for persecution are a sorry sight to behold.

ROCKWALL, TEX., ROTARY CLUB FAVORS 100,000-ACRE BIG THICKET NATIONAL PARK

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the Rockwall Rotary Club of Rockwall, Tex., has adopted a resolution urging the establishment of a 100,000-acre Big Thicket National Park in southeast Texas. This distinguished organization, as well as many other conservation and civic groups throughout the country, recognize the danger posed by the bulldozer and chain saw to this unique and beautiful wilderness. At one time the Big Thicket covered over 3.5 million acres. Now 300,000 acres is all that remains of this natural wonderland.

Because of the richness and diversity of the plant life, the Big Thicket has immense scientific value. Every major American university has sent representatives to the Big Thicket to do research. Many of the plants that are found in the Big Thicket are useful in the treatment of cancer and heart disease.

The Big Thicket, also famous for the many species of rare wildlife that live there, has at least 300 species of birds, including the rare bald eagle, red-cockaded woodpecker, Bachman's sparrow, and the legendary ivory-billed woodpecker.

The Big Thicket is in danger of being lost forever. With each day that goes by, another 50 acres disappears. Unless action is taken soon on my bill, S. 4, we will lose the Big Thicket forever.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Rockwall Rotary Club be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF ROCKWALL ROTARY CLUB, ROCKWALL, TEX., ON THE BIG THICKET NATIONAL AREA

Rockwall Rotary Club does hereby adopt the Policy Statement on The Big Thicket National Area, a copy of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof for all purposes, and urges the President of the United States, the Congress, the Department of the Interior, the U.S. Corps of Engineers (as to Dam B), and the appropriate state agencies (as to supplemental state and historic parks) to take appropriate action to implement this policy as soon as possible.

Rockwall Rotary Club, District 581,
FRANK A. ROBERTSON,
President.
F. V. IRVIN,
Secretary.
507 Crotty, Rockwall, Tex. 75087.

POLICY STATEMENT ON BIG THICKET NATIONAL AREA

We favor a Big Thicket National Park or area which would include not only the minimum of 35,500 acres proposed in the Preliminary Report by the National Park Service study team, but also the following modifications and additions:

1. Extend the Pine Island Bayou section southward and eastward down both sides of Pine Island Bayou to its confluence with the Neches River.

2. Extend the Neches Bottom Unit to cover a strip, a maximum of three miles, but not less than four hundred feet, wide on both sides of the Neches River from Highway 1746, just below Dam B, down to the confluence of Pine Island Bayou.

3. Extend the Beaumont Unit northward to include all the area between the LNVA Canal and the Neches.

4. Incorporate a Village Creek Unit, comprising a strip up to one mile wide where feasible, and no less than 400 feet wide on each side of Big Sandy-Village Creek from the proopsed Profile Unit down to the Neches confluence. Where ever residences have already been constructed, an effort should be made to reach agreement with the owners for scenic easements, limiting further development on such tracts and preserving the national environment. Pioneer architecture within these areas should also be preserved.

5. Incorporate a squarish area of at least 20,000 acres so that larger species such as black bear, puma and red wolf may survive there. An ideal area for this purpose would be the area southeast of Saratoga, surrounded by Highways 770, 326 and 105. Although there are pipeline crossings in this area, they do not destroy the ecosystem; therefore the National Park Service should revise its standards pertaining to such incumbrances, in this case, leaving them under scenic easement rules instead of acquiring them.

6. Connect the major units with corridors at least one-half mile wide, with a hiking trail along each corridor but without new public roads cutting any forest. A portion of Menard Creek would be good for one such corridor. The entire watershed of Rush Creek would be excellent for another.

Such additions would form a connected two-looped green belt of about 100,000 acres (there are more than 3 million acres in the overall Big Thicket area) through which wildlife and people could move along a continuous circle of more than 100 miles.

We recommend that the headquarters be in or near the line of the Profile Unit.

We are absolutely opposed to any trading or cession of any National Forest areas in the formation of the Big Thicket National Park or Monument.

In addition, but not as a part of the Big Thicket National Monument, we recommend: (a) the establishment of a National Wildlife Refuge comprising the lands of the U.S. Corps of Engineers around Dam B, (b) a state historical area encompassing communities of typical pioneer dwellings, farms, etc., such as that between Beech and Theuvenins Creeks off Road 1943 in Tyler County, and (c) other state parks to supplement the national reserve.

FELLOWSHIP OF CHRISTIAN ATHLETES

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I wish to commend the work of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, Kansas City, Mo. With an idea begun in 1954, the Fellowship of Christian Athletes has now become a dynamic, interdenominational program directed toward athletes and all young people.

Recognizing that we live in a sports-oriented society, the Fellowship of Christian Athletes seeks to use the prominence of the athlete to inspire the youth of the Nation to meet the challenges and adventures of our times following Christian precepts.

The program has grown rapidly over the years, and today thousands of high school and college students have been reached through it. The program can well be described as a fellowship through which ordinary people help each other to become better men.

MAN AND HIS ENVIRONMENT

Mr. SPONG. Mr. President, modern man has come to realize that the quality of his life is proportional to the harmony he can achieve with his environment.

For centuries, man operated on the theory that his environment had an unlimited capacity to assimilate his wastes. Only within the past few years has he come to recognize that the costs of misusing the environment ultimately are unavoidable.

Ecological relationships are discussed in an enlightening article written by Lee Berton and published in the Wall Street Journal of Tuesday, December 2. The article will be of interest to every Senator. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Dec. 2, 1969]

ECOLOGY AND PROBLEMS BEYOND POLLUTION

(By Lee Berton)

"U.S. cities are mining the productive soils of the prairies and dumping useful nutrients into places like New York harbor, where they are harmful, and the Hackensack Meadows in New Jersey, where they are useless."

That, says University of Pennsylvania Professor Ian McHarg, is perhaps the most pressing environmental problem uncovered in a just-completed five-year aerial and ground-level inventory of natural resources in the Delaware River Basin. Mr. McHarg is chairman of the department of landscape and architecture and regional planning at Penn, and the survey taken under his direction is one of the most extensive projects yet in the fledgling science of ecology, or the study of man's relationship with his total environment.

The problem of environment, ecologists stress, goes far beyond merely pollution, for all its current popularity in headlines and on television screens. For too long, they contend, man has thought merely of disposing of wastes, preferably in some innocuous way. But, Mr. McHarg declares, "burning garbage at incineration plants or burying it in landfill is stupid and senseless. All we get for our troubles are poisonous methane gas and poor foundations."

The real solution to waste management, the ecologists say, is to use sewage and other effluents wisely, so they benefit rather than damage the environment. By and large, wastes are fertilizers and foods needed by some organisms. Put in the right place they can be useful, but put in the wrong place they entirely upset the balance of the environment.

SEWER DISPOSAL DIFFICULTIES

The problem is particularly obvious, and particularly pressing, in the treatment and disposal of sewage. Current treatment depends heavily on aeration to kill harmful bacteria and remove offensive odors. The resulting effluent is released into lakes and streams.

The process breaks sewage down into its constituent compounds of phosphorous, nitrogen and the like. These compounds are food for many organisms, and releasing too much of them into water's stimulates a clogging overgrowth. The much publicized "pollution" of Lake Erie, for example, does not actually result from inherently noxious chemicals. Rather it comes from an overabundance of generally beneficial ones, stimulating an excessive plant growth that uses up so much of the available oxygen, fish can no longer survive.

John Cantlon, former president of the Ecological Society of America, says "We've got to plan our cities and rural areas so that waste management is one of the major elements, and we put in enough green space or swamp land to absorb our effluents through enrichment of the soil rather than pollution of our lakes and streams."

Ecologists generally support that opinion strongly. The principle is clear enough. Rather than run phosphates from sewage plants into Lake Erie, for example, spray them on green belts or forests surrounding cities, where more plant growth is needed. In working out the details, though, many projects remain only in the idea stage, and others serve mostly to suggest the difficulties and expense involved.

George M. Woodwell, a senior ecologist at Brookhaven National Laboratories in Upton, N.Y., suggests building small marshes and ponds as "great sinks for these nutrients." In these water bodies, Mr. Woodwell would harvest carp and rice, which he describes as excellent crops for absorbing sewage plant effluent. He has asked the Atomic Energy Commission for a grant of several million dollars to conduct a 10-year study of these "terrestial and aquatic swamps," which he describes as similar to Southeast Asia's "paddy-and-fish" irrigation systems.

A Lake Mendota near Madison, Wis., University of Wisconsin researchers have been removing aquatic plants with special harvesting equipment for the past three years. "Before the city of Madison stopped spewing its sewage into the lake three years ago, the waters became so thick with milfoil, a spruce-like underwater growth, that boats and canoes couldn't sail and fish and humans couldn't swim," recalls Arthur Hasler, director of the university's Laboratory of Limnology (the study of fresh inland waterways).

Professor Hasler says these aquatic plants are being cut up after harvesting and are being used for hog feed and compost. "But we are removing the plants coking up Mendota with only three machines, which is like using one lawnmower on all our city parks," he says. "We need at least 10 of these weed harvesters or we're simply making a gesture rather than a real effort." The harvesters, however, cost $40,000 each and the city of Madison and surrounding Dane County can't afford more than three, he adds.

Michigan State University in East Lansing began a project two years ago to absorb the sewage effluent from its 40,000 students without polluting nearby lakes. Researchers at the university's Institute of Water Research discovered that if they construct a system of connected ponds and small plots of woods and specific crops, they could absorb the nutrients in the effluent without upsetting the ecological balance of the landscape.

Marvin E. Stephenson, an associate professor working on the project, says five ponds and 200 acres of three-to-five acre plots of hardwoods or corn and alfalfa cover 450 acres. Pollution of the ponds decreases as each is drained into another and the final pond, which is five times the size of the other four, is clean enough for swimming. The first few ponds, which get the brunt of the sewage, are occasionally harvested of overgrowths of water weeds and plants.

Nutrients from the smaller ponds are used to fertilize small plots of land and each plot is being studied to see which plants or vegetables absorbs phosphates or nitrates quickest. The budget for the project is $1.4 million.

At present the project is infeasible for large cities. Professor Stephenson estimates that 350 square miles of ponds and plots would be needed to treat all New York City's effluent; the city itself covers only 320 square miles. "The land area needed to absorb without pollution the 15 billion gallons of treated sewage of the U.S. daily would encompass 3,500 square miles, or more than Rhode Island and Delaware together," he points out.

Some communities are diverting effluent from nearby lakes to distant irrigation reservoirs used by farmers. Professor Hasler is a consultant to the South Tahoe Public Utility District, which raised $9 million locally and received a $10 million Federal grant to pipe treated sewage over the mountains into California rather than into Lake Tahoe in Nevada. He recalls, "At first the farmers weren't too keen on using 'night soil' to fertilize their fields, but they've discovered it doesn't smell that bad and is much better than commercial chemicals."

USE THE OCEANS?

While methods of recycling nutrients into nature are being studied and perfected, some ecologists believe a useful stopgap would be dumping sewage far out into the oceans, well beyond the continental shelf. William Niering, a botany professor at Connecticut College in New London, suggests isolating sections of the oceans with plastic barriers for dumping contaminants. "We could create self-contained ponding areas that wouldn't spread sewage," he says, adding that the open ocean is now a "biological desert" that could absorb organic fertilizers without harmful pollution.

To promote better handling of wastes, David Gates, a St. Louis ecologist, has asked Congress to establish a National Institute of Ecology. He also recommends the creation of ecosystem analysis task forces, which would study certain geographical areas and try to save animal and plant species being eliminated by pollution or competing, less desirable species.

Ecologists concede that improving waste management will require huge spending. To manage the nation as an orderly ecosystem, Mr. Gates says, would be "like fighting a major war," and would cost billions of dollars. He adds that while this sounds expensive, so, a decade ago, did sending a man to the moon. "Attacking pollution is more important than space travel and we've got to abandon the notion we can't afford new ecosystems. We're poisoning our world and we can't afford not to spend the money as soon as possible."

Most ecologists are discouraged over whether such funds will become available, for they see the Federal Government as the only logical source. Total national expenditures for disposing of solid wastes, both public and private, now run about $4.5 billion a year. Robert Finch, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, concedes that these outlays "have simply not been effective in preserving or improving the quality of our landscape." But he told a Senate subcommittee recently that the Administration wants industry rather than Government to pay for coping with the nation's growing mountains of trash.

INADEQUATE AND UNSANITARY

Much of today's waste disposal, moreover, is inadequate even from the traditional standpoint of simple sanitation, let alone from the more modern perspectives of the ecologists Federal officials say that 75% of the country's municipal incinerators are "unsatisfactory from the standpoint of public health, efficiency or protection of natural resources."

Instances of pollution by noxious substances also remain a serious problem. White perch caught in Chesapeake Bay were found to contain organisms that could cause typhoid fever, dysentery and tuberculosis. Coho salmon caught in the Great Lakes were found to contain dangerously high levels of DDT.

It seems clear, though, that the ecologists' point that the old standards are not enough will demand more attention in the future. Whatever the level or source of funding for waste management, the problem will be not merely waste disposal but proper use of the resulting nutrients.

"If man continues to degrade his land by dumping nutrients into the wrong places," says Brookhaven Labs' Mr. Woodwell, "We'll eventually kill off all species of fish, fowl, birds and animals that we like, while species we don't like will survive." Crab grass, rats, crows and inedible fish will survive, he warns, "but eagles, pine trees and trout will disappear."

PROPOSED REPEAL OF EMERGENCY DETENTION ACT OF 1950

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, yesterday, the Department of Justice in a letter to Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, recommended the repeal of the Emergency Detention Act of 1950 as proposed in S. 1872, a bill I introduced on April 18 of this year with 25 other Senators. I welcomed this news and am delighted that the Justice Department has finally recognized the threat it poses to justice and constitutional rights of American citizens. I am particularly relieved by this decision in view of the rumors reported in our press that the Justice Department did not support title II's repeal.

With this additional support for the legislation by the Justice Department I am again urging the Judiciary Committee to schedule early consideration of S. 1872. In the letter to Senator JAMES O. EASTLAND, the Department of Justice recommended the "repeal of the Emergency Detention Act of 1950 as proposed in S. 1872." In view of this support and the support of many others for repeal of this statute, I am hopeful that my bill will be quickly considered and reported from the Judiciary Committee and that no other provisions or revisions of the Internal Security Act be attached to it. The need and justification for passage of S. 1872 has, I believe, been clearly established and the inclusion of other revisions in the Internal Security Act would defeat the singular purpose of my legislation.

The Justice Department goes on to state in supporting repeal of title II:

It is quite clear that the continuation of the emergency detention act is extremely offensive to many Americans. In the judgment of this Department, the repeal of this legislation will allay these fears and suspicions—unfounded as they may be—of many of our citizens. This benefit outweighs any potential advantage which the Act may provide in a time of an internal security emergency.

As Mr. Kleindienst states, many Americans find the emergency detention provision frightful and this view confirms my receipt of many letters and other communications supporting my fight for the repeal of this law. As an example of the material I have received, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD copies of resolutions I recently received supporting the repeal of title II that were adopted by the council of the city and county of Honolulu, Hawaii; council of the county of Maui, Hawaii; council of the city of Berkeley, Calif.; 120th convention of the Episcopal Diocese of California; Club 100, an organization of World War II veterans of 100th Battalion, 442d Regiment; and a petition signed by approximately 150 students of San Jose High School.

Unquestionably the existence of this law deeply concerns many Americans and, to forever allay the fears and rumors its existence has caused, I urged the Senate to take speedy and favorable action on S. 1872, the bill simply to repeal title II.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF THE CITY COUNCIL OF HONOLULU, HAWAII

Whereas, the Congress of the United States has heretofore adopted subtitle II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, commonly known as the Emergency Detention Act; and

Whereas, the said Emergency Detention Act authorizes detention of any person on the mere probability that he will engage in, or conspire with others to engage in acts of espionage or of sabotage during proclaimed periods of "Internal Security Emergency"; and

Whereas, the said Emergency Detention Act fails to provide for trial by jury, or even before a judge, substituting instead hearing before a departmental preliminary hearing officer and a detention review board; and

Whereas, the said detention procedures set forth in the said Emergency Detention Act, pose a serious threat to the Civil Rights of all Americans; now, therefore,

Be it resolved that the Council of the City and County of Honolulu strongly urge all members of the Congress of the United States to use their best efforts to have the said Emergency Detention Act repealed; and

Be it finally resolved that the Clerk be. and she is hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to: Governor John A. Burns; U.S. Senator Daniel K. Inouye; U.S. Senator Hiram L. Fong; U.S. Congressman Spark M. Matsunaga; U.S. Congresswoman Patsy T. Mink; Senator David McClung, President, State Senate; Representative Tadao Beppu, Speaker, State House of Representatives; Mr. Ray Okamura, JACL National Co-Chairman; Mr. Mike Masseka, JACL Washington Representative; Dr. Robert Suzuki, JACL Executive Liaison; Mr. A. A. Smyser, Editor, Honolulu Star Bulletin; Mr. George Chaplin, Editor, Honolulu Advertiser; Mr. Takeshi Fujikawa, Editor, Hawaii Hechi; Mr. Ryekin Toyehira, Editor, Hawaii Times; and Mayor Frank F. Fasi, City and County of Honolulu.

RESOLUTION OF THE COUNCIL MAUI COUNTY, HAWAII

Whereas, the Internal Security Act of 1950 passed by the Congress of the United States provides, among other things, for the detention of any person on the mere probability that he will engage in or conspire with others to engage in acts of espionage or of sabotage during proclaimed periods of "Internal Security Emergency"; and

Whereas, said act violates the civil rights of all Americans; now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Council of the County of Maui that it does hereby respectfully request the Congress of the United States to forthwith take whatever action is necessary to repeal the Internal Security Act of 1950; and

Be it further resolved that certified copies of this resolution be transmitted to Senator Hiram L. Fong, to Senator Daniel K. Inouye, to Congressman Spark M. Matsunaga, and to Congresswoman Patsy T. Mink.

RESOLUTION OF THE CITY COUNCIL OF BERKELEY, CALIF.

(A resolution urging repeal of the Emergency Detention Act—subtitle II of the Internal Security Act of 1950—and expressing friendship and goodwill for the Japanese-American community)

Be it resolved by the Council of the City of Berkeley as follows:

Whereas, the Emergency Detention Act (Subtitle II of the Internal Security Act of 1950) provides that, during periods of "internal security emergency", any person who probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to "engage in, acts of espionage or sabotage" can be incarcerated in detention camps; and

Whereas, a person detained under the Emergency Detention Act will not be brought to trial under law, but instead will be judged by a Preliminary Hearing Officer and a Detention Review Board, wherein the detainee must prove his innocence but the government is not required to disclose evidence or produce witnesses to justify the detention; and

Whereas, said procedures violate all constitutional guarantees and protections, principles of democracy, and are unnecessary since existing laws and procedures are available and are completely adequate to safeguard internal security; and

Whereas, such a law has ominous implications for the racial ethnic communities because of past history with particular relation to the World War II detention experience of American citizens of Japanese ancestry, and because of its approach to justice in group rather than individual terms, contrary to the best American traditions.

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the Council of the City of Berkeley does hereby declare its opposition to the Emergency Detention Act, Subtitle II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, and urges its repeal.

Further, resolved, that the Council of the City of Berkeley does hereby express its sincere friendship and goodwill toward the Japanese-Americans in the City of Berkeley, in the State of California and in the United States of America, wishes them continuing prosperity and success and commends them for their unyielding faith in America and in their triumph over wartime adversities.

RESOLUTION OF DIOCESAN COUNCIL

(A resolution supporting repeal of title II, 1950 Internal Security Act—Emergency Detention Act of 1950)

Whereas the Internal Security Act of 1950 provides, in Title II, for the Emergency Detention, under circumstances declared by the President to be an "Internal Security Emergency", of persons believed likely to engage in or to conspire with others to engage in acts of treason or of espionage, and

Whereas this type of detention without a hearing is contrary to the legal principles of constitutional government, and

Whereas the experience of this country with such a measure in the internment of Japanese-Americans in World War II produced results that were less than desirable, and

Whereas at the present time Senate and House bills supporting the Repeal of Title II (Emergency Detention Act of 1950) are pending in Congress, namely S. 1872 and H.R. 11825, now, therefore,

Be it resolved that the 120th Convention of the Episcopal Diocese of California support the Repeal of Title II (Emergency Detention Act of 1950), of the Internal Security Act of 1950, and

Be it further resolved that this Convention urge the people of the Diocese to write their legislators in support of the House and Senate bills (S. 1872 and H.R. 11825) to repeal the Emergency Detention Act of 1950.

RESOLUTION OF CLUB 100, AN INCORPORATED ASSOCIATION OF MEMBERS OF THE 100TH INFANTRY BATTALION

Whereas, Americans of Japanese ancestry, from previous experience in emergency detention, recognize the danger of Sub-Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950 (Emergency Detention Act), to the civil rights of all Americans, and

Whereas, the Emergency Detention Act provides that, during periods of "Internal security emergency", any person who "probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or of sabotage" can be incarcerated in detention camps, and

Whereas, a person detained under the Emergency Detention Act will not be brought to trial under law, but instead will be judged by a Preliminary Hearing Officer and a Detention Review Board, where the detainee must prove his innocence but the government is not required to furnish evidence or witnesses to justify the detention; Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Club 100, an organization comprised of World War II veterans of the 100th Battalion, 442nd Regiment, that is hereby affirms it's opposition to Sub-Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950 (Emergency Detention Act), and be it further

Resolved that in conformity with its opposition to said Sub-Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, that it hereby urges the members of the 91st Congress of the United States of America to repeal said Sub-Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, and be it finally

Resolved that duly certified copies of this resolution shall be forwarded to the following:

(1) The President of the United States
(2) Honorable Spiro T. Agnew, President of the Senate of the United States
(3) Honorable John W. McCormack, Speaker of the House of Representatives
(4) Senator Hiram L. Fong

(7) Representative Patsy T. Mink

Date: September 10, 1969.
HONOLULU, HAWAII.

PETITION BY 150 STUDENTS AT SAN JOSE, CALIF., HIGH SCHOOL

DEAR SENATOR INOUYE: We understood that you have introduced a bill to repeal the Emergency Detention Act. (Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950). We the undersigned support your legislation.

We are fully aware of the Title II which provides for the establishment of detention camps and the indiscriminate incarceration of citizens. We feel that there are adequate laws under which persons committing espionage, sabotage, and other criminal acts against the United States can be brought to justice under due process of law, which is a right due every American citizen by the Constitution of the United States.

There is reason to believe that certain government agencies or authorities are considering implementing the Emergency Detention Act as a means of quelling the forces of dissent in the country.

We do not want the injustice which prevailed in the 1940's to reappear.

PAUL HOFFMAN—DEDICATED WORLD SERVANT

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Paul Hoffman has dedicated a major portion of his life to helping other people to build a better life for themselves. First as Administrator of the Marshall plan, then as Managing Director of the United Nations Special Fund, and now as Administrator of the U.N. Development Program, Mr. Hoffman has fought, pleaded, and cajoled the more developed nations of the world to assist those that are less fortunate. Against great odds, he has succeeded. Not that the goals of worldwide development is here. But, he has managed to convince nations and peoples—developed and less developed—that the road to advancement and social well-being lies through the application of intelligence, commonsense, hard work, diligence, and a dedication to succeed. Paul Hoffman, I suspect, has managed to persevere in this endeavor because of his confidence that this approach, although not always the most dramatic, is the true road to success.

On November 13, Mr. Hoffman, in his capacity as Administrator of the U.N. Development Program, presented a most valuable report to the 24th session of the General Assembly on past development efforts and the requirements for future growth. I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

This report outlines in excellent fashion: The need to view development from a total interdependence standpoint involving all sectors and aspects of society; the fact that each nation is different and must be approached on an individualized basis; the interrelationship of external assistance and internal resources, private investment, trade, and multinational contributions; and the continued applicability of older truths relating to the essential application of preinvestment surveys, education and training, science and technology, infrastructive development, and so forth.

More important than all these other factors, in my opinion, is the realization—ably presented by Mr. Hoffman—that we are all together in this development effort. The more we help others to develop, the greater our trade will be and, thereby, the wealth of our own Nation. Similarly, the more that free trade is permitted to exist, the better will be our ability to prosper and to help others. Most essential of all, we live together in a small world. If we are to save our world, and grow in material and moral wealth, we must work together and help our neighbors. Contrary to many spurious reports, we as taxpayers pay very little to help other nations. What we do contribute will come back to us multifold in peace, security, and material well-being.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY PAUL G. HOFFMAN, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE UNITED NATIONS DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM TO THE 24TH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY SECOND COMMITTEE, NOVEMBER 13, 1969

Mr. President, for more than ten years, I have had a privilege that comes to very few men. I have worked at a job I thoroughly enjoy; a job that is constantly changing, constantly challenging, sometimes frustrating but always rewarding—the job of administering an unprecedented partnership for helping to build a better world.

During these years, I have listened to and read what must total many hundreds of thousands of words on the subject of development. Honesty compels me to confess that I have written and spoken many thousands myself. One might think it difficult, then, to find anything new to say about the topic. In truth, we must all plead guilty to having repeatedly used, and some might feel over-used, the same facts and the same argumentation. This is not always so great a sin as it sounds. There are, after all, certain truths about development that not only bear repeating but demand it.

Perhaps the most important of these is the truth that the first development decade has been a decade of successful achievement. I know that this point of view is not universally accepted. But I also remember that in 1961, when the achievement of an economic growth rate of 5% by 1970 was set as a goal for the developing countries, it was regarded as over-optimistic. That growth rate has essentially been achieved. Furthermore, it is even slightly higher than the average growth rate achieved in the more advanced nations. There is, however, another side to this development story. The rate of population increase in developing countries has been about 2.5 per cent, so that the rate of growth of income per head has been held down to approximately 2.5 per cent. In the more advanced countries, where the annual population increase was considerably smaller, about 1.2 per cent, the growth rate of per capita incomes was close to 3.7 per cent. Clearly, most developing countries are faced with a population explosion which has a most serious impact on personal incomes.

The fact that the average economic growth rate for the developing countries has reached 5 per cent should not conceal the fact that in many countries it is still far too low. The average of 5 per cent resulted from substantial growth rates in a number of countries—ranging from 6 per cent to as high as 10 per cent. One significant fact about countries with very high growth rates is that in almost every case the flow of external resources to them was considerably higher than to those countries with much lower growth rates. With such strong evidence as to the efficacy of the impact of external resources we may well ask ourselves why they are not provided on a larger and wider scale.

There is more, however, to the success story of the 1960s than mere statistics. For example, there has been a remarkable change in the attitudes of officials in the developing countries. No longer is there any trace of the feeling that independence assures economic and social development. There is, rather, recognition of the fact that these goals can only be achieved by much hard work and sacrifice. There is recognition too that while external assistance has a vital role to play in the economic and social advancement of the low-income countries, it is at the same time a limited role. It cannot be overlooked that between 80 and 85 percent of the resources for development must come from within the developing countries themselves.

Mr. President, I would like to point out, too, that in the decade of the '60s there have also been some changes of attitude on the part of those of us who have had the responsibility for administering assistance programmes. While certain of our early beliefs have been strengthened, some, on the other hand, have undergone great change.

Looking backward, we did not fully take into account the inter-dependence of all economic and social sectors. For example, successful industrial development often cannot take place without development of the agricultural sector as well. For a country does not industrialize by building factories: markets must be built. And since farming remains by far the largest source of income and purchasing power for the people of developing countries, agricultural growth and increased farm productivity and incomes are indispensable to industrialization.

Both agricultural and industrial growth are clearly dependent in turn, on growth in transport, power production, education, training, public health facilities and a great many other factors. Indeed, this kind of inter-dependence permeates the whole fabric of the development process.

Nor did we fully take into account—in 1960—how important it was to plan a development programme that gave due regard to the different institutions, traditions, mores and values of the developing nations. We learned that there could not and should not be a standardized programme for modernization that would apply to every country. We learned, rather, that assistance should be so administered that it would help keep the world safe for diversity. One result of this change of thinking has been the decision to enlarge the field organization of the UNDP to the point where we now have 94 field offices. We are certain that only by having qualified representatives actually living in a country . . . only by their getting to know the people and the officials of that country and its economic and social environment at first hand . . . can sound decisions be made that will enable our assistance to help speed the development process.

We believed in 1960 that the underlying cause of much of the poverty and misery in the world was not due to lack of physical and human resources, but rather due to their underutilization. That belief has been strengthened. After ten years of experience we now know that there is an unrealized potential of not less than 80 per cent of the underdeveloped world's material resources and fully 90 per cent of its human resources.

Ten years ago, we believed that technical assistance should be augmented by large-scale pre-investment projects in order to stimulate or facilitate new capital investment for the development of natural resources. The decade of the '60s has validated this belief and the UNDP has assisted 70 pre-investment projects which have influenced, directly or otherwise, reported investment commitments of an estimated $3 billion.

Ten years ago, we were convinced that the natural resources of a country could be exploited successfully only if the people of the country were educated and trained to take advantage of the opportunities which presented themselves. The decade of the '60s has done nothing to shake this conviction and the UNDP has assisted in the establishment of 260 training institutions of various kinds which have provided both short and long-term instructional courses to more than 300,000 men and women in the low-income countries. Further, many existing educational and training institutions have been strengthened with UNDP help. And many thousands of counterparts are benefiting from on-the-job training being given by the more than 8,000 international experts working on UNDP-assisted projects throughout the developing world this year.

Ten years ago, we believed that the United Nations and its related agencies should be used as executing agencies for special fund-assisted projects, even though at that time their field experience had been largely limited to smaller technical assistance operations. Acting on that belief the UNDP governing council to date has approved 1,075 major pre-investment projects calling for total expenditures of over $2½ billion, of which almost $1½ billion are being supplied by the recipient countries themselves. I am pleased to report, moreover, that the performance of the executing agencies has become increasingly effective during the course of the decade of the '60s. Further, we are convinced that as a result of the forthcoming study of the United Nations system capacity, still greater efficiency, enlarged capabilities and steadily improved coordination will be achieved in the years immediately ahead.

Ten years ago, we had the hope that science and technology had much to contribute to the development process. Today we know with certainty that this contribution can be spectacular. In every area of technical assistance and pre-investment activity, advances in methodology and technology have already demonstrated their worth and, in addition, have held out the promise of even greater returns in the years to come. This is true in education and training, in industry, forestry, fishing, the development of water resources, public health, in petroleum and other mineral exploration, in meteorology and in the application of nuclear energy.

But the most significant and most dramatic advances have taken place in the agricultural sector. Here, the term "Green Revolution" is neither figurative nor fanciful, but based on present actuality. Some months ago, for example, I was privileged to participate in several days of meetings in Bellagio, Italy, attended by some of the leading agricultural scientists in the world. I came away convinced that the technology is available now to double world food production within the next 10 to 15 years. I was also persuaded that there is in the making the technology through which it will soon be possible to increase substantially the protein-content of cereals and legumes. The ability to add significant amounts of protein to basic foods would literally be a world-shaking event, for by conservative estimates, 300 million children betwen the ages of 2 and 5 now face lives of stunted physical and mental growth due to the present lack of protein in their diets.

In line with the UNDP's increasing confidence in the potential of scientific and technological advances in this area, we propose to extend our activities in basic research by assisting a project with potentially global effects. It will involve intensified research and training in the cultivation of improved strains of maize with high nutritional value, exceptional yield-potential, and strong disease-resistance. The fundamental objective of this project is to extend the use of these improved varieties throughout a large part of the underdeveloped world.

The evidence of spectacular technological progress that was provided by man's successful moon-landing is paying other dividends here on earth. One of the most exciting half-hours I have spent in months, for example, was with a man heading a company that employs several of the scientists involved in that recent space venture. Their specialty is photography. They claim to have developed a new method for "photographing" the earth-surface from high altitudes which will enable them to locate and identify geological structures where raw materials lying beneath the land or even under the seas might be found. This high-altitude reconnaissance, can reveal promising areas for follow-up exploration and may prove to be an important additional tool in the search for metallic minerals, petroleum, underground water—virtually an entire catalogue of untouched resources. Significantly, too, this process holds the promise of reducing the cost of many resource surveys and of cutting in half the time presently required.

Man's efforts in space are providing other benefits as well. Within three years, for example, the first man-made star of its kind will be relaying to the Indian sub-continent educational television programs as well as instruction on modern farming practices, disease prevention and birth control. In fact, the entire educational field is on the verge of its own revolution thanks to advances in computer techniques, audiovisual devices and improved teaching methods.

Applied research and technology have already, of course; many contributions to their credit. Among the results of work UNDP has supported in this area during the past decade, I might mention, just by way of illustration, such things as the discovery by the Indian Institute of Petroleum of a method for extracting from low-grade kerosene a substance highly valuable to the plastics and fibre industries . . . the development in Iran on a laboratory scale of a process for recovering up to 98 percent of the zinc oxide content of low-grade ores . . . and successful experiments in Yugoslavia with radiation—induced mutations in plant-breeding which have contributed to the development of high-yielding and disease-resistant strains of some important staple crops. These achievements were part of a successful beginning in the field of applied research and technology—a beginning that allows us to look forward to a significant increase in the pace of development progress in the '70s.

Mr. President, may I sum up this brief assessment of the first development decade by saying that, in my opinion, never in any ten years of human history has so much progress been made in the achievement of a better utilization of the material and human resources of this planet. And may I add, at the same time, that never before has it been so clear as to how much remains to be done to bring about more rapid economic and social progress.

Earlier, I stated that the primary responsibility for development rested on the developing nations themselves. This was not, however, intended to understate the great importance of trade, or the vital role of external assistance. To put this question of development assistance as simply and directly as possible, the volume should be at least doubled and as soon as possible. The recently issued report of the Commission on International Development, organized under the auspices of the world bank and with the right honorable Lester Pearson as chairman, clearly supports this view.

The Pearson Commission Report makes a number of outstanding recommendations all of which merit most serious consideration. The report suggests, for example, that the flow of development aid be increased as quickly as possible—and by no later than 1975—to a figure equalling 1 per cent of the wealthier countries' gross national products. Another recommendation suggests that by no later than 1975, seven-tenths of this flow should be in the form of official development assistance. This second recommendation is of great significance. It could result in a much more equitable sharing of the aid burden among the tax payers of donor nations. It could also stimulate increased private investments because, generally, private investment strongly favours countries with good schools, good hospitals, modern roads, a competent civil service and other important public facilities. Such facilities must be financed from public sources.

A third most gratifying recommendation of the Pearson Commission calls for doubling, by 1975, that part of official aid flows which is channelled through multilateral organizations. This would mean an increase from 10 per cent of the total to 20 per cent—and I need not, before this body, go into any detail on the significance of that proposal.

But perhaps this would be an appropriate time to comment on an all too prevalent misunderstanding about how much the present level of aid actually costs the tax payers of the donor nations. As of now, aid figures reported in the press and other mass communication media often give the gross amount and this distorts the picture of the tax payers' aid burden. It does not separate from the total, private investments, bankable loans granted on commercial terms or a reasonable proportion of so-called "soft loans". Nor does it make allowance for repatriation of commercial profits, interest payments and similar items of counter-flow. Thus, for example, it must have seemed to most donor country citizens that the total tax burden for aid came to more than $12 billion in 1968; whereas I personally estimate that the real figure was around $4 billion.

The Pearson Commission report also recommends as a minimum target for the 1970s an annual economic growth rate of at least 6 per cent for the developing countries. Doubtless, the General Assembly will consider this recommendation as well as others—particularly that of the Committee for Development Planning—when it sets its own annual economic growth rate target for the developing countries in the '70s.

Undoubtedly, a global target is of genuine value in setting general standards for developing country efforts and providing a degree of psychological impetus. However, when it comes to stimulating action in a given country, the most important moving force for economic and social progress is a national target set by that country's officials and worked out in detail on the basis of that country's own pressing needs, its own most promising opportunities and its own available resources.

The United Nations development programme, for its part, has been deeply involved in the whole process of helping governments plan for economic and social advancement. For in addition to the scores of planning projects large and small which the UNDP has supported in individual countries throughout the world, our programme has also provided major assistance to the establishment of the African, Asian and Latin American Regional Planning Institutes.

Perhaps it is only natural that the subject of development planning is very much on all our minds as the start of the second development decade approaches. There are many who feel that too much time and effort have gone into high-level theorizing of which perhaps far too little has been translated into the pick and shovel work of actually getting things moving. Yet if one looks back to the concepts behind development work at the beginning of the 1960s, one can see what a necessary and useful evolution has taken place in the field of development planning.

There has been, for example, a significant trend away from an approach characterized by individual projects viewed in isolation. Emphasis now is on the more realistic concept of coordinated, sequential development activities presented as an adaptable, integrated programme. Today, also, the necessity for national, regional and even a degree of global programming is taken for granted—so much so that we sometimes forget just how much the lack of such programming cost in terms of wasted financing, the dissipation of scarce resources, bitter battles among competing priorities and loss of that precious commodity, time.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the final points I would like to make. I have previously stated that in planning a development programme due regard should be given to the traditions, institutions and values of the developing country in question. I cannot overemphasize this. But it is impossible to modernize a country without effecting changes—some quite radical, some even revolutionary. These changes will be accepted provided the need for them is adequately explained and demonstrated; yet it is a painful process as anyone of us, I think, can recognize. We need only to recall incidents from the history of virtually every country to appreciate the fact that change—no matter how reportedly beneficial—is always regarded with a measure of suspicion and sometimes even fear.

Thus when we encourage a peasant, whose life literally depends on the success of a single crop, to use new seeds or new farming methods, we must recognize that we are presenting him with a difficult choice. The same is true when a couple is asked to practice family planning when the very concept may conflict with what they have believed in from childhood. Or when it comes to convincing local merchants of the advantages of long-term investments when in their country an immediate high profit has always been the goal of any business enterprise.

Changing such fundamental feelings and many others like them takes time and tact, patience and understanding. It also requires the use of modern motivational and educational techniques—with full sensitivity to the fact that no one will give up something of value unless he can be shown and convinced that he is getting something of greater value in return. Many UNDP-assisted projects utterly depend on local attitudes for their success. Consequently, after long and serious study, UNDP is now fostering what we call "project support communication". The name explains the purpose—to help governments of the developing countries create understanding of, involvement in and support for UNDP-assisted work by those of their people who are directly affected by that work.

There is not only a need for intensified informational activities in the developing countries but—if anything—a far greater need in the industrially advanced countries.

Behind this rather polite way of putting things stands a hard fact which must be faced—the fact that all of us who are concerned with speeding development have to some extent failed in a major responsibility. We have failed to communicate effectively something we ourselves know—that what helps the developing countries helps the whole world. We have failed to convince enough people that development aid is not charity but a sound investment in global peace and progress. We have failed to get across to the taxpayers of the major donor countries the truth that their future depends on the achievement of a rapidly expanding world economy. We have signally failed to tell the full story of what aid and self-help have achieved and how vital mounting success is to all countries, rich and poor.

These failures are not irreversible. Just as I have never doubted that the developing countries would make whatever sacrifices were necessary to win their war on poverty and poverty of opportunity, so I still do not doubt that the wealthier nations will continue to be firm allies in that fight. The fact that UNDP resources for 1970 will be the largest for any single year in the history of the United Nations encourages us to believe that before too long we will be in a better position to meet a greater number of legitimate requests for assistance from the United Nations system.

The case for speeding development is strong and good, for it is the case of all mankind and surely must succeed. Indeed, if it is argued effectively—with cold facts, yes, but also with warm and generous emotion—then, Mr. President, I think it can hardly fail. No greater task faces us as we confront the second development decade—a period which could see the greatest forward surge that the community of man has ever known toward the goal of equal opportunity for every child born on this planet.

BOSTON COLLEGE LAW SCHOOL PAPER WRITES ABOUT S. 9

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on January 15, 1969, I introduced S. 9, a bill to create a commission to compensate victims of crime in certain areas under Federal jurisdiction.

On October 31, 1969, Sui Juris, the newspaper of Boston College Law School, published an informative discussion of the bill, which I think will be of interest to the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that the article, entitled "Victims of Violent Crimes," written by Bruce Chasan, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VICTIMS OF VIOLENT CRIMES

(By Bruce Chasan)

"A violent crime against the person occurs—perhaps assault, murder, or rape or malicious disfiguration—and the attacker is apprehended. What takes place? The attacker may receive legal counsel, psychiatric examinations and treatment, hospitalization, food, clothing, and even vocational training or an education—all paid for by the State. Yet the victim, whose life may have been turned to chaos or even destroyed by the crime, will more than likely be ignored. The only way he can collect reimbursement for medical bills, lost wages, or other expenses is to sue his attacker—a process which brings highly dubious results."

With the above words, Senator Ralph Yarborough (D. Texas) introduced S. 9, the "Criminal Injuries Compensation Act of 1969." (15 January 1969 Congressional Record, p. 793.) To date it has not seen any action.

The bill would create a commission to handle the claims of the victims of violent crimes residing in the District of Columbia and other federally administered territories. In turn, the commission would be able to award up to $25,000 in compensation. Such an award would not be construed to have any bearing on the guilt or innocence of an accused suspect.

Sen. Yarborough has been concerned for some time about this paradox of American justice whereby the rights of the criminal are zealously guarded while the innocent victim gets nothing. "When society fails," the Senator says, "in its assumed duty to protect its citizens, society ought to have the responsibility of compensating the innocent victim for his personal gain and injury."

Five states—Massachusetts, California, New York, Maryland, and Hawaii—have enacted legislation of this type.

THE PRESIDENT AND CBW

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the whole world had cause to rejoice last week when President Nixon announced that the United States would renounce the use of lethal biological weapons and the first use of lethal and incapacitating chemical weapons. The President also announced that he would submit for Senate ratification the Geneva protocol of 1925, which prohibits the first use of poison gases and bacteriological weapons.

It is significant that President Nixon has taken these initiatives just as the Soviet-American strategic arms limitation talks are underway. I hope that his decisions on chemical and biological warfare will herald a new era, when nations, understanding the futility of mass destruction, will mutually agree to limit the weapons they possess.

THE DEAN OF HARVARD GOES SOUTH

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Parade magazine supplement of the Birmingham News and other Sunday papers of November 30, 1969, contains an interesting article entitled "The Dean of Harvard Goes South," written by Gil Fuchs. It is a story of the work of John Monro, who, in the spring of 1967, left his position as dean of Harvard College to become director of freshman studies and an English teacher at Miles College, an unaccredited, all-black college in Birmingham. Because I believe that Senators and other readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will find this a most interesting story, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEAN OF HARVARD GOES SOUTH

(By Gil Fuchs)

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.—In the spring of 1967, John Monro, then 54, Dean of Harvard, Americas richest, oldest and most prestigious college, announced he was leaving to go to Miles College, an unaccredited, all-black school here.

It is a long way from Cambridge to Birmingham—but it is even farther from Harvard to Miles. Harvard has 13,000 predominantly white students who represent the most educated and elite student body in the country. It boasts a faculty of 7000, and an endowment of more than $1 billion.

Miles has 1100 black students, a faculty of 70 and an endowment of $300,000.

Why did Monro leave his position as Dean of Harvard College to become director of freshman studies and an English teacher at Miles?

For Monro the answer is simple: "Miles is the way of the future as far as this country is concerned. The future of education is not at highly selective colleges like Harvard or Yale but here at Miles where we admit everyone with a high school diploma. And the kids in the bottom half of the class do well. This tells me that there are many kids, all across the country, who can do well in college but who aren't getting the chance.

"Harvard and Yale are caught up in some categorical game of numbers and grades. The individual never gets a chance. This problem is most tragic and urgent in the black community."

MISSED OPPORTUNITIES

The silver-haired Monro is quick to cite that only 15 percent of black youth in the South actually attend college. The figure for whites is 50 percent.

"This means," he explains, "that some 75,000 black young men and women each year, with college ability, do not get to college simply because they are black.

"We can do a hell of a lot for these kids, and the proof is going to come at Miles."

Monro directs freshman studies and teaches two freshman English courses at Miles, where his is not an easy job. Alabama spends about $400 a year per pupil, and as a result, freshmen at Miles, having completed their first 12 years of school, possess on the average the language and math skills of ninth-graders.

"I like teaching and working with the curriculum," Monro says. "I figured that one contribution I could make would be to make English teaching and reading simple and functional."

Monro credits his ability as an English teacher to his training as a journalist. After graduating from Harvard in 1935 (where he started a rival paper to the established Crimson), he began a stint as a newspaper reporter on the old Boston Transcript. He served as an officer in the Navy during World War II. After the war he "took six months off, wrote the great American novel, tore it up, and went to work at Harvard as assistant director of veterans' programs.

RAPID ADVANCEMENT

He soon progressed to assistant to the provost and then to director of financial aid.

In 1957 President Nathan Pusey asked Monro to become Dean of Harvard College. His duties included overseeing many student activities, ranging from dormitory and athletic programs to academic standards and discipline.

Monro's journey to Miles began in 1962 when Harvard sent him to Miami to observe a meeting of an association of black teachers. It was there that he met Dr. Lucius Pitts, the black president of the association who had just become president of Miles. Pitts invited Monro to visit Miles and he did so in the summer of 1963.

The next summer Pitts invited Monro down to run a summer skills workshop. During the next school year Monro says he "was putting in every free minute and then some down here at Miles."

Monro realized he had to make a choice. "This was the time that tensions were rising in the Harvard community. Berkeley had just happened and I realized I just couldn't do both. I had to make up my mind.

"After that it was simple. I decided to drop Harvard. My job there didn't relate to what I wanted to do, namely opening up equal opportunity. Miles was doing it; Harvard wasn't."

Monro says he knew time was growing short. "I'm 56," he says, "I'm in the cancer and heart attack range. If I want to do anything, I've got about ten years. I'm old enough to know that you can't change the world, but you can give it a heave."

THE MONEY TRAP

Monro says he enjoyed his stay at Harvard but has no time for "sentimental reprises."

"Our society has a great many traps," he says. "Once you start orienting your life around the expectations of pay, family, neighborhood, swimming pools, status, then you're done—you've given your life over to the trap.

"Havard is a great fur-lined trap—it's one of the best. But that's a lousy way to decide how you're going to spend your life. It's what you do with your hours that's important."

Monro has received a number of letters from older college professors and administrators telling of their dissatisfactions and asking his advice. "I tell them to come on down, the water's fine," he says.

Living and teaching in the black community of Birmingham, says Monro, has brought him closer to the realities of American life.

WORKING STUDENTS

Most of the students at Miles come from poverty-ridden homes. Sixty percent of the students' families make less than $5000 a year, and 70 percent make less than $6000. By contrast, 80 percent of college students in the U.S. at large come from families with incomes above $6000. Only 3 percent of Miles students can afford to pay all their expenses, $700 for tuition and $700 for room and board. Most of them have to work 40 hours a week in addition to going to school.

Miles is only one of 89 black colleges which together produce over half of all black college graduates every year. Monro sees these colleges as a necessity. "Fifteen years after the famous Brown desegration decision, only 2 percent of the undergradautes in big publicly supported universities are black students. It is a dismal record and it is not going to get better in a hurry.

"Black colleges are here to stay because, poor as they are, they are performing a critical function as educational institutions and as centers of community strength."

The need for Miles is clear. Jim Williams, young, black, Columbia-educated assistant to the president, points out: "Birmingham is 40 percent black. There are four institutions of higher learning in Birmingham and Miles is the only black one. If Miles closed, 90 percent of the black kids in Birmingham could just forget it."

Miles also serves as a vital center of strength for the black community. It has brought a number of government programs to the black community including Vista, Head Start and the manpower program. In addition, it has started programs to erase adult illiteracy and to assist black elected officials.

"We have a serious awareness of what Miles means to the black community," Monro says. "Institutional strength is easy to take for granted in white society where there are many big institutions like Harvard and General Motors. But in the black community, where there are very few of them, Miles becomes very important."

Founded in 1907, Miles was, until Pitts' time, a very small conservative, church-oriented school dedicated to turning out, as one student says, "teachers and preachers."

Pitts came to Miles and in eight years doubled the student body, increased the annual budget from $300,000 to $2.7 million, added five new buildings and recruited people like Monro.

Like many other black colleges, Miles' foremost problem is economic survival. "We have very little endowment, very little inflow from students and no other solid constituency from which to obtain additional funds," development officer Denny Reigle, a white graduate of the Harvard Business School, points out.

STRINGS ATTACHED

"Most government and foundation money comes with strings attached for special programs. Outside of that our only two constituencies are the alumni and the local corporate community. The alumni have increased their giving from $4000 to $46,000 in the past five years but other segments of the community have not been equally responsive."

Many of Miles' other problems find their roots in the college's financial straits.

The problem of accreditation is one example. The sole reason for Miles' lack of accreditation is it lack of financial resources. But foundations won't consider it for substantial grants until it is accredited.

Recently the foundations and the federal government have stepped up their support for black higher education. "But," Dean Richard Arrington notes, "all that new money is not going to black colleges which have been struggling to educate the black man for years. It is going to white institutions like Yale and Harvard."

IN TRANSITION

The clash between Miles' conservative, church-oriented past and the rising tide of black consciousness has brought it another set of problems.

"Black colleges are in transition," Arrington says, "we're no longer trying to ape white colleges. We're helping to accelerate the student's appreciation of black culture."

One of the first questions that arises is the role of Monro and other white faculty. There are no white students at Miles and until Pitts became president there was no white faculty. Now about 30 of the school's 70 teachers are white.

Monro realizes his limitations at Miles. "I couldn't be president of this place, I couldn't be dean. But I think there is a fine opportunity for white teachers to make an effective contribution in a subordinate role."

The key to Miles' future will be its ability to attract good young black faculty who will stay. White institutions have made this difficult. They continually outbid Miles for young black Ph. D.'s to staff new black studies programs.

ACCEPT CHALLENGE

The things that brought Monro to Miles have brought others. The young white faculty includes a Rhodes scholar, Harvard-trained lawyers and graduates from several Ivy League schools. The older white faculty includes the former chairman of the philosophy department at Smith.

Perhaps the greatest sacrifices have been made by young black men like Arrington, a Ph. D. in biology who turned down a profitable career at a white college to return to Miles, or like Hubert Sapp, a bright Harvard graduate and president of the Afro-American Society there who chose Miles over many more attractive possibilities.

"You know something of great consequence is happening when you can get people like that here," says Monro.

Arrington suggests what it is: "There is a great need for the country to develop institutions which serve the kind of people black colleges do. The experiment that is going on at Miles has to succeed."

"PLAN AHEAD FOR SURVIVAL"—ADDRESS BY ROBERT SARNOFF

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Mr. Robert Sarnoff, president of RCA Corp., has recently delivered a most thought-provoking address on the needs of our society, especially in the public sector, to plan ahead for survival.

Our civilization is leaping ahead on a geometric scale in development and progress. Accompanying these advances at every stage, however, are problems of increasing magnitude—environmental pollution, population explosion, crime, urban decay, and so forth. These have placed our society uptight. Unless we begin to resolve these problems rapidly and realistically, room for maneuver will be lost.

For years now the business community has led the way in developing and applying advanced measures of planning to help solve current problems and avoid future pitfalls. In order to make this planning meaningful, modern management techniques and technological tools have been developed—operations research, systems analysis, model-building and simulation. To some extent, a few agencies of our Government have sought to follow suit. The results have not been particularly successful, however.

Our failure to utilize these modern tools of management effectively is due primarily to our reluctance to engage in governmental planning, to haphazard legislative techniques, and to the pressures in some instances of special interests. These attitudes may have been tolerable in an earlier, less-complicated era; they certainly are a luxury we cannot afford today.

The world society we live in is in deep trouble. Our environment is threatened with a life-destroying degree of pollution. A population explosion challenges our ability to feed human beings, let alone raise standards of living. Crime, urban decay, ignorance, and disease are lowering the level of tolerance so that sparks of conflict may begin to trigger ever-growing flames of violence.

The time is upon us to think big and to plan boldly for the future. Mr. Sarnoff in his creative address calls upon the public and private sectors of our society to team together to develop a comprehensive systems effort to revitalize the Nation's Capital. He proposes that we plan beyond mere physical rehabilitation and include all facets of life that must be considered as an interrelated whole if successful redevelopment is to occur—housing, transportation, race relations, employment, health, welfare, education, communications, law enforcement, pollution, and so forth.

To those who may question the need to burden other regions of the country with the expense and effort that will be required to revitalize our Nation's Capital, I can only answer that we are in this life together. In addition to the pleasure we would obtain by making our Nation's Capital the symbol and example of what a free society can accomplish, the experience gained in this endeavor will be applicable to all other populated communities in the country. Large-scale financial, social, and esthetic benefits will accrue.

We have now reached the day of reckoning.

In Mr. Sarnoff's view:

> We must decide whether our way of life is worth the necessary commitment to our cities and our environment.

I fully endorse this expression of concern, Mr. President, and would only add that not only may our way of life be threatened, but our very lives themselves.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Sarnoff's address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY ROBERT W. SARNOFF, PRESIDENT, RCA CORP., NEW YORK, N.Y., NOVEMBER 20, 1969

I am delighted to join you. I have followed your earlier conferences with special interest since they have displayed a maximum of self-questioning and a minimum of self-congratulation. Your discussions have nothing in common with the recent New Yorker cartoon showing a long-haired young man tuning his guitar and telling his father: "I wrote this especially for your birthday, Pop. It's about how enlightened American business executives have created a viable economy and a mobile and progressive social structure."

American industry has, in fact, worked wonders in harnessing the resources and technology that power our physical progress. Yet the gulf between private affluence and public want has grown so wide that it is undermining the whole framework of life. Today our concern for the future must be shared even by the cynic who asked, "What has posterity ever done for me?"

The challenge for business is to recognize and adapt to the new conditions or to face eventual discredit and decline. We must develop new managerial techniques and new organizational forms. We require new styles of leadership which will preserve the continuity and vitality of our institutions while shaping them to the processes of change.

The time for revision is growing short. We continue to approach technology and its effects in the same piecemeal, random fashion that has served us in the past. We are not unlike the man falling from the top of the Empire State Building and telling himself as he passes the twentieth floor: "Things seem to be going well so far."

We now have access to the instruments and to much of the knowledge needed to respond to the social and environmental questions raised by advancing technology. These new instruments of information when combined with the rising reservoir of knowledge can form system to solve today's problems and even forecast those which may arise tomorrow. They are the tools with which to shape our future—if only we have the good sense and the firm resolve to grasp them.

There is a growing awareness of the promise of systems planning as a social implement. The Federal Government has encouraged the use of the systems approach in planning projects for its model-cities program. On the state and local levels, there have been other efforts to employ these new techniques. A few years ago the State of California contracted systems studies of crime control, information processing, transportation and waste disposal. Since then, a number of cities have established their own systems-analysis groups to evaluate the projects they commission. In New York, the Rand Institute is working on systems studies of operations in the city's housing, health, police and fire departments.

To date, however, such efforts have been too incomplete in concept, too limited in scope, to prove much beyond the fact that systems planning is a complicated and costly enterprise. We have yet to see a demonstration project of sufficient scale to create a critical mass for real social improvement.

There are reasons, to be sure, why government has lagged in using the new techniques for social ends. The lead time for such programs is long. Public managers are inhibited in long-term planning by periodic changes of administration and by the vagaries of legislation appropriations. In its social works, government does not face the same competitive stresses that force most businesses to undertake major investments for long-range growth. Any private corporation whose development programs were limited to four-year periods would suffer a severe, if not fatal, handicap. However, the pressures on government will increase in the years immediately ahead, as the electorate becomes more concerned about the quality of life in a deteriorating environment.

In the meantime, public administrators face another obstacle—the deep American prejudice against government planning. This has been associated with the arbitrary plans of socialist societies, and contrasted with our romantic dream of the rugged individual taming the wide open spaces of the frontier. Yet the briefest reading of American history reveals examples of planning.

Some of our earliest settlements, from the villages of New England to the town of Williamsburg, were laid out as planned communities. The Constitution itself stands today as the charter of a planned system that has proved its vitality and relevance during two centuries of change. Even the frontier has felt the effect of a major experiment in planning. The Morrill Act of 1862 set up a system of land-grant colleges as the first of a series of research and information programs that have received much of the credit for the productive miracle of American agriculture.

The problem, in short, is not so much a lack of precedent as a lack of spokesmen for the planning point of view. The business corporation, with its emphasis on problem solving and the pragmatic approach, certainly is in a position to fill the role of advocate. In the past few years, increasing numbers of business firms have developed long-range planning for their marketing, manufacturing and other operations. Surveys have shown, however, that the use of computer procedures in such efforts is largely devoted to arithmetical calculations rather than managerial decision models. Nevertheless, the trend is toward more sophisticated approaches to business planning.

At RCA, as an example, our management information systems are maturing as essential implements in all our activities. We are employing computer systems in designing and producing electronic devices, in evaluating new business opportunities, in financial and total business planning and many other complex functions. As more firms develop such procedures, their experience should prove useful in applying the systems approach and long-range planning to social problems.

Business even now can do much to dispel the prevailing mistrust and misunderstanding of the new techniques. We can, for example, correct the notion of planning as an attempt to impose a rigid outline on the future and to make reality conform to it. This is, indeed, a primitive idea of today's systems methods.

The fact is that a workable plan must be an open-ended system designed to allow for all foreseeable contingencies, for changing conditions and for feedback from all the interests affected. There is good reason to believe that by projecting alternatives, it encourages hard thinking about values and priorities. It should stimulate rather than inhibit debate and involvement.

It is even possible that long-range planning with wide public participation would strengthen the democratic institutions that lately have come under such sharp attack. As John Gardner has observed, "there can be nothing more healing for men than to participate directly in the reshaping of institutions that no longer enjoy their confidence."

The question, at any rate, deserves to be carefully considered and put to a serious test. The systems approach to social problems is likely to be so complex in conception that its value can only be proved on a grand scale. Its execution, furthermore, would require the time, effort and financing that can only be provided with wide public understanding and commitment. By way of analogy, it is worth recalling that polio was once a national scourge. President Roosevelt then placed the full weight of his prestige behind the "March of Dimes" to mobilize the public support and the scientific dedication necessary to conquer the disease. Similar efforts have been mounted in the Tennessee Valley Authority, which revitalized an entire region; the Marshall Plan, which is credited with saving Western Europe from Communist domination, and most recently the American space program, which within a decade developed the technology to put men on the moon.

We are now confronted with a challenge at least as urgent as any of these.

The time has come for a demonstration project to determine whether the techniques that have succeeded in other fields can be applied to the urban and environmental crises. The business community should take the lead in suggesting and participating in an appropriate test.

A full-scale pilot program will be needed. I propose a complete and systematic rehabilitation of Washington, D.C., and the National Capital Region as a most logical choice.

The Capital belongs to all our people. A comprehensive systems effort to revitalize the city and its environs should invoke a nation-wide response—a response as broad and enthusiastic as that inspired by the Apollo moon landing. As the seat of government and a major news-making center, Washington commands the kind of attention that a project of this nature would require and deserve.

To underline the national significance of such a program, the first phase might be scheduled for completion in 1976 to coincide with our nation's celebration of its two-hundredth anniversary.

Washington was founded as a planned city, but has long since fallen heir to all the ills of our unplanned society. It differs fundamentally from other metropolitan centers. Its principal employer is the Federal Government, it is governed by Congress, and its officials are appointed by the President.

In recent years, more thought has been devoted to the physical planning of the Capital—including a regional plan for the year 2000—than to any other American city. Earlier this year Washington planners presented a systems study for a model designed to provide forecasts of future regional population and employment. Thus the Capital not only faces the need but has laid some of the groundwork for a comprehensive and systematic approach to the urban crisis. It now stands ready for a large-scale program of regeneration that would go beyond physical planning and cut through the whole tangled maze of interacting problems in housing, transportation, race relations, employment, health, welfare, education, communications, law enforcement, air and water pollution. Such a project would draw on all the most advanced techniques of operations research, systems analysis, model-building, simulation and long-range planning.

Any effort to provide a meaningful test of these methods must be made on a large and comprehensive scale. The lead times, therefore, will be long and the costs will be high—just how high can be determined only after detailed study. To assure continuity, the full funding should be earmarked by Congress at the outset and carefully phased over the years. The program could be placed under the administration of existing planning agencies, which should be strengthened in authority and broadened in capability to deal with all phases of the region's future. These agencies, working together on a contractual basis, would draw on the services of managers and specialists from government, the universities and industry, as well as those agencies, both public and private, with special knowledge of urban problems. Above all, the program should be designed to assure the representation and active participation of all major segments of the communities involved.

We must expect that an effort so experimental in nature and involving so many varied interests and disciplines will have its failures as well as its successes. Even allowing for setbacks, however, the costs should be far outweighed by the gains. One of the first benefits of a systems analysis of the Capital region would be an auditing of the real costs, in terms of taxes and lost revenues, of an impaired environment. As the program progressed, it would provide an immense inventory of new knowledge and new methods that could be applied to other beleaguered cities across the nation. As an example, the difficult task of building a computer model of a metropolitan complex as large and important as the Washington region would alone spin off enough new information to mark a significant advance in the understanding of urban problems. Professor J. W. Forrester of the M.I.T. Sloan School of Management, who has pioneered in experimental urban models, has already concluded that "the intuitive solution of the problems of complex social systems will be wrong most of the time." Most important, perhaps, a project of the magnitude we are considering would generate new working relationships between the political leaders who manage our cities and the systems planners who help them manage more effectively.

It has been said that if you do not think about the future, you cannot have one. Today we must not only think but also act on a future that is bearing down on us at breakneck speed. It has been estimated that in the next thirty years we must double the physical plant of our cities to accommodate the growth of population and the continuing migration from the countryside. We must, in other words, achieve in a single generation what our forebears struggled to accomplish in three hundred years.

As Lincoln said, "new problems demand new methods for new solutions." Today we require new styles of leadership at every level of our undertakings, public and private alike. We must recognize that the need is not in some reassuringly dim future. It is now. The manager we seek, to borrow Bruce Palmer's apt phrase, is a "specialist in generalizing." He relies less on specific knowledge than on an understanding of the complex relationships within organizations and among disciplines. He must encourage a work climate conducive to creativeness and growth. He must shape administrative structures that are flexible, decentralized and designed for particular tasks. He distinguishes sharply between freedom and free-wheeling and is sensitive to developing social needs—from the inner city to the emerging country. He is receptive to new ideas including those that may question the most basic premises of the conventional wisdom.

Such people can be found today in the ranks of business, government, and education—but their talents may too often be engaged in narrow fields or on matters which do not demand immediate attention. We must bring them forward now if we are to mount a bold and innovative attack on the hard problems that face society. We must continue at the same time, in the classroom and the conference room, to develop an increasing supply of such leaders for tomorrow.

The development of such leadership through motivation, education and experience is a primary concern of this conference, and I am confident that new light will be shed on the problem, to the benefit of all of us. For over the years, Americans have demonstrated a genius for social inventiveness and cooperation. We now face one of the great tests of our history—to restore and reinvigorate the whole framework of life while preserving our traditions as a democratic, humanistic and open society. Winston Churchill once observed that we shape our cities and they shape our way of life. While the cities shape our life, we are failing to shape our cities.

We have now reached the day of reckoning. We must decide whether our way of life is worth the necessary commitment to our cities and our environment. I am convinced that Americans, especially our young people, possess the mind and motivation to undertake such a commitment. I also believe that, despite the gloomy forecasts to the contrary, we will have future generations.

I hope history will look back on the '60's as the decade we defined the social crisis.

I trust the '70's will be the decade we took action to solve it.

The time to predict has passed. It is now time to decide and act.

WAITING FOR A BREAK FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, The International League for the Rights of Man, an affiliate with the United Nations, is presently being directed by a Mr. Roger Baldwin. Recently, the league sent out a bulletin which states quite clearly the present state of human rights. Mr. Baldwin commented:

It is hardly necessary to note the low state of United Nations activity or morale in the field of human rights generally, due largely to the weakness of international authority in the face of nationalism, cold war and an undiminished arms race. The U.N. efforts for law, against colonialism in Africa, against racism and for refugees continue at the General Assembly session, mainly devoted to old items. One gets the impression of established machinery marking time, waiting for a break.

This "low state of United Nations activity" to which Mr. Baldwin refers is demonstrated in his discussion of the United Nations Subcommittee Against Discrimination and for the Protection of Minorities. He stated:

The source of much U.N. effort for human rights lies in the Sub-Committee Against Discrimination and for the Protection of Minorities, which reports to the Human Rights Commission. In theory it represents individual experts; in practice it is like others, representative of governments. But it conducts useful studies of all sorts of discrimination and draws up principles and declarations following reports of its expert rapporteurs. This year it considered one suggested originally by the League, discrimination in the administration of justice. The declaration of principles and its interim report should be followed next year by a completed draft covenant.

A slight move has been made to get consideration of some of the grossest violations of human rights by giving the Sub-Commission the right to examine patterns of persistent violations inside countries, but only with the consent of their governments. Obviously this is a pretty feeble measure, illustrative of the sensitivity to nationalistic pride. New studies were authorized on slavery, which still afflicts parts of the world, and on how economic and social rights are faring.

Consideration of the rights of minorities, embodied in the Sub-Commission title was as usual deferred. Indeed no agreed definition of what is a minority exists. The Sub-Commission concluded its session just prior to the opening of the Assembly.

Mr. Baldwin's remarks are not encouraging, to say the least. Although the United Nations Subcommittee Against Discrimination and for the Protection of Minorities did move somewhat in the consideration of human rights, this movement cannot be measured substantially by any stretch of the imagination. It would seem a fair judgment that the "established machinery" is "marking time, waiting for a break."

Why should not the United States provide that needed break? The record of this Nation in ratification of human rights conventions is one of the worst in the world. Would not a movement by the United States toward recognition of an international level of the basic human rights of all men be a substantial lift in the prestige of the human rights movement? I think it would. I therefore urge this Chamber to consider and ratify the Human Rights Conventions on Political Rights for Women, on Forced Labor, and on Genocide.

CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1969

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, of which I am a member, has made its report to the Judiciary Committee on S. 30, the Organized Crime Control Act of 1969. S. 30 consists of 10 substantive titles derived from some eight separate bills introduced by Senators on both sides of the aisle. Its provisions are designed to correct several defects in the evidence-gathering process which are especially troublesome in organized crime cases, to limit defense abuse of pretrial proceedings to extend Federal jurisdiction over major cases of gambling and corruption, to curb organized crime infiltration of legitimate organizations, and to authorize extended sentences for special offenders.

The bill incorporates the best recommendations of the President's Crime Commission, the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, the American Bar Association Project on Minimum Standards of Criminal Justice, the Model Penal Code, the Model Sentencing Act, and witnesses who represented the National Council on Crime and Delinquency, the Association of Federal Investigators, the New York County Lawyers Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the New York State Commission of Investigations, the National Association of Counties, the National Chamber of Commerce, and the New York State Bar Association in hearings held by the subcommittee. The Justice Department supports every title of the bill with amendments made by the subcommittee. I would like briefly to discuss certain implications of the organized crime problem and of the measures which S. 30 proposes for dealing with that problem.

One of the most disturbing aspects of organized crime today is the fact that its preponderant impact is upon those least able to pay the price that organized crime exacts: the urban poor. As President Nixon stated in his organized crime message to the Congress of April 23, 1969:

> The most tragic victims [of organized crime], of course, are the poor whose lack of financial resources, education and acceptable living standards frequently breed the kind of resentment and hopelessness that make illegal gambling and drugs an attractive escape from the bleakness of ghetto life. (Message from the President of the United States Relative to the Fight Against Organized Crime, H.R. Doc. No. 91–105, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (April 23, 1969).)

Organized crime bleeds those citizens in an insidious variety of ways. Its most obviously predatory method is the promotion of the use of "hard" narcotics, which, as the President's Crime Commission has documented, are imported and distributed wholesale by national crime syndicates.—President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, "The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society" 218, 1967. The end points of that system of drug distribution are found primarily in the low-income neighborhoods of our major cities. The addicts themselves, of course, suffer untold agonies of body and mind. The New York Times has reported evidence that, in New York City, heroin use killed 700 persons, including 170 teenagers in the first 10 months of this year.—New York Times, October 23, 1969, page 51, column 2. Heroin now is the leading single cause of death among persons 15 to 35 in New York City.

The harm done in the ghettos by the promotion of hard drug use reaches beyond the addicts to the vast majority, the honest, decent citizens. One of the causes of violence in our major cities is the failure of the authorities to crack down on those who traffic in narcotics. Addicts, desperate for money to support their habits, commit a large proportion of all crimes against person and property and, as the President's Crime Commission stated:

> One of the most fully documented facts about crime is that the common serious crimes that worry people most—murder, forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, and burglary—happen most often in the slums of large cities. President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, "The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society" 35 (1967).

Society as a whole cannot, in justice, close its eyes to that ghetto crime. We must recall the words of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders:

> Two facts are crucial to an understanding of the effects of high crime in racial ghettos; most of these crimes are committed by a small minority of the residents, and the principal victims are the residents themselves. . . .
> As a result, the majority of law-abiding citizens who live in disadvantaged Negro areas face much higher probabilities of being victimized than residents of most higher income areas, including almost all suburbs. . . . (Report at 134–35 (1968).)

While the exploitation of disadvantaged groups may be most obvious where addiction and resulting street crimes are involved, that exploitation takes other forms, equally subversive, of the struggle of minorities for dignity and fulfillment. Ubiquitous numbers and booking offices, often operated directly by syndicates, drain the meager assets of the urban poor by cultivating the illusion of a chance for wealth. Furthermore, as President Nixon has stressed:

> Organized crime is increasing its enormous holdings and influence in the world of legitimate business. (Message from the President of the United States Relative to the Fight Against Organized Crime, H. Doc. No. 91–105, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 1 (April 23, 1969).)

One of the principal means of that expansion is "foreclosure" on debts to loan sharks, and the small, marginal, local businessman in the concentrated areas of the urban poor is a primary victim of organized crime loan sharking. These and other organized criminal enterprises yearly take large sums from their direct victims and, by raising prices on necessary commodities and services, plunder the funds of all slum residents.

Organized crime views corruption of police and other officials, which the President's Crime Commission found to be common in areas marked by organized crime, as a means of protecting its profitable operations. The Congress, however, must recognize that corruption represents a distinct evil, one which is especially abhorrent to our national values. Police officials whose dedication to our laws has been sold out are ineffective not only in curbing organized crime; they have forfeited their initiative and opportunity to fairly and fully enforce laws involving all segments of society. Dr. Martin Luther King wrote in 1965:

> The most grevious charge against municipal police is not brutality, although it exists. Permissive crime in ghettos is the nightmare of the slum family. Permissive crime is the name for the organized crime that flourishes in the ghetto—designed, directed and cultivated by the white national crime syndicates operating numbers, narcotics, and prostitution rackets freely in the protected sanctuaries of the ghettos. Because no one, including the police, cares particularly about ghetto crime, it pervades every area of life. (King, Beyond the Los Angeles Riots: Next Stop The North, Saturday Review, vol. 48, p. 34 (Nov. 13, 1965).)

A society in which organized crime and corruption openly flourish cannot foster morality or order among its members. A pattern of "successful" organized rackets, with the lesson it teaches slum children who see hardworking and honest adults fail economically in the face of racial and educational barriers, is not uncommon in urban areas, according to the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders:

> With the father absent and the mother working, many ghetto children spend the bulk of their time on the streets—the streets of a crime-ridden, violence-prone, and poverty-stricken world. The image of success in this world is not that of the "solid citizen," the responsible husband and father, but rather that of the "hustler" who promotes his own interests by exploiting others. The dope sellers and the numbers runners are the "successful" men because their earnings far outstrip those men who try to climb the economic ladder in honest ways.
> Young people in the ghetto are acutely conscious of a system which appears to offer rewards to those who illegally exploit others, and failure to those who struggle under traditional responsibilities. Under these circumstances, many adopt exploitation and the "hustle" as a way of life. This pattern reinforces itself from one generation to the next, creating a "culture of poverty" and an ingrained cynicism about society and its institutions.

Among the most threatening implications of the failure of our actions to rebut that cynicism is the suggestion of the Riot Commission that the high ghetto crime rate "not only creates an atmosphere of insecurity and fear throughout Negro neighborhoods but also causes continuing attrition of the relationship between the Negro residents and police. This bears a direct relationship to civil disorder." Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders 135, 1968. We must hear that warning. We must try to relieve the unfair burden upon slum residents, and the intolerable strain upon the fabric of our society, imposed by organized crime and corruption.

Of course, to agree upon that goal is not the same as to reach it. In view of our imperfect knowledge of the factors in causation and prevention of crime and our complex procedures for identifying and dealing with criminals, it is difficult to formulate laws which will be effective against organized crime. Furthermore, the subject of criminal law is circumscribed by constitutional rules depending upon fine distinctions and subtle analysis. We have set no easy task for ourselves.

Nevertheless, the nature and urgency of this problem demand prompt action, whenever constructive proposals can be made. President Nixon sounded the call:

As a matter of national "public policy," I must warn our citizens that the threat of organized crime cannot be ignored or tolerated any longer. It will not be eliminated by loud voices and good intentions. It will be eliminated by carefully conceived, well-funded and well-executed action plans. . . . Success also will require the help of Congress. . . . (Message from the President of the United States Relative to the Fight Against Organized Crime, H.R. Doc. No. 91-105, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (April 23, 1969).)

An example of such a constructive measure may be title IX of S. 30, on racketeer influenced and corrupt organizations. That title adapts the remedy of forfeiture, and the equitable remedies long used for economic ends in the antitrust laws, to the problem of organized crime infiltration of legitimate organizations. In urban ghettos where "black capitalism" offers hope for local self-advancement, title IX may be a means to excise syndicate-infiltrated businesses which use force to eliminate local competition and then charge extortionate prices for staple commodities and services.

While the other titles of S. 30 approach the organized crime problem in a variety of ways, each of them is the product of a long, painstaking process of bipartisan development by the subcommittee with the help and support of the Justice Department. I sincerely believe that the entire bill demands and deserves detailed and thoughtful consideration by the Judiciary Committee and then by the Senate. Areas for improvement may exist; but the bill as a whole is a careful attempt to accommodate the public interest in effective law enforcement with individual rights in a specific and complex area of criminal law. As we consider the bill, broad calls for "law and order," like bare invocations of "preferred rights" of individuals, would be inadequate guides for action. We must consider each of the 10 substantive titles with open minds as to possible improvements, while not losing sight of our broader mandate, challenge and opportunity to enact effective legislation in this area.

In view of this tragic and growing influence of organized and other crime upon our society, the welfare of all Americans—especially those most disadvantaged—requires that we seize every opportunity to improve the efficiency and fairness of our criminal laws. I believe that S. 30 is a thoughtful and sound vehicle for such action and urge that it be given prompt, sophisticated and constructive consideration. The people of our Nation deserve no less.

HEALTH BUDGET CRISIS—THE REGIONAL MEDICAL PROGRAM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on several occasions in recent weeks I have spoken of the current health budget crisis in the Nation and of our need to provide greater funding for the variety of Federal health programs that are so crucial to the success of our efforts to meet this crisis. At this time, I should like to consider one of the most important of these programs, the regional medical program.

The regional medical program was established in 1965. In essence, the program was designed to achieve—through research, continuing education, and training—a marked improvement in the care of patients with heart disease, cancer, stroke, and related diseases. It was hoped that the program would develop better methods for the exchange of information among those involved in the delivery of health care in medical schools, medical centers, community hospitals, and other health institutions and organizations.

Since 1965, 55 regional medical programs covering the entire country have been established, and an unprecedented number of participating physicians, medical schools, medical centers, hospitals, State and city agencies, and voluntary health organizations have become involved.

I believe that this program represents one of the most potentially fruitful programs we now have to enlist the energies of all elements of the health community. Yet, just at the time when the program is getting well underway, it is encountering serious funding difficulties. In the fiscal year 1969, $83 million was appropriated for the program. In that year, as in several of the previcus years, appropriations were somewhat greater than expenditures, because the administrators of the program understood that the program was in an infant stage. As a result, they funded only the most innovative proposals.

Now, however, the program is beginning to move rapidly. Taking into account the carryover funds, the administration has requested the sum of $100 million for fiscal 1970 under the open-end authorization, in spite of the current budget problems. The House, however, has appropriated only $76 million for the program. This $24 million cutback has severely shaken the confidence of all who have become involved in the program throughout the Nation. I believe that the cutback may cause the progress we have made in many regions to grind to a halt.

In recent weeks, a large number of letters have been written to Senators about the severe impact of the cutback upon particular regional medical programs. At the conclusion of my remarks, I will insert excerpts from 33 letters which have come to my attention. These letters, representing the views of the problem from all parts of the Nation, vividly demonstrate the severity of the present situation.

In my own region, the operation of the tri-State regional medical program in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island may well be sharply curtailed. Dr. Robert P. Lawton, the Deputy Director of the program, has asked:

What will be the effect of the low House appropriation on regions? Suffice to say that if this number is all that is is appropriated, the effect on tri-State will be devastating.

It is my personal judgment, if RMP were to have no more appropriation for 1970 than the House approved for grants, that it would be necessary to shut down some regions in order to keep the others alive. This is my national view. New England is potentially too important as an example of interstate cooperation, including effective coordination of RMP and CHP [Comprehensive Health Planning], not to warrant every possible regionalization dollar.

I believe that these reports from across the country present an appalling picture. I strongly urge that we give full funding to the administration's request for the regional medical program.

In the Nation as a whole, we now have far more doctors and organizations working together cooperatively in regional medical programs than anyone expected several years ago. We cannot afford to disillusion these people, who have done so much and who have worked so hard for the success of the program.

Mr. President, because of the importance of this issue, I ask unanimous consent that the list of excerpts from letters on the regional medical program be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS ON THE BUDGET CRISIS IN THE REGIONAL MEDICAL PROGRAM

ALABAMA

In Alabama, Dr. Benjamin B. Wells, Program Coordinator of the Alabama Regional Medical Program reports:

"The reduction of funds that would follow from the projected cuts in the Federal budget will emasculate the Regional Medical Program in Alabama.

"In pursuit of our original charge, we have mounted an all-out effort to secure the interest, support and active involvement of health care institutions, groups, individuals and the general public throughout this state. We have carefully avoided giving the notion that we were or should be a major source of funds for the improvement of health services, but we have encouraged a large number of cooperative ventures through the use of our core staff and the establishment of linkages to the University Medical Center in Birmingham. Unless we can press forward at this time, the momentum of two years will be quickly lost.

"Many similar efforts are at the most critical point in their evolution. Our failure to progress at this time may result in years of delay before similar multilateral commitments can be reformulated."

ARIZONA

The Arizona Regional Medical Program, coordinated by Dr. D. W. Melick, will be in severe difficulty:

"For the past two years we have been in the planning phase of our operation. The planning, in order to bring forth the best in grant applications, has been a tedious and time-consuming process.

We are now looking forward to a shift from planning to operational status. We have had approval of the National Advisory Council for certain of our project applications. We are awaiting funding. If this is forthcoming, we expect to go into the operational phase January 1, 1970.

"Failure to fund our program will undermine all of our efforts in careful and meticulous planning. Of more importance, it will disrupt the enthusiasm we have engendered. It will result in a good deal of frustration for the citizens of our State who have assisted us in getting our plans in presentable form. It will delay us from presenting to our citizens, visible evidence of action. Action is certainly necessary to pacify those individuals who may criticize us for a prolonged period of planning."

COLORADO, WYOMING

Dr. Howard W. Doan, who directs the Colorado-Wyoming Regional Medical Program, has also indicated the difficulties if low funding of RMP's occurs:

"At the present time we have nine operational projects. Most of them indicate a healthy growth anticipated for the next two years as a result of increased interest on the part of health professionals in the region and a growing awareness of the potential of the Program.

"In addition, we have six or seven developing projects, five of which are now under review by the National Advisory Council. If our funding is held at the present level, it will be difficult to implement any of these without placing current projects in jeopardy. We have, for example, a comprehensive project in heart disease which has been developed in collaboration with the Colorado and Wyoming Heart Associations. This project will be funded at a most austere level if our budget requests are not honored. I doubt the wisdom of beginning any major project if it cannot be operated properly. We have another project under review which is broad and covers almost the entire field of cancer in children. This project is one of the finest I have ever seen, and our failure to subsidize it will be a shame."

DELAWARE VALLEY

In New England's Greater Delaware Valley Regional Medical Program, Dr. George R. Clammer, its Executive Director, reports:

"We would anticipate that the major effect of the reduction will be to significantly curtail funding of new operational projects. This would occur at a time when we expect the growing involvement within our Region to result in more requests for operational projects. In addition, we already have several approved projects which have not been funded as yet and which may not get off the ground.

"It is likely that these effects will detract significantly from the interest in and enthusiasm for RMP which has developed in our Region as a result of extensive efforts during the past two years."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Here in Washington, D.C., the Metropolitan Washington Regional Medical Program will be prevented from attaining its potential. Dr. Arthur E. Wentz, Program Coordinator reports:

"With almost one and one-half million dollars of unfunded approved proposals for this small Region it is becoming increasingly difficult for the Planning and Program Committee to engender continued interest, much less enthusiasm, in the presentation of additional proposals to afford a comprehensive program defined in the objectives of the law. This is a Region which has capability of presenting such proposals but those sources are no longer willing to sponsor the cost in manpower and dollars to structure these proposals when those approved by the Council go unfunded."

HAWAII, AMERICAN SAMOA, GUAM, MICRONESIA

In Hawaii, Dr. Masato Hasegawa, who coordinates the Program for that state as well as American Samoa, Guam, and Micronesia, states:

"As you know, like other regions throughout the nation, we have been slowly developing a program which would stimulate creativity and the establishment of co-operative arrangements which would lead to better medical care for the region's inhabitants. The program has now reached a stage of development where it has achieved a level of acceptability that is second to no other similar agency in its field. Because of this, more proposals and ideas are coming into the office and more project applications are passing local review with subsequent submission for national review.

"Now, if the House action is indicative of what will eventually be the national funding policy for the near future it will directly affect the implementation of recent project applications, assuming that they pass national review, to the degree that there will be delays in attaining planned goals, or even worse that some goals may never be attained. Further any inability of the region to fund worthy projects will affect the credibility of the program and its representative officials. Lastly, a lot of the time and effort of the last three years devoted to getting people together, talking with one another, exchanging ideas with each other will have been wasted. Additional time and effort together with increased funds will have to be applied before the region once again reaches the present level of efficiency and acceptability."

ILLINOIS

The Illinois program, as Marilyn J. Voss, Public Information Assistant, indicates, has its share of funding problems:

"If RMP does not get a larger budget appropriation—namely that seven IRMP projects approved with a budget of $611,106, will not receive the funds to enable them to be initiated. Thus, the Illinois Regional Medical Program would be operational in name only."

In addition, 14 doctors who have worked extensively in the program all signed a letter stating:

"We regard the inability to support the seven community projects now approved both by the Division of Regional Medical Programs and by the Council of the Regional Medical Programs as nothing less than disastrous. This program was created by action of the Congress, and we as citizens in the State of Illinois were encouraged and urged to work together voluntarily and without compensation to create within the State a vigorous and strong organization capable of carrying the benefits of medical research to the patient. We have spent many hours and days in this undertaking. We are now faced with the prospect of having the Congress withdraw that support which it had assured us would be forthcoming. We should like to emphasize particularly that the seven projects approved are the first ones ever submitted by the Illinois Regional Medical Program to the Division of Regional Medical Programs for funding. Their preparation has involved many months of dedicated work by a large number of our finest citizens."

ILLINOIS AND MISSOURI (BI-STATE RMP)

The Missouri-Illinois Program, known as the Bi-State Regional Medical Program, has made great strides, and Dr. William Stoneman III, who coordinates the Program, reports:

"In two years a great deal of inertia has been overcome in St. Louis and the surrounding region. The two private medical schools are now working closely together. Both are making real community commitments beyond St. Louis which did not exist before. Southern Illinois University, which is in the process of developing a school of medicine, is participating. Project proposals have been approved and initiated to extend medical center capabilities to community hospitals and other groups throughout the region to improve the care available to the patient in his home community.

"At this critical point in time, a decision appears to have been made to cut back substantially on funding to the extent that essentially no funds for new activities will be available during the current fiscal year. The effect of such a policy on local initiative in our region will be very serious. Under those circumstances, the inability of this program to make any significant impact on the capacity of the health care system in the face of the massive federal infusions of money into health care demands (Medicare, Medicaid) is self evident."

INDIANA

Indiana would also suffer, as Dr. Robert B. Stonehill, its Regional Medical Program Coordinator indicates:

"Reductions in the Regional Medical Programs budget made by the House of Representatives, if carried over into actual appropriations legislation, will have a definite dampening effect on the Indiana Regional Medical Program.

"We now have a number of projects in various stages of development. All of them are aimed at regionalization of resources and services. If they are not funded, momentum toward further regionalization will be greatly slowed. Further, the excellent beginning we have made in developing cooperative efforts will deteriorate and the initiation and development of new, worthwhile projects will come to a halt."

IOWA

Dr. George Hegstrom, Chairman of the Iowa Regional Advisory Group, indicates:

"Here in Iowa we have had much success in convincing practicing physicians, hospitals and other health persons and institutions that through the Iowa Regional Medical Program they have an opportunity to effect meaningful changes in Iowa's health care system in a way that is particularly appropriate and acceptable to the Iowa Region.

"A true cooperative spirit has emerged. Smooth and effective mechanisms for making decisions greatly representative of both the medical center and the community level are reaching a high level of development. The stage has been set. What a loss to the people of Iowa if this system for improving the quality of care at the place where people live is left to rot away from its lack of use."

KANSAS

The cooperative effort of Kansas would be weakened, as Dr. Robert Brown, Coordinator of that State's Program shows:

"It is obviously disastrous to provide cooperative efforts for doing things at the Community Level only to have to report back to those groups that the Kansas Regional Medical Program will be unable to provide the financial assistance to carry out these Programs.

"Planning with a capability of doing has contributed greatly to the momentum of the Kansas Regional Medical Program. Fiscal restriction would undoubtedly dampen the enthusiasm of people at the Community Level to spend time and effort in a Program which cannot deliver the rewards for that effort expended."

LOUISIANA

Dr. J. A. Sabatier who directs the Louisiana Medical Program, has eloquently stated the problem of the Louisiana Regional Medical Program:

"The lack of full funding of our initial modest package of operational projects would probably have a devastating effect upon the future effectiveness of not only the Louisiana Regional Medical Program but would probably also have an extremely deleterious effect upon future relationships between the public and private sectors in the health care delivery system. I seriously doubt whether it will be possible to ever again attract the degree of commitment and cooperative endeavor which has been accomplished thus far under RMP guidance. In short, I feel that the deleterious effects of the budget cut will be felt on a much wider base than the RMP Programs alone."

MAINE

In the State of Maine, Dr. Manu Chatterjee, Program Coordinator of the regional medical program reports:

"At the present time, the Core staff of Maine's Regional Medical Program numbers nineteen. Programs for the staff are formulated with the assistance of committees and task forces representing virtually all organizations to include hospital staffs. There is a major input into this program by both the providers and consumers of health services. The number actively involved in the planning process for this region is nearing 400.

"To date, we have been fortunate in having our programs approved; however, we are already feeling the pinch of the heavy financial constraints in the health care field. The following is a list of our present programs:

"Programs funded through September 30, 1970

Core staff grant	$578,807
Regional health agency (Upper Kennebec Valley)	241,745
Smoking control	48,626
Guest resident	36,391
Coronary care	198,462
Physicians' continuing education	76,285

"Programs approved by National Advisory Council, but not funded

Department of community medicine	$92,686
Directors of Medical Education	27,500
Regional cancer program	75,422
Regional library program	43,942

"(Plus appropriate indirect costs.)

"As we are progressing to a more efficient and experienced stage, it is anticipated that funding requirements for programs to increase the quality and distribution of medical care for the residents of Maine will more than double in the coming year.

"In order to maintain the impetus already gained in Maine, it is essential that programs approved by the Regional Advisory Council be funded within the next few months; otherwise, physicians, participating agencies, and all others assisting in the RMP effort will lose interest in project development since meaningful projects cannot be implemented due to lack of funds. We anticipate two more projects will be submitted for the December 1 deadline and would like to think that these projects will also be worthy of funding by the Division. You can see that already we need approximately $250,000 to implement the four programs that have been approved and the two other projects being developed for submission will require an additional $400,000. It is my personal opinion that Regional Medical Programs are just beginning to have an impact on the medical community at large and are making a major contribution to the health care of the nation and to this region in particular.

"Our particular program is presently funded through September 30, 1970, but it would be very helpful to have definite assurance that our present operations will be extended for a few years hence and that the present program will maintain enough flexibility to maintain 'an innovative approach' to health planning."

MARYLAND

The people of Maryland will also be hindered in their efforts to build a strong program, as Dr. William S. Spicer, Jr., the Coordinator reveals.

"We have numerous examples of this development in our Region, i.e., a central regional data and evaluation center, a coordinated development of comprehensive ambulatory care centers in our urban ghettos, which will assure all of the citizens of Baltimore of improved health care within the next 3–5 years, the change in community hospital structure to the corporate image, etc.

"Having established this base over the past three years, the Maryland RMP is now ready to provide solutions to the major health problems. This requires an expanded, not a reduced, budget. It would be a terrible mistake to have expended rather modest amounts of monies, to be ready to go, and then to doom the Program at the moment when it is ready to move into full gear in catalyzing major changes in the health care system. The whole process would have to be reinstituted through some other mechanism. To be frank, I see no other effective mechanism."

MASSACHUSETTS, NEW HAMPSHIRE, RHODE ISLAND (TRISTATE RMP)

The Tri-State Regional Medical Program of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island may well be severely restricted, according to Dr. Robert P. Lawton, the Deputy Director. As Dr. Lawton states:

"What will be the effect of the low House appropriation on regions? Suffice to say that if this number is all that is appropriated the effect on Tri-State will be devastating.

"It is my personal judgment, if RMP were to have no more appropriation for 1970 than the House approved for grants, that it would be necessary to shut down some regions in order to keep the others alive. This is my national view. New England is potentially too important as an example of interstate cooperation, including effective coordination of RMP and CHP, not to warrant every possible regionalization dollar."

MICHIGAN

The State of Michigan's regional medical program will also be in severe difficulty. Here is the report of Dr. Albert E. Heustis, Program Coordinator:

"If these reductions are sustained, it will mean that in Michigan the following programs providing for improved health of the people of the state and which are ready to go will not be funded:

"1. A Comprehensive Health Care Program to serve the "urban poor" with cancer, heart disease, stroke, and related diseases in the vicinity of the Wayne County General Hospital and operated by that institution.

"2. Five interrelated acute stroke projects, including Wayne State University, Detroit General Hospital, Detroit Osteopathic Hospital Corporation, Sparrow Hospital in Lansing and Michigan Heart Association.

"3. A training program for a new type of individual to assist nuclear physicians conducted by the Hackley Hospital in Muskegon.

"4. A program to provide continuing physician education for twelve smaller hospitals by the Blodgett Memorial Hospital in Grand Rapids.

"5. A cardiovascular educational program to improve patient care in the hospitals surrounding the Mercy Hospital at Benton Harbor, conducted by that institution with the cooperation of the University of Michigan through the Wayne County General Hospital.

"All of these proposals have been approved by the Regional Advisory Group as required by Public Law 89–239. Items 2 and 5 above have also been approved but not funded by the Federal Division of Regional Medical Programs. We are advised that the other items are in the process of receiving favorable federal consideration but that for them too, no funds would be available.

"This means that, if the figures recommended by the House of Representatives are enacted without change, the possibility of funding the projects listed above would be prohibited as would the development of additional new projects to provide Michigan people with the improved health envisioned by the Congress when they enacted this legislation. This shattering impact will come at a time when the initial inertia and suspicions surrounding the Regional Medical Program are being overcome, and when people are beginning to trust each other and work together for improved health as a result of the stimulation provided by federal funding."

MISSISSIPPI

In the South the problem is equally severe: Dr. Guy D. Campbell, Coordinator of the Mississippi Regional Program, says that the House action will have the following effects in that state:

"The reduction would cause the program to drop from its leadership position in the stimulation and implementation of new programs to meet old needs to a neutral or at best a "holding" position.

"The program will lose its hard won momentum and most significantly, the confidence of the medical community and others.

"The reduction will have a negative effect on core staff morale and will probably contribute to staff turnover.

"Due to the devastation of Hurricane Camille in southern Mississippi, the State Legislature appropriated ten million dollars for loans and grants to aid in the reconstruction of whole communities in that area of the state. This appropriation and a concurrent shift of funds by many state and private agencies to assist in this rebuilding program has significantly reduced the availability of monies that could have been used for participation in the Mississippi Regional Medical Program.

"If the trend of RMP is toward decategorization and primary care, any reduction in funding would threaten the achievement of this goal.

"Should the Division of Regional Medical Programs be required to make an across-the-board cut in funding for all regions, certain projects already funded at a base minimum could not sustain a reduction without severely compromising their primary objectives of patient care, continuing education, training, etc."

MISSOURI

The Regional Medical Program in Missouri will lose momentum, according to Dr. Arthur E. Rikli, Coordinator:

"The curtailment of funds at this time will result in a serious break in confidence with communities who have been earnestly working toward the development and expansion of services for heart, stroke and cancer patients. Communities such as Sikeston, Lebanon, Joplin and others were anticipating the technical and financial assistance from the Division of Regional Medical Programs to test improved cooperative arrangements leading to regionalization of health services. There will be a serious loss in our momentum to carry out this Program if the Senate does not restore funds cut from Regional Medical Program by the House."

Dr. Harold S. Morgan, Program Coordinator reports that the Nebraska-South Dakota Regional Medical Program probably "will not be able to survive":

"If the Regional Medical appropriation recommended by the House is sustained, the Nebraska-South Dakota Regional Medical Program will not become operational. Four projects have been approved by Council in the sum of $1,017,692. This sum together with the awards approved for 6 other regions will far exceed the amount of new money available.

"The result of the failure to fund our approved projects will be so disastrous to the Nebraska-South Dakota Regional Medical Program that it will not be able to survive, and without survival, the program will not do what PL 89–239 was intended to do when Congress passed the law."

NEW HAMPSHIRE

In New Hampshire, Hamilton S. Putnam, Executive Director of the Program states:

"There is cause for concern that, unless the Senate establishes a higher funding level for Regional Medical Programs above that voted by the House and a Committee of Conference concurs with this larger figure, the national effort of RMP—just now beginning to evidence its potential thrust—will be in jeopardy."

NEW JERSEY

Dr. Alvin A. Florin who coordinates the New Jersey Regional Medical Program says that the cooperative arrangements there will be discouraged:

"Specifically, a decrease or leveling of funding will delay the funding of an operational project already approved which provides for the development of health activities in ghetto areas through assignment of urban health planners to Model Cities programs. New Jersey has nine federally funded Model Cities programs, and the problem of supplying needed medical services to ghetto residents is acute both in quantity and quality of delivery.

"Generally, a decrease or leveling of funding will diminish the impetus of our program by discouraging the development of operational grant proposals. Further, it will discourage cooperative arrangements because of general pessimism regarding the future of the Program."

NEW MEXICO

New Mexico's Program would "suffer a subtle Program deterioration" as Dr. Reginald H. Fitz, its Director, reports:

"Beyond the identifiable or specific negative impact of a 'new funding freeze,' which is what would result if funds are not restored to the Division's budget and a reasonable competition for them re-established, I believe that there would be a more subtle Program deterioration. The New Mexico Program is, I believe, in a very strong growth position. It is receiving increasingly enthusiastic interest and support. The relationship with the University is excellent and cooperative recruiting has succeeded in attracting exceptionally well-qualified professional personnel to the Core Staff and operational projects. If the Program should lose the momentum that it has so recently achieved and were continued progress to be made impossible due to lack of funds, I am afraid that the Program would lose its ability to attract or retain able individuals and would fail to reach the level of significance in relation to the solution of health problems in New Mexico that lies within its conceptual capability. To use an obvious analogy, undernutrition at this point would seriously stunt the growth of what appears to be a very healthy child."

NEW YORK (CENTRAL)

The Central New York Program faces difficulties, as Dr. Richard H. Lyons, Coordinator of the Program, reports:

"The decrease in funds has not paralyzed our present operational approaches but has greatly decreased the enthusiasm that was beginning to be generated among members of the health professions for the Program. In fact, a number of projects which were under consideration have simply been side-tracked because of the lack of funds and others have been approved by the council and have not been developed for the same reason."

NEW YORK (METROPOLITAN)

The gloom surrounding project cutbacks in the Metropolitan New York RMP is reported by Dr. I. Jay Brightman:

"The NYMRMP was recently approved for operational status but cannot be funded as such, because of the cutback. When the applicants heard the news that their projects were approved but unfunded, their reaction was more serious than if the projects had been rejected. In the latter situation, they might have become indignant, but they also might have taken the attitude that a better application might be approved. In the present situation, they have been completely discouraged. It has been a long period since their applications were first drafted, processed through our staff reviews, our technical consulting panels and our RAG to begin the trek up to the National Site Visit, the study by the Review Committee and finally the action by the National Advisory Council on Regional Medical Programs. Having survived all this, they are little consoled with the moral victory and the less than certain chance for future funding.

"The same gloom has spread among all of our Associate Directors in the seven medical schools and the Regional Medical programs operating there. There is little incentive to actively pushing projects fairly well along the course of development when they feel that they do not have an even chance of having highly meritorious work adequately financed."

NEW YORK (WESTERN)

Dr. John R. F. Ingall, Program Coordinator for the Western New York program headquartered in the State University of New York at Buffalo reports:

"In the Western New York Regional Medical Program we already have in effect projects that have identified us highly favorably with the community, not only in our ability to provide continuing education for ALL facets of health allied personnel, but also to upgrade the standard of medical care by devising cooperative ventures.

"Let me be more specific than the foregoing: we have a coronary care training school for nurses, of 6 weeks' duration, which, in my view, is of the highest quality available in this country. It not only provides 6 weeks training for nurses from the didactic and practical point of view but serves as a consultation point and support center for nurses in the entire region. We are producing a caliber of nurse to whom the local physicians will delegate responsibility. The physicians of the region, in turn, enjoy the experience of training within this school and what was originally considered a doubtful training entity has now become one of the most popular of our continuing medical education courses. Nurses in our school have already saved life and in one case resusciated one of our own physicians! The value of this to the program's image alone is fantastic.

"This Program, as you know, has a very large Regional Advisory Group represented by a 24-man Board. The reduction of funds to a Program such as this, which has good identity and major cooperation from the region at large, would be disastrous.

"For the first time in the history of this region we have developed a true consortium of private, V.A., county and university affiliated hospitals that has never before existed.

"Our telephone lecture network links up all these units and permits conference discussion which is logistically impossible, certainly in winter months, and saves a great deal of money in time and human effort in that the entire region can come together through this conference mechanism without leaving their own particular hospital center.

"We have calculated that with the goodwill built up and the voluntary time donated to this Program, the region at large is currently giving 25 cents for every dollar contributed by the federal government, which is not a bad contribution. I anticipate that this will increase in its dimensions and would suggest that if federal monies continue, or indeed are increased, then ultimately we can structure ourselves as an independent and economically viable organization for which federal monies would be unnecessary. The money to bring this about, however, is vital and it behooves us to put the transition into a perspective of time. This cannot be just done in the incumbency of one administration.

"More briefly, should the funds be cut in this area I visualize the following:

"(a) The discontinuation of a superb coronary care training school;

"(b) The dissolution of the first inhalation therapy school for chronic respiratory diseases centered on a community college in this area; a system of true regional support in respiratory diseases available to all communities, small or large, on request which has been a singularly effective support entity to the practicing physicians;

"(c) The education groups in this paramedical sphere, namely dietitians, pharmacists, dentists, hospital administrators, medical record librarians, and a number of others will be unable to continue their accreditation programs via our telephone lecture network, and the upgrading of these groups in their standards and responsibilities will receive a very serious blow.

"If Comprehensive Health Planning is really to get off the ground in this region it needs the support of the Regional Medical Program, for the latter has predominantly been responsible for the surveys and data collection. We are able to perform the latter in that we have not only the university support and that of the local county and state Health Departments but an ever-increasing involvement of the voluntary agencies, the private sector and the hitherto poorly acknowledged consumer group."

OHIO (NORTHEAST)

In Northeast Ohio's RMP, Dr. Barry Decker indicated crippling of that Program:

"We are now functioning on a second year planning grant which expires June 30, 1970. As a result, there have been no immediate effects resulting from the present budget cuts. We are, however, bringing together a series of grant applications to be submitted to the Division, prior to December 1, which summarizes end results from eighteen months of hard work. These requests should include between two and three million dollars per year of grant applications including our subsequent core staff support. It would appear to me that, in the present situation, the Division will have funds for no more than our continuing core staff support, which in effect will cripple the Program in Northeast Ohio."

OHIO (NORTHWESTERN)

Northwestern Ohio's Regional Medical Program is not different, according to C. Robert Tittle, Jr., Coordinator:

"If the House reduction is maintained by the Senate we could expect that of the three proposals which we have now undergoing review, by the Division of Regional Medical Programs, and six (6) proposals which are to be submitted December 1, 1969, for funding, perhaps two of the nine might be funded, but at a greatly reduced rate; we anticipate these two (2) would be funded at a 50 to 60 percent rate. We, also, anticipate that our present six (6) operational proposals will not continue to be funded even at the 75% rate, but at a reduced rate of 60%. You can well understand that we cannot maintain participation or enthusiasm when projects are approved but no funds are available."

OHIO (STATE)

The Ohio State Regional Medical Program fares just as badly, as Dr. Neil C. Andrews reports:

"Much energy by our dedicated core staff has been expended among health professionals within the Ohio State Region in the development of cooperative arrangements. Continuous attempts have been made to indicate to physicians and other health professionals that this is not an attempt by the federal government to take over the practice of medicine. Workshops have been conducted for health professionals and interested citizens; regular meetings have been held for Local Planning Chairmen and Committee Members to acquaint them more thoroughly with the goals and objectives of the Regional Medical Program. Multiple articles have been written and distributed along with newsletters to a wide audience in an attempt to gain better understanding of the Program. All of this patient, methodical, painstaking development of confidence and respectability for the Program is in danger if the Program is seriously retarded."

OKLAHOMA

Dr. Dale Groom, Director of the Oklahoma Regional Medical Program reports:

"As I see it, this major retrenchment in Regional Medical Programs on a national scale is not only a backward step but, more important, it undermines years of planning and effort on the local scene not only by RMP but by all the other health agencies with whom we try to work. There is no question but that Regional Medical Programs were over-sold in the flush of enthusiasm when Congress appropriated sums exceeding those which the infant organization could assimilate. One cannot simply turn on well-conceived and well-planned health programs overnight. Recruiting and training medical manpower requires more time than opening up new offices. At any rate, fledgling RMPs sought out leading citizens and educators to constitute their Advisory Boards; their staff went out to communities throughout their regions to solicit and organize cooperation of local health resources; surveys were made of health needs; medical associations, hospitals, nurses and paramedical personnel were brought into the councils of the brave new endeavor. And now because of cutbacks which could hardly be foreseen, we are unable to follow through on the collaboration and, in many cases, the promises which were extended in good faith. Really, this strikes at the integrity of the whole effort. If we fail now, it will be doubly hard to take up the cause again at the same high level. Moreover, I am sure we will begin to lose our greatest capital of all, namely the quality of leadership and the good name which Regional Medical Programs have built up in their brief ascendency.

"I believe that now it is evident to all of us in RMP that we are at a decisive crossroads, that this year is crucial, that we cannot stand still but must go one way or the other. Actually what we need for success in this health effort is only a tiny fraction of current non-health expenditures of our country. I am hopeful that our national sense of values will prevail and that the support necessary for the success of this most important national resource will be restored."

TENNESSEE

The Tennessee Mid South Program, as Dr. Paul E. Teschan, Director reports, will be in trouble if it does not receive needed funds:

"Five projects amounting to $274,000 are being held in abeyance and options for employment of key personnel are being lost. Since these projects will be activated in the region (as contrasted with projects located in or deriving principally from the university centers in Nashville) this major regional thrust is being blunted, with continuing serious injury to the image of the Program as a regional one.

"The budgetary restrictions coupled with the reports in the press and the speculations in the "Blue Sheet" of which we are all aware have raised an undercurrent of speculation in this region concerning the projected viability of RMP locally and nationally. Among practicing physicians, hospital administrators and the allied health professionals in the region, among whom the tide of interested acceptance of RMP is mounting, we perceive a damaging cynicism concerning the trustworthiness of even this federal program. For the more knowledgeable individuals, who perceive that there is no visible alternative to RMP in linking university centers and the provider structure, a sense of bitterness and incredulity can also be detected. The latter development is particularly underscored when approval for a nuclear aircraft carrier, multiple landings on the moon, and an antiballistic missile system of dubious workability seem to get by relatively easily.

VIRGINIA

For the State of Virginia, Dr. Eugene R. Perez, Director of the Program reports:

"Relative to the reduction of the Regional Medical Programs budget, I believe it is obvious that it will result in definitely curtailed activity of the Program in Virginia. With less money to operate, obviously one will be able to do less. Unfortunately, this will be a strain on all concerned, as it will be necessary to set strict priorities.

The most unfortunate aspect, I believe, is the timing of the budget cuts. I think that all regions have had pretty much the same experience, and I know that it has taken two to three years in Virginia to get the confidence of the various groups, and to establish the necessary cooperative arrangements. We have accomplished the foregoing in Virginia, and now that we are ready to spread out and make the Program effective it will be difficult because of less money. I am afraid that this will blunt the momentum of the Program.

In summary; less money, less Program, less interest, less participation, and less effect upon improved patient care of the citizens in the region."

WEST VIRGINIA

Charles D. Holland, acting Director of the Program in West Virginia reports:

"To answer the question in your recent memorandum of the effect on the West Virginia Regional Medical Program of the House cut in Regional Medical Program funds for 1970, I can only report that we have been recommended for operational status beginning January 1, 1970—but have not been funded. I believe that our entire Program is in jeopardy because of the House action."

WISCONSIN

In the State of Wisconsin, Dr. John S. Hirschboeck reports that:

"The Wisconsin Regional Medical Program has two proposals under review and awaiting funding by the Division of Regional Medical Programs. Each of these will have little chance of being funded if the appropriation bill is passed by the Congress at the level recommended by the House. One of these projects is budgeted at $664,374 for its first year. It is concerned with the development of a comprehensive approach to managing chronic renal disease. It includes support for home dialysis training for patients and their familes and the development of a transplant strategy to provde rapid matching and transplantation within a few hours. The second project will require a first-year budget of $999,229 for the operation of a health profession manpower improvement and expansion program in the Greater Milwaukee area. The purpose of this project is to provide a variety of in-service training experiences for physicians and others to learn new technology and to develop working skills for people who presently do not have them. Both projects have great implication for the improvement of health care in the Wisconsin region. With the limited funds which would be available under the appropriation recommended by the House, these obviously will have little chance of being funded.

The flexibility and readiness of Regional Medical Programs to deal with major health problems are, perhaps, their greatest asset. However, without funds to demonstrate their capability, Regional Medical Programs are apt to fall before they really have had a start."

THE TREATY TRAP—A BOOK BY LAURENCE WELLMAN BEILENSON

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, every once in a while a book comes along that I feel is of such paramount importance that I recommend it to Senators as "must" reading. Such a book is "The Treaty Trap," a comprehensive and definitive history of the performance of political treaties by the United States and European nations, written by Laurence Wellman Beilenson. I would also recommend this book with its unparalleled study of treaties to the representatives and delegates at both the Paris peace conference and the strategic arms limitation talks in Helsinki, since both are concerned with major treaties of our times.

The only book of its kind to recount the operations analysis and breach of treaties during the past 300 years—this documentation is long overdue.

Mr. Beilenson has three major themes. His first demonstrates that alliance treaties, treaties to keep the peace and international guarantees have been alike in their steady breach. Second, in scrutinizing actions to find motives, Mr. Beilenson widens his analysis to embrace the wellsprings of national action—including self-interest and glory of rulers and their supporters. The intriguing third theme shows that even cynical statesmen, while breaking their own promises, have succumbed to treaty-reliance.

"The Treaty Trap" shows that the modern pattern only repeats the ancient. As the story unfolds, the evidence piles up to prove that all major nations have been habitual treaty breakers.

How far should the United States rely on political treaties for aid in war or to keep the peace?

What assumptions about performance or breach of such treaties should the United States make in deciding whether to enter into future treaties?

With these fundamental questions chiefly in mind, Laurence W. Beilenson, a prominent Los Angeles attorney, examines the history of treaties since earliest times. The net result is a highly authoritative, readable, and perceptive work.

A word about the author, Laurence Wellman Beilenson, who brings to this book the benefit of extensive knowledge of history, law, and military science. He is a graduate of Phillips Andover Academy, Harvard College, and Harvard Law School. A veteran of two wars, he was during World War II a commanding American liaison officer with the Chinese Army. Long interested in international affairs and history, Mr. Beilenson devoted 8 years to research in preparing "The Treaty Trap."

REJECTING THE SIMPLE SOLUTION

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I was impressed by a speech delivered recently by Mr. Joseph A. Califano, Jr., at Haverford College. Mr. Califano's experience and understanding of America today are complemented by his clarity of thought and fluency of expression.

Here we have a most perceptive analysis of the domestic situation:

Our Nation is now being presented a host of simple solutions for a series of problems so complex that it is difficult to be sure one is asking the right questions.

He continues:

Of greatest concern is that a large majority of our citizens will be unwittingly seduced by shrewd leaders in and out of government, to believe that simple solutions will work in a complicated society.

The temptation to look for the easy answer—to ignore causes in favor of symptoms, to pronounce rather than explain, to castigate one's opponents in lieu of listening to them, to use slogans in place of logic, to appeal to emotion instead of reason—is always greatest in a time of turbulence and doubt.

The time is already late for our Republic. We cannot afford a dark hour of division and recrimination.

The simple solutions of today will be the problems of tomorrow.

I hope all Americans will reject the simple solution, realizing it represents a shortsighted approach to the present and a disastrous road to the future.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Califano's speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SIMPLE SOLUTION

(Address by Joseph A. Califano, Jr., to the Student Body at Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.)

In May 1964, at Ann Arbor, Michigan, Lyndon Johnson spoke of what, in his time as President, was to become a badly battered dream: his concept of The Great Society. For despite unprecedented legislative achievements at home, our nation was besieged by the Vietnam War and white bigotry, by militant blacks who found intolerable for another day what they had once considered inevitable for a lifetime, by the selfish indifference of an affluent majority and by students whose energetic determination to escape the profound emptiness they saw in their materially prosperous parents and professors was frustrated by the difficulty of putting lasting purpose in their own lives. These elements—with a big assist from modern communications and a skeptical questioning of the social, religious and political values of Western civilization—combined to limit the concept of a Great Society to a legislative reality rather than a human one.

The dramatic moment of this period occurred on March 31, 1968, when Lyndon Johnson, a proud Texan, announced that he would not run for reelection. Historians will argue for decades about the true motivations which drove him to that decision. They were undoubtedly as varied and complex as the man himself. While I am too close to the event to judge it without a large measure of subjectivity, I think there was one underlying factor: his increased and alarmed concern about the bitter divisions which were developing in American society—not just between dove and hawk, but between black and white, city mayor and rural governor, young American and adult establishmentarian.

Whatever the motivation, my desire this morning is not to linger on the reasons for Johnson's decision. My desire is to point out that he had a simple alternative, but one he rejected, quite consciously, as too dangerous in the long run for our country.

In its simplest form—and unhappily, a fashionable one today—Lyndon Johnson could have wrapped the Vietnam War in the Flag to handle his most severe foreign policy problem and he could have called for the silent white majority to quiet the ungrateful black minority for whom (they felt) they had done so much.

His failure to seek those alternatives was not an oversight. My own recollection is distinct in both areas, but before I spoke today I checked with others who were close to him during his Presidency.

On several occasions, there were those who urged the President to wrap the war in the American Flag; in effect, to make it unpatriotic to oppose U.S. involvement in Vietnam. The argument went along the following lines: In every war in this century, World Wars I and II and even in the Korean War, the Administration in power had made the issue almost entirely one of patriotism. The Vietnam War was a difficult, extended and particularly dirty war. Most important, it was being fought in American living rooms every night. The only way to counteract the natural human revulsion was to whip the country to a patriotic fervor and make the war an issue of patriotism.

Lyndon Johnson consistently refused to take that course of action. He was deeply concerned about the cruel injustices of the McCarthy era in the 1950's; some of his friends had been destroyed as human beings during that period. Equally important, he was deeply concerned that such demagoguery would unleash in our nation uncontrollable forces which could bring us to an even more extensive war than the one now being waged in Southeast Asia. In short, he rejected the simple solution.

Johnson reflected essentially the same attitude in dealing with the racial problem. I recall vividly his deep concern that the militant blacks would so offend the white majority that many of the gains in Civil Rights and Poverty legislation would be lost, just as similar gains were lost in the Reconstruction period after the Civil War. I also recall on more than one occasion his deep sense of perplexity and hurt at the apparent ingratitude of the cries for "more and faster now," when our domestic programs were already years ahead of most of the people whom we had been elected to govern. Yet in the end, Johnson chose to pursue the cause of justice for all and again, quite wittingly rejected the simple solution.

To be sure, on both these issues, the President evidenced some human frailty. We are all too familiar with his comment about "Nervous Nellies" and his remark about "cutting and running." That, however, is a far cry from a concerted Administration program to choose the currently fashionable simple solution for short run advantage.

It is this penchant for the simple solution that troubles me about our society today. Our nation is now being presented a host of simple solutions for a series of problems so complex that it is difficult to be sure one is asking the right questions.

Most of you are too young to remember the simple society of the late 40's and 50's. That was the society where Communism was monolithic Stalinism; where black children and teenagers knew their place in "separate but equal schools; where poverty and a full measure of unemployment were considered inevitable, if unfortunate, corollaries of prosperity for the majority; where freedom, and particularly free speech, was often professed but too rarely exercised, where money rather than talent screened students for our best universities.

It was then and is now human nature to seek the easy way out. Such is the kind of choice that all of us, black and white, student and adult, dove and hawk, radical anarchist and conservative are tempted to make every day of our lives. It is not the considered choice that should be made by our nation's leaders whether in government, in business or labor, in university administration, or in student council presidencies.

Let me give a few examples:

First, the war in Vietnam. There is now a concerted movement to wrap the war securely in the American Flag. This course is being pursued so shrewdly that those who oppose the war are in effect being denied the use of our Flag, as government officials and private, well-meaning, hawkish groups urge that the Flag be flown on National Holidays or during peace demonstrations to show support for the war. When a Republican leader of the Senate tells our citizens to fly the Flag that belongs to all of us to indicate support for the President that now happens to be in power, he is as grossly denegating our national symbol, as a radical student who sets it afire with a burning draft card.

The war provides another example of opting for the simple solution. Marshall McLuhan has pointed out that Vietnam is the first war fought not merely on American soil, but in the living rooms of our nation where all citizens can watch five or ten minutes of it every evening. The simple solution is to have high government officials attack the media for its coverage of the war under the charge of biased reporting or irresponsible commentary or photography.

Is not the real question (albeit it more complicated) what this world would be like if the citizens in North Vietnam, Soviet Russia and Red China could see war on their television screens every night? This is not an easy thing to achieve, but if the human revulsion of their citizens would be the same as the revulsion our citizens feel, isn't it a policy worth working toward?

We see the simple solution in other areas of our national life. Crime, for example, is a burning, if not the major, issue in every large city of the nation. Fighting crime is expensive and complicated. It will require not only more taxes, but substantially more sophisticated police, court techniques and prison operations. The simple solution is to propose legislation to overrule Supreme Court decisions protecting the accused. That is far easier than trying to get more taxes to pay for more and better trained policemen, taking on the gun lobby for stricter gun control laws, reforming penal institutions or dealing with some of the root causes like drug addiction and poverty.

It is complicated to reform a state or local court system so that criminals can be tried within a month or two of arrest. It is much easier to propose preventive detention legislation which denies the accused bail and in some cities can result in preventive confinement for months or even years before trial.

By almost any standard of recorded history, our nation is in the midst of a fantastic outpouring of erotic and pornographic literature, motion pictures and plays. It is difficult, as Art Buchwald has put it so well in one of his humorous columns, to find movies on Saturday afternoons to which your children can be admitted. There are more and more newsstands where the reader must plow through dozens of "girlie" or homosexual magazines in order to find Time and Newsweek.

The simple solution is to ban pornography—whatever that means under complicated Supreme Court decisions and First Amendment rights. Even if it is difficult to define pornography, at least tough legislation will scare off some publishers and movie makers in the interim.

It is much more complicated to deal with the question of the movie producer who says: "Nobody goes to see family movies any more. We are only producing what the American people will pay money to see." Isn't it more appropriate to ask why the American people have created an almost insatiable market for sex and violence? Why do erotic movies attract such large crowds? Why do sex-filled books consistently make the best seller list? Why do "girlie" magazines get more and more advertising lines? In short, Americans are making pornography and eroticism a bigger and bigger business. Instead of asking why—an enormously difficult question—we opt for the simple solution: put the seller in jail.

Our economic policies, public and private, abound with simple solutions. The Secretary of the Treasury accepts significant increases in unemployment, now approaching a million, parroting the conventional wisdom that unemployment must go up if we are to stop inflation. Businessmen in concentrated industries, released from the fear of government action that hung over them for the past several years, have recently raced like survivors from a sinking ship to push their prices up and get their piece while there is still some action. Labor leaders quite naturally respond that a five or six percent wage increase means no increase at all. The government, turning to the comfort of traditional concepts of labor negotiations, encourages both by saying it will not interfere with either. Again, this is the simple solution.

Shouldn't we demand that our academic economists and government leaders seek new ways to fight inflation, or eliminate or at least ease the burdens of unemployment for the millions of Americans whom we hurt as we cool off the economy? Hasn't the time come when giant corporations and labor unions must recognize that they operate in a welfare-oriented free economy where the public interest is paramount; and not in the laissez-faire capitalism of the 19th Century where private gain was the basic standard.

Next, the race question, particularly as it affects our educational system. Schools are the current cutting edge of racial tensions in our nation. Here simple solutions abound on all sides. At the college level, some black militants argue for Afro-American Study Centers where students will be the teachers; at other levels they argue for return to segregated schools. The Supreme Court finally recognizing that "all deliberate speed" meant something less than two generations of elementary school children now calls for "immediate desegregation." The Executive Branch adopts a simple policy to appease the white majority by slowing desegregation, in their words "to protect the high standards of public education in the United States." Surrounded by simple solutions are millions of school children in totally inadequate elementary and secondary schools—black, white and integrated.

Finally, the university. An energetic, sophisticated and skeptical college generation has made the American university the focal point for many frustrations of our society. But here again we see simple solutions everywhere. We see militants, who don't like particular types of research, taking the simple route of destroying the facilities and files of professors conducting that research. Legislators propose laws to outlaw protest activities on campuses or to withdraw funds from students who engage in them. Some university professors are beginning to doubt their own legitimacy to teach, merely because their human nature with its inherent fallibility makes it impossible for them to live with unwavering consistency in accord with the precepts they are teaching.

The problems, of course, are much more complicated both in the area of desegregation for our schools and in terms of the function of universities and the relationships of students, teachers, trustees, and alumni in the academic environment. A book could be written on this subject, and since I have done one, I will not linger on it here.

My point—and the point of almost everything I have said this morning—is that America is complex and getting more so every day. I realize that all problems cannot be solved at once and most must be broken down into parts capable of productive action. I ask you to recognize the inherent complexity of our society, the institutions within it and the human beings who run those institutions.

What I see and what I fear about the current trend of our national life-style is not so much that simple solutions will lead to final solutions for some segments of our society, but that simple solutions will hide problems while those problems continue to fester or will lead to even more frustrating dead ends. I fear that crime rates will continue to rise because all of the lessons of history and experience are being ignored in simple-minded legislative proposals, that the Vietnam War will further sour our national life as it is packaged in patriotic oversimplifications, that blacks will turn increasingly to violence as they are told that their fever point of frustration must be endured for another generation or two.

Of greatest concern is that a large majority of our citizens will be unwittingly seduced by shrewd leaders in and out of government, to believe that simple solutions will work in a complicated society. Most disturbing is that these things are not just happening in America today. They appear to be part of a carefully orchestrated campaign which eventually may make many Americans look back with surprising nostalgia to the tumult of 1968.

If there is any message in my book on the Student Revolution it is that we are dealing with some complicated problems at a most critical time in our history. The concept of the Great Society was not one of a simple society. In the words of its author, The Great Society, like The New Frontier, was "not a safe harbor, a resting place, a final objective, a finished work. It is a challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor."

RECLAMATION FOR THE 1970's

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, the Assistant Secretary for Water and Power Development, Hon. James R. Smith, recently gave what I consider to be one of the best definitions of reclamation I have heard. Speaking at the National Reclamation Association Convention in Spokane, Wash., Secretary Smith took issue with those who believe that the task of reclamation in the West is virtually completed, and then said:

Reclamation is not merely putting water on otherwise arid lands, it is not merely providing municipal and industrial water to growing communities, it is not merely providing the benefits of recreation flood control, hydropower, navigation and the other so-called multiple-purpose uses.

Reclamation is the essential ingredient to a growing, expanding, and viable economy throughout the West. Reclamation is making the best possible use of the available precious water resources of the West in order to improve the quality of life in the West.

Secretary Smith further pointed out that if the West is to carry its share of the Nation's economic responsibilities in the decade of the 1970's water resource development there must be accelerated.

I ask unanimous consent that his excellent speech be printed in the RECORD. I would also point out that at the convention where it was made, the organization which has long been known as the National Reclamation Association changed its name to the National Water Resources Association—an acknowledgment of the broadened horizons of the reclamation movement—and selected my home State, Utah, as the appropriate site for its 1972 convention, which will commemorate the 40th anniversary of its founding. It was in Utah that irrigation was first practiced in America by Anglo-Saxons.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECH GIVEN BY JAMES R. SMITH, ASSISTANT SECRETARY—WATER AND POWER DEVELOPMENT, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BEFORE THE NATIONAL RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION CONVENTION, SPOKANE, WASHINGTON, OCTOBER 22, 1969

The name of this talk is "Reclamation For The 70's." The title was not developed lightly. As the next few months unfold, you will see the development and the implementation of a program that will show that we are ready for the demands in the decade ahead.

Those of us who are familiar with the great progress that has been made by the Bureau of Reclamation recognize the important role the National Reclamation Association has played in helping to foster the development of the West through water resource development. The Bureau and the National Reclamation Association have for many years been a team in a working partnership that has helped to move water resource development at the community, state, and national levels. NRA has shown the flexibility needed to mature and grow with changing circumstances.

I see by your program that your theme this year is "Water . . . People . . . and National Goals." That must also be the theme for water resources development in the 70's.

The thrust of the Bureau of Reclamation in the past decades has been forceful in meeting the demands of those times.

But to many, Reclamation has virtually completed its original task of reclaiming the arid lands of the West. Those who believe the Reclamation Act of 1902 has served its purpose are looking at the number of arid acres reclaimed—we must look to the people served and to be served. That task has barely begun.

Much of the West is becoming urbanized and its problems are becoming more and more those of an urban society. While the irrigation of new lands and the delivery of supplemental water will continue to play a large role in the reclamation program, the thrust of reclamation for the 70's must meet the region's growing municipal and industrial water needs. This will require the establishment of new priorities—priorities which will identify the most urgent needs and bring maximum benefits to the people of each region in the West.

These priorities must recognize that 15 of the 25 urban areas having the highest projected rates of population growth are located in the reclamation West. In 1965 the experts predicted a 22 percent growth in population for the West by the year 1975. Today the growth rate is ahead of this forecast.

In establishing the priorities for reclamation of the 70's, some tough questions are being asked of supporters of the reclamation program. Critics are asking and deserve full and complete answers on several major questions.

They are asking whether or not we have a proper pricing system for water delivery.

They suggest there is a basic conflict between two of our national objectives: fostering irrigated agriculture and assisting farmers to maintain their incomes. Some recent Government studies suggest that as much as 40 percent of the 7 million acres of federally assisted irrigated cropland grow crops subject to price support and acreage diversion programs.

There are also those who suggest that we are not properly allocating the public investment in resources among the various regions of the country, and even that water and related land resource development is not a suitable subject for the expenditure of Federal funds.

Critics are questioning the validity of interest-free payment of irrigation obligations and whether the interest rates on M&I water are sufficiently high.

Parenthetically, I might add that the nonreimbursable features of flood control and navigation projects are also beng challenged in certain quarters.

These questions are basic ones. They deserve answers. Unfortunately, those of us who have supported reclamation programs in the past have not adequately and completely answered these and similar questions. We must do so if the program is to be advanced.

Our first challenge is to define what reclamation really is. Reclamation—and I happen to think it is an antiquated world—is not merely putting water on otherwise arid lands, it is not merely providing municipal and industrial water to growing communities, it is not merely providing the benefits of receration, flood control, hydropower, navigation, and the other so-called multiple-purpose water uses.

Of course, reclamation is all these, but it is much more! Reclamation is the essential ingredient to a growing, expanding and viable economy throughout the West. Reclamation is making the best possible use of the available and precious water resources of the West in order to improve the quality of life in the West!

It must be sold in those terms and it must be sold to a bold, sophisticated, young, intellectual society.

Never before in the history of mankind has a society matured so rapidly and I predict that the rate of change will be even faster in the decade of the 70's.

The hard, tough questions which I earlier cited are being asked now and will be more vigorously pursued by those who will be tomorrow's national leaders.

An inherent part of the growing sophistication of our society is the recognition that man must manage his activities so that he complements and does not destroy his natural environment. Man is living in a natural environment created by God which is in balance and harmony. When we introduce and develop a civilized culture, we superimpose it upon the natural creation. Thus, in effect, we build a new environment within the natural one. There must be balance and harmony between the two. There need not be inconsistencies and continuing conflict on every proposed alteration of the natural surroundings. Man is a natural part of the ecology, and it is intended that the environment be for his benefit.

If we are realistic in our proposals and use imagination, we can design and develop projects which will supplement, assist, and enhance the natural environment without causing undue hardship.

There are those who call themselves conservationists who would oppose any development or any alteration of the natural environment. There are also those who call themselves conservationists who would develop and rape the land with little concern as to the side effects of their activities. Our job is to be realistic and to approach our assignments with a judgment that reflects a proper balance that will benefit man.

To me, conservation is the use of the earth's resources to produce the highest quality of living for mankind. This definition is not easy to supply.

But we can develop our water resources in a manner which will protect and preserve those waters that need to be preserved; utilize those waters that need to be utilized; and improve the environment for the benefit of mankind. That is what reclamation in the 70's must be. For the most part, that is what reclamation in the past has been. We who have supported reclamation have supported a program which has improved the natural environment of the West.

The contribution of the Bureau of Reclamation has been great. This has been made possible by dedicated men and women in the Federal service who have given the better part of their lives to the programs they helped to create and implement. This month a good friend of mine and yours, Floyd Dominy, is retiring from Federal service and as Commissioner of Reclamation. Many of the accomplishments of the Bureau during the last 10 years can be attributed to Floyd Dominy's dynamic and bold leadership.

Now we are moving into the decade of the 70's.

Let me, therefore, lay out for you some of the guidelines with which this Administration will implement an aggressive and dynamic reclamation program for the future. As a matter of fact, we have already begun to implement Reclamation for the 70's.

The Small Reclamation Project loan program has been limping along under the most restrictive ground rules. Those rules prohibited a loan if at the beginning of the loan period there was the remotest possibility that the primary use of the land involved would shift from agricultural to urban. Not only that, but if changing economics caused such a shift of land use, the entire loan came due immediately. This is diametrically opposed to a "people-oriented" reclamation program.

One of the first actions of this Administration was to broaden the ground rules to allow the granting of loans for the maximum multiple-purpose use of our water resources.

I am hopeful that the Small Reclamation Projects Act can be expanded so that more loans can be granted for well-justified projects.

In the next decade we must catch up on the backlog of authorized reclamation projects. There are roughly $5 billion in authorized, unfunded projects. In addition to authorized projects, there are a host of projects which were considered feasible at the time their reports were finalized. There are other projects which have not cleared the Commissioner's or my office.

It would be irrational to assume that all of these projects will be built. It is equally irrational to assume that by the time some of these projects are ready for funding, the economics of that time will dictate their construction as originally conceived. The Bureau of Reclamation must continually update its information. The Bureau must assure itself that project purposes, as well as project design, are accurately geared to the needs of a given project and of the people they are to serve.

Reclamation for the 70's must, therefore, include the word "flexibility" and the Bureau must continually reexamine its project proposals to incorporate changing economic and social conditions.

The Bureau of Reclamation has perhaps the most skilled hydraulic and design engineers in the world. It also has expertise in the fields of economics and planning. Its expertise in these latter two fields must be substantially expanded. If the Bureau does not develop the needed additional economic and planning skills so as to prove unequivocally that its projects are justifiable in the strictest sense of the word, many proposed future projects will probably fall by the wayside. They simply will not be able to stand the scrutiny of the sophisticated analyses by which they must be tested. At this very moment a test team is engaged in developing and testing a new approach to the complex subject of water resource evaluation techniques.

Let me conclude by emphasizing that as soon as the dangerous inflationary situation in this country is brought under control we must, and will, fund ongoing reclamation projects at an optimum rate. To do this, we must quit talking only about reclamation and irrigation and emphasize the value of Federal investment in controlling and developing our precious water resources.

In the decade of the 70's, we must broaden our base of support and convince those in other regions of the United States that if we in the West are to carry our share of this Nation's economic responsibilities, water resource development in the West must be accelerated.

In the decade of the 70's we must explore new methods of financing. We must be alert to the social needs of the region. We must provide new job opportunities. We must protect our precious resources for future generations. We must be concerned with ecological balance, with beautification, with conservation, with the demands of recreation. The Bureau of Reclamation must be more sophisticated in its analyses of benefits, financing, and allocating costs and repayments.

With the continued support of this great association, "Reclamation For the 70's" will succeed.

A SECOND INDEPENDENCE HALL

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, it is always a pleasure to hear of the good works of a modern day patriot and a great American, particularly when he is a good friend and a fellow Californian.

I am speaking of Mr. Walter Knott, founder of the famed Knott's Berry Farm, and the motivating spirit behind the creation of a second Independence Hall and Heritage House on the Knott grounds at Buena Park, Calif.

Ed Wimmer, president of Forward America Inc., of the National Federation of Independent Business, recently authored for his broadcast an excellent commentary on Walter Knott, a man of great self-determination and self-reliance.

I commend Mr. Wimmer for this essay, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALTER KNOTT: HE BUILT A SECOND INDEPENDENCE HALL

(By Ed Wimmer)

In the 37 years I have been crusading for the principles set forth by the Founding Fathers, I have met many patriots who, I am sure, would have dedicated their "lives, fortunes and sacred honor" to protect and preserve those principles—in any time of crisis.

Tonight I am going to talk to you about one of these patriots, a man who has built a second Independence Hall to help make the first one live, and I approach this assignment with a feeling akin to what Abraham Lincoln must have felt when he addressed an audience from the steps of Independence Hall, 1861. On that occasion in Philadelphia, the great Emancipator declared:

"I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence, and I have pondered and pondered over the dangers incurred when they assembled here and framed and adopted and signed it.

"I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the army who achieved that independence, and I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this Confederacy together so long. . . . We know now that it was not a mere matter of the separation of the Colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but I hope to the world, for all future time."

The man we are honoring this week is Walter Knott, former tenant farmer and founder of the famed Knott's Berry Farm, and the motivating spirit behind the creation of a second Independence Hall and Heritage House on the Knott grounds at Buena Park, California.

If you have been a listener to these weekly discourses on what has been happening to the American Dream, and how we may keep it from perishing, you will understand the thrill I experienced last month when I spent a day with Walter Knott, and learned how this tenant farmer who lived in a log cabin with a dirt floor, and without subsidies or security guarantees, built one of the great enterprises of the nation.

I learned that Mrs. Knott, now 80 and still supervising the serving of up to 6,000 chicken dinners on Sundays, had eight customers the first day she opened her house to paid guests. I learned why Walter Knott would want to build America's second Independence Hall—down to the thumb and finger prints on 140-thousand specially made bricks, to the chipping of the huge block and crack of the Liberty Bell, and on up to the gold plated weather vane 168-feet above the street.

After admiring the craftsmanship that recreated the great bell, Mrs. Wimmer and I were ushered into a little theatre where we witnessed a cineramic presentation of great paintings that vividly portrayed the centuries of man's struggle for freedom and independence, which prepared us for the next event that was to take place in an Assembly Room, the exact duplicate in every detail of the Assembly Room in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, where the debate on the Declaration was held.

We took our seats on the same kind of backless benches on which spectators and the press of olden days viewed the debates of the Colonies, and after a brief lecture, the lights were turned off, and from each of the thirteen tables candles began to burn and voices rose from each table as arguments over the Declaration began.

From the sound track there rose also the noise of the storm outside, and the sound of rain beating upon the roof could be heard, and above it all the protests, challenges, compromises and fears that marked one of the most memorable days in the history of man.

Some of the voices were heated. There was pleading: Soft, Passionate, Convincing, Challenging, and as a delegate walked across the Hall, making his point, the sound of footsteps and the voice moved with him.

These men were reminded that they were sealing their death warrant if the Declaration were adopted; if the Revolutionary War was lost, or if they were captured, but as one of the delegates said: "We are also deciding the fate of the Thirteen Colonies, and maybe the fate of generations untold."

In the end, they signed the Declaration, pledging their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor; knowing, as someone remarked, they "would have to hang together or hang separately."

As we emerged from the Assembly Room, Mrs. Wimmer remarked in a hushed voice, "we were there when it happened," and I understood for the first time what must have burned in the heart of Walter Knott, and in the hearts of those whose inspired help created such a colossal enterprise.

Of special interest, I think, was the need of putting the voices of the Signers on one strip of tape, which technicians had declared was impossible. A new machine and a new process had to be invented, and it was. The cracking of the Bell presented another problem, and it is a story unto itself. The independent Lund Paint Company produced a paint formula the same as that used on the original Hall. Craftsmen at the Berry Farm performed the cabinet work and made the gorgeous chandeliers and the famed Rising Sun Chair used by the Speaker. Two 60-foot flag poles were donated by the Atlantic-Richfield Company before the company was taken over by the British. The four great clocks, with their ten-foot faces, were made by the skilled men of The American Sign & Indicator Corporation, and independent Don Koll Construction Company, builder of the great Hall, raised them to their lofty positions.

Yes, it was "We The People"—as Walter Knott would say it, who dug the raw materials from the earth; who molded them into bricks, copper and steel, and who fitted the work of hand and machine into place.

Listening to this unparalleled story of our rise as a free enterprise nation, and thinking back to those hours of indecision that must have haunted the Pilgrims, I recalled the words of William Bradford, the great Pilgrim Governor of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, that "great and honorable actions are accompanied by great difficulties, and must be both enterprised and overcome with answerable courage."

According to historical accounts, the crew and captain of the Speedwell, sister ship of the Mayflower, must have gotten faint heart because they managed to create delays that ended in a final count of 102 strong hearts being put aboard the Mayflower, to begin a voyage as immortal as life itself.

What fears they must have suffered. The sickness and death. The storms and fog. The unknown dangers that awaited them if they ever reached land, yet all we hear today, it seems, is "give the people this and give them that;" welfare, welfare, welfare, and what welfare is there to life if man is to lose the enterprise to overcome? If he stands in his ghetto and blames everyone but himself for his plight? If he shall run his own farm or business and look not to the threats against his country or his family until trouble is on his own doorstep?

Lowell wrote that the American Republic will endure only so long as the ideas of the men who founded it remain dominant, but has any generation ever drifted so far afield from the ideas, the dreams of the American Revolution, as the present generation?

I say to everyone, everywhere in America, that Jefferson was either right or wrong when he warned "it is not to the advantage of a Republic that a few should control the many, when nature has scattered so much talent through the conditions of men;" and that James Madison was either right or wrong when he warned: "Hold fast to programs, both national and moral, that have as their central goal a constant diffusion of power."

Both these men feared too much power in too few hands. Both spoke constantly of moral values being basic to social, economic and political values, and they knew if safeguards were not erected that every step of the people would be away from a free Republic and toward great concentrations of power now seen in holding companies, conglomerates, giant labor unions, powerful chain store systems, and all-embracing government.

All trends today—everywhere—are away from the self-determination, self-reliance, independent enterprise, local control over local affairs in government that is basic to the philosophy upon which our nation was founded, but despite a clamor of voices raised against this change in our society, voices such as our own National Federation of Independent Business now reaching millions of people weekly, the task of turning the tide is shirked or ignored by so many who have so much to lose.

I believe there are people in this audience from all walks of life who see the America of yesterday as a kind of Messiah among the nations of the world, and our youth today are asking that she fulfill this role. They know little of how to fill their part of the role or what it really is. They ask only for a cause—not knowing that the TIMES are their cause, and it is so with older Americans, in all walks of life.

And so I say to all of you in radio land, the debate that took place in Independence Hall must begin all over again, for only on the battlefields of the minds of men will such great ideas as those which founded our nation be relived. We need to say My Country 'Tis of Thee, Sweet Land of Liberty in the way it ran through the minds of the poor, uneducated immigrants who knelt on the decks of ships that emerged from the fog and into sight of the Statue of Liberty, weeping when they saw the great Torch of Freedom held high in the heavens over New York harbor.

No other people in the world were ever so blessed with so many opportunities to serve their nation and the world, for what hopes would there be for people anywhere who love liberty, if America should lose her hold on the traditions and wealth with which she is now possessed?

George Washington wrote: "The fate of the Republic is in the hands of God," but he called upon all Americans, both then and now, to "raise a standard to which the good and wise can repair;" saying in effect that if God gives all things to man, if he neglects, forgets or misuses his freedom, all things will someday be taken from him.

Let us set our course with the zeal, courage and dreams which motivated those who took to pathless seas, to find a land where they could sow their seeds and reap their harvests, free from the tyrannies of the old world.

Their dreams came true, and later generations called it The American Dream . . . a dream that took Walter Knott from a humble tenant farm to the builder of a second Hall of American Independence, to help make the first one live.

From an address by Abraham Lincoln (Cincinnati, 1856) :"Let us appeal to the sense and patriotism of the people, not to their prejudices; let us spread the floods of enthusiasm here aroused all over these vast prairies so suggestive of freedom. There is both a power and a magic in popular opinion, To that let us now appeal."

TORTURE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS BY THE GREEK GOVERNMENT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the European Commission on Human Rights has been working for almost 2 years on a report accusing the Greek Government of torturing political prisoners as a matter of policy.

While this report must remain confidential until it has been fully considered by the Council, the London Sunday Times has secured a copy of it, an abstract of which appeared in the Washington Post of today.

I ask unanimous consent that this abstract be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. PELL. If this report of the European Commission on Human Rights does result in the expulsion or suspension of Greece from the Council of Europe I believe this would be a very good thing in that it might be the dash of cold water needed to jolt the Colonels' junta in putting its foot down on the use of torture and might even push them along on the road toward elections.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the Washington (D.C.) Post, Dec. 4, 1969]

GREEK REGIME SAID TO TORTURE JAILED OPPONENTS

LONDON.—A secret report prepared by the European Commission on Human Rights accuses the Greek government of torturing political prisoners as a matter of policy.

Almost certainly the findings of the report will lead to Greece being expelled from the Council of Europe this month.

The Sunday Times has examined a copy of the report, which lists 213 cases in which there is prima facie evidence of torture. And the report produces evidence suggesting that five men, all named, have died as a result of the policy of torture.

The chief method employed was beating on the soles of the feet, which is extremely painful but leaves little or no trace.

The report alleges that a member of the ruling junta, Ioannis Ladas, personally tortured one prisoner.

But perhaps more important than the details of brutality is the fact that the commission deals in detail with the defense which the Greek government has given for its admitted suspension of civil liberties.

The Greeks have always claimed that there was a Communist, or "Leftist" plan to seize power averted only by the colonel's own coup in 1967.

The 15 international lawyers of the Commission reject the Greek evidence that there was any such plot, and accuse the junta of producing forged evidence.

In September 1967, Sweden, Denmark, Norway and the Netherlands charged the Greek regime, fellow-member with themselves of the Council of Europe, with having violated certain fundamental rights of the Greek people. Six months later, the four protesting governments extended their indictment.

They accused the Greek government of torture—not merely random cases of arbitrary police brutality, but of a state of affairs where "high officials within the hierarchy of state authorities or with their permission or knowledge . . . permit or even systematically make use of torture."

A nation cannot remain a member of the Council unless it is a parliamentary democracy. So the charge made against Greece implied at once the sanction of expulsion.

The task of examining the case was given to the Commission on Human Rights, based like the council itself in Strasbourg. Eight international lawyers have spent the intervening two years on the investigation, interrogating eighty-seven witnesses, including officials of the Greek junta, political prisoners still in jail in Greece, politicians in exile, journalists, doctors, workers for Amnesty International, and even at one stage a waiter in Liverpool.

Another seven lawyers joined in the evaluation of the evidence. The result is that the Greek junta has been found guilty precisely as charged. Almost inevitably, this means that Greece will be expelled from the Council of Europe this month.

The 1,200-page report of the commission remains a secret document. There is no present official intention to publish it. However, The Sunday Times has been able to obtain a copy, and extracts are published on the grounds that it presents perhaps the nearest possible approach to a definitive account of the condition of liberty in Greece.

The commission mentions 213 cases in which there is prima facie evidence of torture—some can be more thoroughly documented than others. And it produces evidence to suggest that at least five people may have died as a result of torture inflicted.

These are named as Costas Paleogos, Ioannis Chalkidis, George Tsarouchas, Panaviotis Ellis and Nikiforos Mandilares.

Torture is only one aspect of the suspension of civil liberties laid to the junta's account. In defense, the Greek government claimed before the Commission that the suspension of civil liberties was justified by the existence of a danger to the State. The commission devotes about half its report to the matter of this defense; this is, perhaps, the most detailed examination of the well-known allegation that leftwing groups were planning violent revolution before the coup which brought the junta to power in 1967.

The commission finds that there is considerable evidence that no such plans existed for the overthrow of the state.

The junta also produced a letter which purported to show that the late George Papandreous, the leader of the Center Party, had been negotiating with the Communists. The commission found that one of the junta's own witnesses, a Dr. Kapsaskis, had proved this document to be a forgery five years previously.

In the 430-page section on torture, the Commission lists and analyzes the evidence it heard from 58 witnesses in Athens and Strasbourg. Sixteen of these claimed to be victims of torture; 25 were accused police officers and others in official positions under the regime.

Then the commission gives its conclusions—reached by majorities of 10 to 13. "The commission has found it established beyond doubt that torture or ill-treatment . . . has been inflicted in a number of cases."

This has been a sustained policy: "There has since April, 1967, been a practice of torture and ill-treatment by the Athens Security Police, in Bouboulinas Street, of persons arrested for political offenses. This torture and ill-treatment has most often consisted of the application of 'falanga,' or severe beatings to all parts of the body. Its purpose has been the extraction of information including confessions concerning the political activities and associations of the victims and other persons considered to be subversive."

Moreover, the junta has condoned this to the point at which torture has become "administrative practice." "The competent Greek authorities, confronted with numerous and substantial complaints and allegations of torture and ill-treatment, have failed to take any effective steps to investigate them or to ensure remedies for such complaints or allegations found to be true."

The Commission devotes one entire volume of its report simply to listing 213 people who are alleged to have been tortured, and the evidence available in each case.

This, the commission agrees, dos not provide proof. But the report points out: "The commission cannot ignore the sheer number of complaints . . . It is not able to reject the whole as a conspiracy by Communist and antigovernment groups to discredit the government and the police . . . It cannot but regard the actual number of complaints brought before it as strong indication that acts of torture or ill-treatment are not isolated or exceptional, nor limited to one place."

Faced with this mass of cases to examine the commission decided to take a sort of random sample and focus on selected cases throughout Greece. "The . . . commission has investigated 30 cases to a substantial degree and expressed some conclusion with regard to 28 of them. With regard to these cases the Commission finds it established that: torture or ill-treatment has been inflicted in 11 individual cases (it then lists the cases) . . . the evidence before the commission of torture or ill-treatment having been inflicted on 17 other individuals demands further investigation . . . the commission was in effect prevented directly or indirectly by the respondent government (Greece) from completing its investigation of these cases . . ."

The junta refused to allow the commission to see 21 witnesses. Among those 21 were the alleged victims most reliably reported to bear still the physical marks of their experiences.

In most cases, however, a method of torture, falanga, had been chosen which does not leave marks. The report describes it: "Falanga or bastinado has been a method of torture known for centuries. It is the beating of the feet with a wooden or metal stick or bar which, if skillfully done, breaks no bones, makes no skin lesions, and leaves no permanent and recognizable marks, but causes intense pain and swelling of the feet . . ."

Lacking simple medical evidence, the Commission spent months cross-checking witnesses' stories. The 30 cases the Commission examined in this detail are a recital of horror.

On one page are details of the beating which Ioannis Ladas, then Secretary-General of the Ministry of Public Order, personally gave to a journalist of whom he disapproved—"He struck me with his fist . . . and started pouring out insults . . .

" 'You are a pany, a Bulgar. You shall die. I shall kill you with my bare hands . . .' "

On other pages is the tragedy of Anastasia Tsirka—Police came to her house on the night of September 23, 1967 and found three leaflets of a banned organization. Tsirka was tortured to discover wo had given them to her. The beatings of the Security police in Boubulinas Street killed her unborn child. The doctors think she is now probably sterile.

The junta maintained it had conducted an inquiry into Mrs. Tsirka's allegations and disproved them. The commission found that the inquiry had omitted even to question doctors at the hospital to which she was taken after her miscarriage.

RANDOM DRAFT SELECTION—QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, a great number of inquiries have come from Members of the Senate, as well as from the people of the Nation, about the drawing under the new Selective Service Act. Selective Service has prepared a number of questions and answers that are most commonly asked about this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that, for the information of the membership and the public, the questions and answers which have been prepared be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the questions and answers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RANDOM SELECTION QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Question. Explain the drawing under the recently amended Selective Service Act.

Answer. On December 1, there was a drawing in Washington of 366 closed capsules in each of which was a slip of paper on which was written a month and day of the year, for example, May 2, June 1, etc. The order in which these capsules were drawn determines the relative position in the national random sequence of registrants born on all the dates of the year including February 29. As September 14 was drawn first, all men born on September 14 are No. 1 in the national random sequence. As June 8 was drawn last, all men with that birthday are No. 366 in the national random sequence.

Question. How will this sequence be used by local boards?

Answer. Each local board will assign numbers to its registrants who are in I–A or who become I–A in accord with the national sequence. Some local boards may not have at any one time men with birthdays on every day. In such a case the local board would go to the next number. For instance, it might call numbers 1 through 5, then 7 and 8 because it had no men whose birthdays were on the day drawn sixth in the drawing.

Question. Why is there a drawing of the alphabet?

Answer. This drawing randomized the alphabet so that in case a local board had two or more men with the same birthday and was required to order one but not all of them for a call, it has a way to determine which comes first, second, etc., by applying the random alphabet to the names. In the drawing of December 1, 1969, the letter "J" was drawn first. So men whose names begin with "J" would be called first by the local board among men with the same number from the birthday drawing.

Question. Does everybody get a number out of the first lottery?

Answer. No—the first drawing will determine the random sequence number only for those men who prior to January 1, 1970, had attained age 19, and not 26.

Besides that, the number in which his birthday is drawn will not mean anything until he is classified I–A or I–A–O. Some men in the group who eventually will get a number out of the first drawing may not become I–A until next year or later. In that case, his number will determine his order in the national sequence in use that year. For example, if his birthday is drawn No. 80, and he is now deferred for college, but loses his college deferment in June 1971, he will be No. 80 in the national random sequence in use that year.

Question. How do new 19-year-olds get a number?

Answer. Before the end of 1970, a drawing of the 366 days of the year will be held. This drawing will determine the national random sequence to be used in 1971. The only registrants who would look to that drawing to determine where they stand in the national random sequence are those who turned 19 during 1970.

Question. How do you use more than one drawing?

Answer. The date of November 9, was drawn No. 80 in the first lottery. This may be the number of a man who was in college during 1970, but graduated and lost his deferment in June 1971.

The date of September 11 may be drawn No. 80 in the next lottery. A man born on September 11 who was available in 1971 would be No. 80 in the random order. So would the first man whose birthday of November 9 was drawn No. 80 a year earlier. If both men were in the same local board they would be called on the same call or if one, but not both were required, the random alphabet would determine which one went first.

Question. Doesn't the registrant who is in college most of the year have an advantage over the one who can't go to college and is in I–A throughout the year?

Answer. No. The key in both cases is whether his random sequence number is reached in his local board. If the random sequence number has been reached in the case of a registrant who becomes I–A late in the year, he will be inducted as soon as appeals, examinations and so forth, are concluded, even though the year has ended. There is no way he can gain an advantage by delaying his actual induction through time required for personal appearance, appeals, examination and other processing if his random sequence number has been reached.

Question. What about the registrant who loses a deferment or exemption just before age 26?

Answer. This is like the case in the previous question. If his number has been or is reached, and he loses his deferment just before his 26th birthday, he will, if his deferment extended his liability to age 35 as most do, be inducted at the end of all the processing steps—if he remains in Class I–A or I–A–O and is qualified, even though he has turned 26 during this period of delay.

Question. How does this system help a registrant know with more certainty his chances of serving?

Answer. First of all, his period of greatest vulnerability is one year, rather than seven.

Second, the order in which his birthday is drawn will tell him where he stands in the national random selection sequence. If his birthday is drawn early he knows that when he is classified I–A and found acceptable, he is almost certain to be called. He can plan his career to accommodate that possibility.

If his birthday is drawn near the end, he has relative certainty he may not be called short of unusual circumstances.

He can plan accordingly.

For the registrant whose birthday is drawn in the middle range it is not so clear, but in any event the system will give much greater certainty than is possible under the former system.

Question. Will registrants now postponed be in the random selection?

Answer. No. The postponed registrant has already been ordered for induction under the old system and will be inducted when the postponement ends.

Question. Can a man whose birthday is drawn early in the drawing still join the Reserve?

Answer. Yes. Just as now, he can join a Reserve Unit any time before the induction order is issued.

Question. What about volunteering for active duty?

Answer. The policy is to authorize enlistment for active duty at any time up to the day of induction.

Question. What is the situation of a registrant who is in I–A for the first part of the year, but enters college in September and requests and gets a student deferment?

Answer. If his random sequence number has not been reached, he goes out of the group to return when no longer deferred to the current group. If his random sequence number has been reached, but he has not been issued an order to report for induction, the local board may defer him for college and he would then reenter the selection group in the year he again lost his deferment.

Question. Does the lottery affect existing deferment and exemption policies?

Answer. Existing deferment and exemption policies are not affected by virtue of the lottery system.

Question. How does the lottery affect the liability of those subject to call as physicians and dentists?

Answer. Physicians and dentists are called on special calls, normally after age 26, and have extended liability to age 35 because of previous deferment as a student. Their call to service under this special call would therefore not be different from what is under present policies.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is there further morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

AMENDMENT NO. 343

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the pending amendment.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) proposes an amendment identified as No. 343.

On page 79, after line 19, insert the following:

"(3) Annual report.—Part III of subchapter A of chapter 61 (relating to information returns) is amended by adding after subpart B (added by section 602(a) of this Act) the following new subpart:

"'SUBPART E—INFORMATION CONCERNING PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

"'SEC. 6058. ANNUAL REPORTS BY PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS.

"'(a) General.—The foundation managers (within the meaning of section 4946(b)) of every organization which is a private foundation (within the meaning of section 509(a)) having at least $5,000 of assets at any time during a taxable year shall file an annual report as of the close of the taxable year at such time and in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate may by regulations prescribe.

"'(b) Contents.—The foundation managers of the private foundation shall set forth in the annual report required under subsection (a) the following information:

"'(1) its gross income for the year.

"'(2) its expenses attributable to such income and incurred within the year,

"'(3) its disbursements (including administrative expenses) within the year,

"'(4) a balance sheet showing its assets, liabilities, and net worth as of the beginning of the year,

"'(5) an itemized statement of its securities and all other assets at the close of the year, showing both book and market value,

"'(6) the total of the contributions and gifts received by it during the year,

"'(7) an itemized list of all grants and contributions made or approved for future payment during the year, showing the amount of each such grant or contribution, the name and address of the recipient, any relationship between the recipient and the foundation's managers of substantial contributors, and a concise statement of the purpose of each such grant or contribution,

"'(8) the address of the principal office of the foundation and (if different) of the place where its books and records are maintained.

"'(9) the names and addresses of its foundation managers (within the meaning of section 4946(b)), and

"'(10) a list of all persons described in paragraph (9) that are substantial contributors (within the meaning of section 507(d)(2)) or that own 10 percent or more of the stock of any corporation of which the foundation owns 10 percent or more of the stock, or corresponding interests in partnerships or other entities, in which the foundation has a 10 percent or greater interest.

"'(c) Form.—The annual report may be prepared in printed, typewritten, or any other legible form the foundation chooses. The Secretary or his delegate shall provide forms which may be used by a private foundation for purposes of the annual report if it wishes.

"'(d) Special Rules.—

"'(1) The annual report required to be filed under this section is in addition to and not in lieu of the information required to be filed under section 6033 (relating to returns by exempt organizations) and shall be filed at the same time as such information.

"'(2) A copy of the notice required by section 6104(d) (relating to public inspection of private foundations' annual reports), together with proof of publication thereof, shall be filed by the foundation managers together with the annual report.

"'(3) The foundation managers shall furnish copies of the annual report required by this section to such State officials and other persons, at such times and under such conditions, as the Secretary or his delegate may by regulations prescribe.'"

On page 79, line 20, strike out "(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "(4)".

On page 81, after line 12, insert the following:

"(3) Annual reports.—In the case of a failure to file a report required under section 6058 (relating to annual reports by private foundations) or to comply with the requirements of section 6104(d) (relating to public inspection of private foundations' annual reports), on the date and in the manner prescribed therefor (determined with regard to any extension of time for filing), unless it is shown that such failure is due to reasonable cause, there shall be paid (on notice and demand by the Secretary or his delegate and in the same manner as tax) by the person failing so to file or meet the publicity requirement, $10 for each day during which such failure continues, but the total amount imposed hereunder on all such persons for such failure to file or comply with the requirements of section 6104(d) with regard to any one annual report shall not exceed $5,000. If more than one person is liable under this paragraph for a failure to file or comply with the requirements of section 6104(d), all such persons shall be jointly and severally liable with respect to such failure. The term 'person' as used herein means any officer, director, trustee, employee, member, or other individual who is under a duty to perform the act in respect of which the violation occurs."

On page 83, line 7, insert the following:

"(3) Annual reports.—Section 6104 is amended by inserting immediately after subsection (c), as added by this bill, the following new subsection:

"'(d) Public Inspection of Private Foundations' Annual Reports.—The annual report required to be filed under section 6058 (relating to annual reports by private foundations) shall be made available by the foundation managers for inspection at the principal office of the foundation during regular business hours by any citizen on request made within 180 days after the publication of notice of its availability. Such notice shall be published, not later than the day prescribed for filing such annual report (determined with regard to any extension of time for filing), in a newspaper having general circulation in the country in which the principal office of the private foundation is located. The notice shall state that the annual report of the private foundation is available at its principal office for inspection during regular business hours by any citizen who request it within 180 days after the date of such publication, and shall state the address of the private foundation's principal office and the name of its principal manager."

"(4) Willful failure to provide information regarding private foundations.—Subchapter B of chapter 68 (relating to assessable penalties) is amended by adding after section 6685 (added by section 602(b) of this Act) the following new section:

"'SEC. 6686. ASSESSABLE PENALTIES WITH RESPECT TO PRIVATE FOUNDATION ANNUAL REPORTS.

"'In addition to the penalty imposed by section 7207 (relating to fraudulent returns, statements, or other documents), any person who is required to file the report and the notice required under section 6058 (relating to annual reports by private foundations) or to comply with the requirements of section 6104(d) (relating to public inspection of private foundations' annual reports) and who fails so to file or comply, if such failure is willful, shall pay a penalty of $1,000 with respect to each such report or notice.'

"(5) Section 7207 (relating to fraudulent returns, statements, or other documents) is amended by striking out 'section 5047(b) or (c)' and inserting in lieu thereof 'sections 6047 (b) or (c), 6058, or 6104(d)'."

On page 98, line 22, strike out "and 6034" and insert in lieu thereof ", 6034, and 6058".

On page 104, before line 17, insert the following: "and by adding after the item relating to section 6685 (added by section 602(c)(2) of this Act) the following new item:

"'SEC. 6686. ASSESSABLE PENALTIES WITH RESPECT TO PRIVATE FOUNDATION ANNUAL REPORTS'."

On page 105, after line 6, insert the following:

"(64) The table of subparts for part III of subchapter A of chapter 61 is amended by adding after the item relating to subpart D (added by section 602(c)(1) of this Act) the following new item:

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this amendment, No. 343, is nearly the same as a previous amendment that I had had printed. The changes in it are very minor. The new amendment, No. 343, which is now before Senators in printed form, is also printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday at page 36734.

Mr. President, reserving my right to the floor, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, there will be a quorum call, and the able Senator from Nebraska will retain his right to the floor. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this amendment requires an annual reporting by all private foundations. It also requires the publication of a notice. That notice will inform all persons where the report is available and where the books and records of the foundation are available, and will carry such other information as ought to be carried in such a notice.

I think this is one of the most important amendments relating to foundations that Congress could enact. May I say at the outset that it does not involve some of the controversial items concerning foundations that are covered in the bill or will be brought up in the discussion. It does not involve the question of taxing or not taxing foundations. It does not involve the question of requiring foundations to divest themselves of certain holdings. It does not involve the question of whether or not a foundation's life should expire at the end of 40 years. But it does provide for a method of requiring annual reports from each and every foundation, to the end that those foundations will act in the public interest, and also so that interested parties, the general public, the Internal Revenue Service, Congress, and the committees concerned, will have accurate information.

I have been critical of the bill that was sent to us by the House of Representatives as to its provisions on foundations; and one of my reasons for criticism is that, in many instances, we had to act in the dark. There are perhaps 30,000 foundations in this country. All of the studies that have been conducted concerning foundations have not touched more than 500.

What I am proposing here is not objected to by the vast majority of foundations. Many of them are making reports available, and are opening their books to the whole world all the time. But it is in order that this information be available, and that, when a situation arises that calls for legislation to regulate, or to prohibit, or to penalize, Congress be able to do so, and be able to make wise choices.

As I have stated, there are perhaps 30,000 foundations, and we have never read about more than 500 of them in the newspapers. All of the various piecemeal investigations that have been conducted in the past have been limited to those that the staff or one or two Senators became interested in, and the rest of us got whatever particular details were sifted up to us.

Mr. President, tax exemption is a high privilege. I believe that the operation of a tax exempt foundation is a public trust; and starting from that premise, I believe that all the business, all the transactions, all the receipts, all the investments, all the grants and contributions made by the foundation to individuals or to institutions, are of public concern.

A foundation has its tax-exempt status because it performs a function in the public good. And might I say here, Mr. President, that I hope I am a friend of the foundations. I opposed many sections of the House bill in committee. I shall oppose them on this floor. America is unique in its system of charity, benevolence, and giving. I have said on this floor many times before that in my own State of Nebraska, one-third of the cost of higher education is borne by the private colleges, which happen to be church colleges.

There is not one of those colleges that would not have serious financial trouble if it were not for the grants made by foundations.

Suppose we were to cripple foundations and enact laws so that as many foundations are not created in the future as have been created in the past. Suppose that some colleges close or, because of lack of funds, cannot expand their plants or compete for faculty, and dwindle away and shrink and do not make the fullest contributions to the educational and scientific world. Do the taxpayers gain? They do not. They suffer.

If it were not for tax-exempt foundations and the generosity of individuals, the cost of higher education to the taxpayers of my State of Nebraska would be increased by 33⅓ percent.

I am not unaware of the fact that out of the thousands and thousands of foundations, all of which are run by human beings, some practices may have sprung up in some few foundations that are not the wisest of practices.

I am not unaware of the fact that maybe there are foundations which are intended to do good but which are directed by a staff that makes errors in judgment.

I am not unmindful of the fact that there might be a tiny minority of foundations in which the donor to the foundation uses the foundation for his own gain, through self-dealing or otherwise. However, they are vastly in the minority.

I am acquainted with some foundations which have done wonderful work. I know of one foundation that has helped colleges and universities all across the land. Its overhead is very low.

I happen to know not only about how that foundation works now but how it came into being. It was never created for the purpose of avoiding taxes. One of the wealthy men of our country decided that his two sons were already possessed of enough wealth and that they should not have any more. He wanted to do good. He created a foundation to distribute his money.

Those who have been overcritical of foundations should remember that the earnings, before they come into the hands of the foundation, are taxed. If the foundation is the sole owner of a business, that business pays every tax that any other business pays. If the foundation possesses assets consisting of a portfolio of stocks that represents shares in companies and corporations, that income is fully taxed.

The foundation is merely a conduit for taking money and using it. It cannot be used for anyone's personal gain. It must be used to do good.

As I have said, many educational institutions would close their doors tomorrow if it were not for foundations.

I had my attention called to a foundation that operates in a certain city in the Southland. That foundation has a standing practice of picking up the deficit for a large hospital. And that hospital never turns away any patient who needs hospitalization.

Mr. President, if we proceed to enact legislation without the facts, if we proceed to tax and punish and prohibit and restrict foundations because a few of them may have done some things with which we disagree and which may not have been done in the public interest, we would destroy them all.

Mr. President, two things are, therefore, necessary. In the first place, we should postpone any harsh treatment of foundations until we do have some facts.

In the bill as written, if my amendment is agreed to, Congress and the public will have the facts. An auditing fee will be levied on the foundations under the pending bill. The provision is not intended for revenue. That was clearly established in the committee. An auditing fee based upon the size of the foundation is to be paid so that the Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service can regularly audit the tax-exempt foundations.

We have 30,000 of such foundations. Do Senators realize that some of them have never been audited?

The pending bill provides for auditing by the Government from the standpoint of taxes. That means that the Government will examine the books and records of the transactions and expenditures to see whether the foundation has lived up to the tax laws. They will examine them from the standpoint of taxation.

Mr. President, one additional thing is necessary. Foundations should make an annual report and publish a notice of that annual report.

Mr. President, that is where my amendment No. 343 comes in. I hope that the Senators who are on the floor will turn to that amendment. The amendment itself is the best argument that can be made for it.

It would require an annual report by each and every foundation. Foundations would be exempt if they had less than $5,000 in assets. They would have to be exempt in such a case.

There are some foundations perhaps that exist just on paper. There are some foundations that have been started without funds and it is expected and hoped that at a later time the foundations will have considerable assets. However, some foundations do not amount to very much in the beginning. We do not want to force them to consume the few assets they possess in order to hire lawyers and accountants to prepare an annual report and require them to spend more money to publish a notice.

I am sure that there is not much of a tax gimmick in a tax foundation that possesses less than $5,000 in assets anyway.

This is the information that report will require them to furnish:

> The foundation managers of the private foundation shall set forth in the annual report required under subsection (a) the following information:

Substantially, all of the foundations operate in the public interest. However, there are a few foundations that if one were to write and ask for their last report would either not answer the letter or would reply that they did not have any report.

The report must also supply the following information:

> (3) Its disbursements (including administrative expenses) within the year.

Mr. President, let us find out whether the overhead of the foundation is reasonable. Let us find out if some foundations are consuming their earnings in overhead and not serving the purposes of charity, education, and other good works.

The report shall also contain a balance sheet showing its assets, liabilities, and net worth at the beginning of the year; an itemized statement of its securities and other assets at the close of the year, showing both book and market value; the total contributions and gifts received by it during the year; an itemized statement of all grants and contributions made or approved for future payment during the year. If a foundation is making a grant for a questionable purpose, it will have to be publicized. It must show the amount of each such grant or contribution, the name and address of the recipient, any relationship between the recipient and the foundation's managers or substantial contributors, and a concise statement of the purpose of each such grant or contribution. It shall contain the address of the principal office of the foundation and the place where the books and records are maintained; the names and the addresses of its foundation managers; a list of all persons who are substantial contributors or who own 10 percent or more of any business in which the foundation has an interest.

Mr. President, this annual report has to be publicized. A notice has to be published in a newspaper stating where its head office is located and such other places as the Secretary or his delegate might direct, carrying a brief part of this information, but also advising the public where they can get a report. Anybody, any citizen, any congressional committee, can get the complete annual report by asking for it any time within 180 days. The 180 days is 6 months. I put that in the amendment. I did not think it was reasonable to have somebody write to a foundation and say, "Send me your report for 10 years ago," and then subject that foundation to a penalty because they do not have any copies. But this will bring it out in the open. They have 6 months in which to get the reports. There are many energetic people in the press. There are concerned people who want to get contributions and grants from the foundations. There is the taxing service; there are the committees of Congress. They will ask for these things. A notice has to be published that the report is available and where it can be obtained. If a foundation fails to make this report and to publish this notice, they are subject to penalties, reasonable penalties. However, if they persist and willfully violate, the penalties become more severe.

It is also provided in the amendment that if any foundation managers make a false or misleading statement, that is likewise prohibited by law.

I believe that the adoption of this amendment will add greatly to the value of this bill so far as the sections relating to foundations are concerned. It is not punitive. It subjects a tax-exempt institution to public inspection. Many of the foundations are doing everything that is required of them now. It will be a guideline to new foundations and the smaller foundations to know what is expected of them. It will be a guideline that will restrain a staff of a foundation that might be a little overanxious to do things because they know that what they are going to do will have to be disclosed. By that I do not mean doing things in the sense of something dishonest, but I mean in the way of extreme social action of some kind. Also, the small minority—and I am convinced it is very small—of situations in which the foundation is run in a manner not consistent with the public interest, in which the donor controls it and might use it for his own financial advantage, will be smoked out, and those things will not happen.

Mr. President, I feel that the harshest critics of foundations will want this amendment. It will give them the facts. I also feel that those of us who are profoundly interested in foundations and believe in them want this reporting done, because it will bring out the facts. It follows that, after this is operating for a couple of years or so and the IRS has done its auditing, Congress can act wisely. We will have the information before us. We can stop abuses. We can protect the rights of those people who are acting in the public good.

Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted. I yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I know of no objection to the amendment. It will be all right with me to accept it and take it to conference.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for a voice vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment No. 343 was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 336

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 336 and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The bill clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 350, after the matter following line 22, insert the following new section:

SEC. 508. DENIAL OF PERCENTAGE DEPLETION FOR FOREIGN OIL AND GAS WELLS

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 613(b)(1) (relating to percentage depletion rate for oil and gas wells) is amended by inserting after "oil and gas wells" the following: "located in the United States or in its possessions".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Section 613(b)(7) (relating to minerals, etc., entitled to 15 percent rate of percentage depletion) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraph (A);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (B) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by inserting after subparagraph (B) the following new subparagraph:

"(C) oil and gas wells."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is the Senator willing to agree to a limitation of debate on this amendment?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the pending amendment be limited to 40 minutes, to be equally divided between the sponsor of the amendment, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG), and the manager of the bill, the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. That is agreeable.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, for the time being, I must reluctantly object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant Republican leader reluctantly objects.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Delaware without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TREATMENT OF CAPITAL GAINS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I have received quite a few calls from Members of the Senate who said they are getting calls from their constituents about what the Senate did yesterday in regard to capital gains. I thought we should straighten out this matter for the record.

Under the committee bill a person's taxable capital gains, which are 50 percent of one's long-term gains, would be taxed at the regular rates. Since under the committee bill the maximum rate would have been 65 percent, this would mean that an individual's capital gains would have been taxed at a rate equivalent to a 32.5-percent maximum, as compared with 25-percent maximum under the existing law. Under the Gore amendment, which struck out this committee provision which provided for a lower tax rate structure, capital gains in effect will be taxed now at 50 percent of the existing tax rates—50 percent of 70 percent—which means that as a result of the Gore amendment the tax on capital gains has been advanced to a 35-percent maximum ceiling, compared with 25 percent under existing law.

In addition, under the committee bill there is a tax of 5 percent on a person's preference income. Since 50 percent of capital gains are a preference item, this means another 5-percent tax is placed thereon. The mathematical result, if we retain the Gore amendment as agreed to, is that capital gains will be taxed at 37½ percent compared with the existing law maximum of 25 percent.

I thought this should be called to the attention of the Senate. We are getting quite a few inquiries. When the Senate accepted the Gore amendment and raised the exemption by a vote of 58 to 37, it also raised tax rates on capital gains by the same vote.

Whether I agree with the action of the Senate—or not is beside the point—but I thought it should be made clear what was done. I am sure that all Senators who voted for the Gore amendment realized what they were doing, but some persons on the outside were confused. My purpose today is to clarify the record that capital gains now are locked in at 37.5 percent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, my amendment, if agreed to, would bring at least $25 million in additional revenue to the Treasury of the United States. It would eliminate the oil depletion allowance on oil produced outside the United States. The tax reform bill passed by the House of Representatives entirely abolished the 27½-percent foreign oil depletion allowance. The Committee on Finance restored that unconscionable tax loophole to 23 percent. It is absolutely reprehensible to permit American investors in foreign oil to enjoy almost $2 billion in annual tax-free profits. That is what they will continue to do unless my amendment is agreed to.

In my judgment, the action of the Senate committee is totally unacceptable to those millions of Americans who have reasonable expectations and hope of meaningful income tax reform. There is no rational legislative reason for continuing the extension of the privilege of the depletion allowance to foreign produced oil. No national benefit is derived. The only ones who benefit are those American investors involved in the production of oil in other countries. The combination of the depletion allowance and the foreign tax credit has made most of these profits tax free.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield for that purpose.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further debate on the amendment be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana what the amendment involves.

Mr. LONG. It deals with the oil depletion allowance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that there be a time limitation on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, the time to be equally divided and limited to 1 hour? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The able minority whip does not even reluctantly object.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, does the limitation commence at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The limitation begins now.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the fact is it was never expected that the depletion allowance should extend to foreign development and production.

While the claim for some domestic depletion allowance may be arguable, to continue to extend the loophole to foreign production is absolutely indefensible. At least the domestic oil industry pays some State and local taxes and on occasion some Federal income taxes. Even then, oil and gas companies pay Federal taxes at a rate far below those paid by the great majority of heavily burdened taxpayers.

However, those receiving profits from foreign oil production pay no income taxes whatever. The combination of the 27½-percent depletion allowance combined with the foreign tax credit allowed under present tax laws completely washes out tax liability to the U.S. Government. In some cases, the American oil producer abroad also gets an additional tax depletion or other comparable incentive from the foreign government which further conceals the real income from foreign oil which is a highly guarded secret in our own Department of Commerce.

Furthermore, these tax-free profits of American investors in foreign oil have corrupted and misdirected American foreign policy in many oil-rich countries. This has resulted in a policy of costly military assistance in support of temporary rulers and feudal sheiks who will undoubtedly be ousted when their people some day find out how their national resources and treasury are being squandered. Not only is there no reason for American taxpayers to subsidize these activities, but to continue to do so actually works to the detriment of our best long-range national interests.

Mr. President, I frankly feel that the action of the Senate in refusing to go along with the other body in reducing the domestic oil depletion allowance to 20 percent was very unfortunate. However, the action of the Senate committee in maintaining the foreign oil depletion allowance at 23 percent—or at any rate, for that matter—makes a sham of real tax reform. We are hopeful of achieving real tax reform by the passage of a good reform bill before the Christmas season and thereby lessen somewhat the unduly heavy tax burden on American families in the earnings class of $5,000 to $14,000. The incredible tax-free income provided through this notorious loophole affronts the integrity of our system of taxation and is offensive to any citizen who pays his fair share of the tax burden.

The tax privileges enjoyed by the oil industry are unequaled in this country. The domestic oil depletion allowance remains intact at somewhere between 20 and 23 percent, depending upon the action which will eventually be taken by the conference committee. Nothing has been done about the intangible drilling costs, the accounting procedures and several other devices that save oil producing companies billions of dollars each year. Certainly, it is high time that the foreign oil depletion allowance, the most indefensible of all tax loopholes favoring the oil industry, should be eliminated. I urge the adoption of my amendment which is a meaningful step toward genuine income tax reform.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, at the time I asked for a limitation of debate, it occasioned inconvenience to the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. FULBRIGHT), who was willing to go along with the limitation on condition that we yield him some time.

I therefore should like to ask the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG) if he would join me in yielding 18 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas, the time to be equally shared between us.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Yes, indeed. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas my share of 20 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Eighteen minutes, I am sure, is all the Senator will require. If he needs 20 minutes or more, we will give it to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 18 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the kindness of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Ohio in yielding me this time.

THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT'S PUBLIC AFFAIRS OFFICE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, there may not be many issues involving Pentagon spending in which I would find myself in complete agreement with the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Mr. RIVERS. When such a situation arises, however, I am most happy to proclaim it.

All this is by way of calling attention to a statement by Mr. RIVERS which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last June 12. At that time he said:

> Recently, in an article that criticized the Congress for the swollen expenditures within the Pentagon, I found that one of the sins blamed on Congress was that the Defense Department Public Affairs Office budget was three times as large as that of the State Department Public Affairs Office. I just want to say that if any Member of Congress wants to introduce a motion to cut the budget of the Defense Department Public Affairs Office by two-thirds, he will have my wholehearted support.

Mr. RIVERS may have the opportunity to provide his support in the House and I will welcome it if the Senate will accept amendments to the Defense appropriation bill which I plan to offer.

THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAM OF THE AIR FORCE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in 1947, Congress, in passing the National Security Act, voted to end the rampant rivalry between the military services and require each to subordinate its parochial interests to those of the Military Establishment as a whole. The purpose, the Senate committee report stated, was to provide "unity of military concept" and "unity of purpose and effort" for our military forces. But 20 years later the Army, Navy, and Air Force each spend millions of tax dollars annually in an effort to persuade the public that its particular brand of weaponry is the finger in the dike holding back the enemy hordes. The competition within the armed services for the public's affections, and their representatives' votes in the Congress, is like the hucksterism of rival auto manufacturers; hardly the character the public deserves from an organization which consumes half of all Federal revenues each year.

The current information directive for the Air Force states that "in view of current events and notable diverse public views concerning our Nation's defense" the Air Force's information objectives "must make clear that aerospace power is uniquely important in meeting these demands through both its support for the employment of other forces and its own striking power." Commanders were instructed to "promote awareness, understanding, and appreciation" of the fact that "clearly superior U.S. aerospace forces capable of defeating the enemy offer the surest means of deterring global war." Countering the "aerospace threat to our security," the directive stated, can only be through "maintaining superiority" of our own aerospace forces. Sufficiency may be enough for President Nixon but it is not for the Air Force.

I ask unanimous consent that the 1968 Information Objectives be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
> OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
> U.S. AIR FORCE,
> Washington, D.C., March 16, 1966.
> Subject: 1968 Information objectives.
> To: AAC ACIC, ADC, AFAFC, AFCS, AFLC, AFSC, ATC, AU, CAC, HQ COMD USAF, MAC, OAR, PACAF, SAC, TAC, USAFA, USAFE, USAFSO, USAFSS.
> 1. The 1967 Information Objectives as set forth in the enclosure to my letter of 6 December 1966 remain valid for 1968 and are appropriate long range objectives. I would like commanders at all levels to review these objectives. Additionally, in view of current events and notable diverse public views concerning our nation's defense, I consider it timely to emphasize and place in clear perspective certain objectives that tend to become obscure.
> 2. Our Information efforts must make clear that this changing and increasingly complex world demands that our nation's military power be superior, adaptive to change, and capable of rapid application. We must make clear that aerospace power is uniquely important in meeting these demands through both its support for the employment of other forces and its own striking power.
> 3. Specifically, during 1968, and within the context of stated Information objectives, commanders should promote awareness, understanding and appreciation of the fact that:
> a. The potentially most dangerous military threat to the security of the United States is that aerospace force which the Soviet Union can employ against our nation;
> b. It is United States aerospace forces which constitute our capability to counter that threat;
> c. Clearly superior United States aerospace forces capable of defeating the enemy offer the surest means of deterring global war; > d. With unmistakable strategic superiority, the difficult but essential burden of assisting our allies and friends in their defense against aggression becomes more manageable, meaningful, and credible;
> e. While superior assured destruction and damage limiting forces promise our nation reasonable protection from a direct nuclear attack, they are not in themselves sufficient to insure that we have the ability to control to our advantage the escalation of the various types and levels of conflict. Additional strategic capabilities and obviously superior tactical and airlift forces also are required. Such forces provide the US effective and relevant alternatives to attain our objectives while controlling the intensity of the conflict.
> 4. In summary, we must clearly recognize the aerospace threat to our security and that our aerospace forces must have the capability to successfully counter that threat by maintaining superiority. The success of our 1968 efforts depends upon the quality and effective implementation of your plans to keep the public and Air Force people informed. Your personal attention is requested.

> J. P. MCCONNELL,
> General, USAF, Chief of Staff.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in promoting its public relations objectives, the Air Force in fiscal year 1969 report they spent $9,424,000 and engaged the full-time services of a staff of 944. This does not include the hundreds throughout the Air Force who work at public relations on a part-time basis, as a collateral responsibility to other duties. The Office of Information, with a staff of 202, and a 1969 budget of $3,532,432 is the focal point for the Air Force's public relations effort. I will have printed in the RECORD certain informative material concerning a number of Air Force programs, but I wish to mention in particular several which struck me as especially interesting.

I ask unanimous consent that statistical and other data on Air Force public affairs activities be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATISTICAL AND OTHER DATA ON AIR FORCE PUBLIC AFFAIRS ACTIVITIES

Q. 1. Please submit the overall costs of the Air Force Public Affairs Program. Include within your estimate the costs of personnel as well as the costs of operation and maintenance.

Answer: Fiscal Year 1969—$9,424,000.

Public Affairs is defined as all functions and activities performed for the purpose of providing official information about the U.S. Air Force through the public media and activities and functions performed for the purpose of contributing to good relations between the USAF installations and their local and regional civilian communities. The above amount includes military and civilian salaries and allowances of professional and clerical personnel, worldwide, performing public affairs activities on a full-time basis, and non-personnel operating costs.

Q. 2. Please estimate the number of officers, enlisted men and civilians who work full-time in support of the Air Force Public Affairs Program.

Answer:

Personnel engaged in public affairs

(Includes public information and community relations)

Officers	169
Enlisted men	339
Total military	508
U.S. civilians	380
Foreign nationals	56
Total civilians	436
Total personnel	944

Q. 3. With regard to the Office of Information, Department of the Air Force, please supply the following:

(a) How many officers, enlisted men, and civilians work for the Office of Information in Washington? Elsewhere?

Answer:

Washington	105
Elsewhere	97

Q. 3. With regard to the Office of Information, Department of the Air Force, please supply the following:

(c) Please supply details and specific examples within the last twelve months of the activities of the following divisions and associated branches: . . . Public Information Division.

Answer:

PUBLIC INFORMATION DIVISION

The Public Information Division develops and disseminates information about the United States Air Force of interest to the public. It supervises and provides policy guidance for home and regional office activities, interpreting policy within parameters set at Department of Defense and Secretary of the Air Force level, and directing implementation on a regional basis. Also recommends command implementation through prescribed channels. All information plans and annexes are reviewed and coordinated. This overall mission is accomplished through specific actions of the three branches reported below.

INFORMATION DEVELOPMENT BRANCH

The Information Development Branch develops short and long range story ideas and places them with all types of communication media through liaison with field extension offices, regional communication media, and other division branches. It acquires photography from Aerospace Audio-Visual Service (AAVS) in support of the USAF public information program; coordinates Air Force participation with national television, radio, and film industries with Office, Secretary of Defense authorities; and coordinates and clears all Air Force films and scripts intended for public exhibition. It is the coordinating agency for all proposed motion picture scripts either by the Air Force for internal training or informational purposes or by an Air Force contractor. Specific example of projects undertaken during the last twelve months include the following:

1. Arrangements were made, with approval obtained from OASD(PA), for the use of Air Force Eastern Test Range facilities and equipment to support the Columbia Pictures film production, "Marooned." Cooperation consisted of the use of a CH-3E helicopter for three days to film the rescue spacecraft being carried up the Banana River and across Merritt Island to launch complex 41; clearance and operational coordination through the Director of Range Operations for a civilian photography helicopter to operate from Cape Kennedy Air Force Station; and use of from one to three Air Force vehicles for ten days. Accounting and documentation procedures were worked out with the Range Contract Management Office, the Staff Judge Advocate, and the Base Comptroller. Columbia was billed $8,868.81 for Air Force support.

2. A weekly film clip program was started to provide service to 450 commercial television stations which requested the service. They are sent a color, television clip, approximately one minute long, featuring Air Force people and things. American Forces Television Stations also receive this service. Total annual budget is $100,000.

3. The "Pro Sports Report" recorded radio program is produced weekly for about 150 commercial radio stations. It carries an Air Force promotional spot announcement. Total annual cost is $4,680.

SPECIAL PROJECTS BRANCH

The Special Projects Branch conducts the Air Force books and magazine features program. It maintains the Air Force story book and recommends marketing procedures for these themes and performs liaison with industry concerning public information programs of mutual interest. Specific examples of projects undertaken during the last twelve months include the following:

1. During July to December 1968 the branch assisted authors and publishers in 46 book projects and 109 magazine projects. Much of this work is long range: some books have been three years in production; editors may delay or cancel publication of authorized articles.

2. The branch gathered detailed background information, prepared biographical data and the citation for Medal of Honor presentation to Lt. Col. Joe M. Jackson. The President made the presentation in a Joint Service Ceremony at the Pentagon, January 16, 1969.

3. Arranged for a photo story about Miss Leilani Bauzon, a Philippine national who the Military Airlift Command flew from the Philippines to Houston, Texas for heart surgery. Photo story materials were sent to Clark AB Office of Information for coordination with USIS and possible local release.

MEDIA INFORMATION BRANCH

The Media Information Branch acquires, prepares, staffs, and releases current printed news material about U.S. Air Force operations intended for public dissemination either voluntarily or in response to inquiry. The branch releases information to printed news media through OASD(PA); acquires pictorial and audio materials as needed; and monitors Air Staff offices for public information developments. It organizes, conducts, and monitors, in coordination with OASD (PA), national media tours of major commands and bases, and arranges media interviews and news conferences for members of the Air Staff and Office of the Secretary. It provides press guidance for public appearances of senior Department of the Air Force officials and furnishes current information materials and policy to field extension offices. Specific examples of projects undertaken during the last twelve months include the following:

1. The branch proposed routine releases to OASD(PA) during FY 69 on topics such as general officer promotions and reassignments, change of command actions, activation and deactivation of Reserve units, AFROTC unit changes, etc.

2. High interest news projects, both proposed releases and answers to news media queries, covered topics such as the F–111 aircraft system, Alaskan Communications System, alleged fuel thefts in Thailand, Minuteman II missile system, Israeli and Jordanian pilot training, and the B–1 (formerly AMSA).

3. One hundred and ten requests for newsmen to accompany airlift flights were staffed and forwarded to OASD(PA) for consideration.

4. The branch arranged and/or took part in 85 news media interviews with Air Force officials during FY 69.

Q. 3. With regard to the Office of Information, Department of the Air Force, please supply the following:

In the above requested information, it is expected that you will include a listing of all radio, television, and film production undertaken in whole or in part with support from the Department of the Air Force, along with the funds allocated to each specific production.

Answer:

AIR FORCE RADIO, TELEVISION, AND FILM PRODUCTION

1. Air Force News Review.—Monthly. Fifteen minute, black-and-white film report on Air Force missions and people designed primarily to inform Air Force people. Each month 725 prints are sent to Air Force installations for use in Commander's Call programs and American Forces Television broadcasts. Annual cost is about $343,000.

2. American Forces Radio and Television Service TV Spots.—Twelve information and news feature TV spots are produced each year in 50 copies for all AFRTS studio originator TV studios to retain. Annual cost is about $7,000.

3. Khesanh, Victory for Air Power, Special Film Report FR 1009.—Fifteen minute, color film on the battle of Khesanh primarily for internal showings. 325 prints. Cost was about $21,000.

4. Christmas Television Show.—Thirty minute, color video tape production. Twenty-two tapes produced and circulated for use. AFRTS produced black-and-white film versions for distribution to their TV stations. Air Force Recruiting Service and Information Officers distributed the video tapes on a rotation basis to 204 CONUS commercial television stations. Cost was about $5,200.

5. Pro Sports Report.—Weekly. Recorded five minute radio sports feature containing an Air Force feature spot announcement. Distributed to 150 major market commercial radio stations. Annual cost is about $4,680.

6. Profile Radio Service.—Monthly. Recorded radio program of Air Force feature material designed for three times a week programming. Each record contains 12 to 15 feature segments up to 90 seconds in duration. Broadcast by 1,139 commercial and AFRTS stations. Annual cost is about $9,300.

7. Serenade in Blue.—Weekly. Thirty minute recorded radio series featuring units of the United States Air Force Band and guest talent; primarily for recruiting purposes. Broadcast by approximately 4,000 commercial and AFRTS stations. Annual cost is about $10,000.

8. Christmas Radio Show.—Recorded annual production distributed the same as the Serenade in Blue program, above. Voice of America has also broadcast the musical variety program since 1964. Program consists of one record containing two individual 25 minute programs. Cost was about $3,400.

Q. 3. With regard to the Office of Information, Department of the Air Force, please supply the following:

(d) Please supply reports on public affairs activities produced by subordinate commands and forwarded to the Office of Information during the past twelve months.

Answer:

PUBLIC AFFAIRS REPORT

There are three public affairs reports that are either submitted by subordinate commands or compiled by the Office of Information, Office, Secretary of the Air Force (SAFOI) from data furnished, wholly or in part, by subordinate commands. Each of these is described below and copies are supplied, as indicated, in the reports file that accompanies this reply.

1. Schedule of Significant Events, Appearances, and Speeches.—Published monthly and distributed to field organizations. Lists data for USAF Band engagements, Air Force Air Demonstration Team (Thunderbirds) schedule, and Air Force Orientation Group exhibits. Twelve reports supplied.

2. Community Relations Report.—Reports Control Symbol (RCS): DD–PA (SA) 65. Semiannual report required by Office, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs). Subordinate Air Force commands report data are used by SAFOI to compile the consolidated Department of the Air Force report. Command reports are disposed of after six months. The consolidated Department of the Air Force report for January–June 1968 is supplied. Subordinate command reports covering July–December 1968 are also supplied. U.S. Air Forces in Europe and Pacific Air Forces report through the Unified Commands directly to the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs) in accordance with Department of Defense Directive 5410.18, "Community Relations."

3. Use of Military Carriers for Public Affairs Purposes, RCS: DD–PA (M) 591.—Monthly report required by OASD(PA). Forty-one command reports received during Fiscal Year 1969 contained details about military carriers used for public affairs purposes, as required, and have been supplied. Other monthly command reports received for FY 1969 stated that military carriers had not been used for public affairs purposes during the reporting period.

Q. 4. Please supply information on the activities of the USAF TV Center under the Management Division of Secretary of the Air Force. List, in this connection, every center available for viewing either directly or indirectly manned by service personnel. Please supply a list of each production for the past twelve months, a brief synopsis of its contents, and its costs. Also describe the manner of its distribution.

Answer:

HQ USAF TV CENTER

1. Mission.—The mission of the HQ USAF TV Center, as approved by the Air Council, is to apply closed circuit television (CCTV) as a management tool to communicate current information and data to the Secretariat and Air Staff.

2. Activities and functions.—The mission is accomplished by direct video feed to selected staff agencies and production of video tape briefings for presentation to key officials "on demand" to fit their schedules. The Center maintains a capability for off-the-air television distribution to the viewing centers within its CCTV system. It can produce color and black-and-white video tape recordings of briefings and presentations in its studio as well as present them "live" to Pentagon CCTV circuit users. Video taped briefings or kinescope recordings can be made available to the requesting staff agency for additional distribution.

3. Viewing centers.—All HQ USAF TV Center viewing centers are located in the Pentagon. They consist of the TV Center, seven Air Force conference rooms, and the offices of eight officials: Secretary of the Air Force, Chief of Staff, Vice Chief of Staff, Deputy Chiefs of Staff for Systems and Logistics, Plans and Operations, Research and Development, the Comptroller of the Air Force, and the Director of Operations.

4. Products, fiscal year 1969.—A list of the 38 productions of the HQ USAF TV Center during Fiscal Year 1969 is contained in the following five pages, including synopsis, costs, and distribution.

Title	Cost	Synopsis	Distribution

Q. 5. Also supply in detail the activities of the Air Force Audio-Visual Service. Include within that report the costs of operating the service (which I understand is carried under Airlift Command), its products for the last twelve months that were made available, directly or indirectly, to civilian audiences. Please supply a catalog of films produced and available for distribution to the public by the Air Force Audio-Visual Service.

Answer:

AEROSPACE AUDIO-VISUAL SERVICE (AAVS)

1. Organization and mission.

a. The Aerospace Audio-Visual Service (AAVS), under the Military Airlift Command (MAC), is equivalent to a numbered Air Force. Its headquarters location is Norton AFB, California. AAVS is responsible for providing audio-visual products and services to the Air Force.

b. The mission of AAVS encompasses still photo and motion picture documentation, optical instrumentation, still and motion picture production, still and motion picture depository services, motion picture distribution, and television.

2. Activities and functions.

a. Documentation. This program provides the Air Force an enduring audio-visual account of significant events, current operations, and training exercises. Documentation is accomplished by recording these activities on motion picture film, video tape, and still film. Coverage includes combat activities in Southeast Asia.

b. Optical Instrumentation. This is the art and science of using a camera to observe and record physical events and, at the same time, recording precise time signals on the film which can be used to correlate the event with time. AAVS furnishes these services to the Air Force Western Test Range, headquarters at Vandenberg AFB, Calif., in support of Strategic Air Command and Air Force Systems Command requirements and to the nuclear test sites in the Pacific Ocean and Nevada in support of Defense Atomic Support Agency requirements.

c. Audio-Visual Productions AAVS is the single agency responsible for production and procurement of Air Force motion picture films. The Air Force uses the productions primarily for education and training, recruiting, and airmen motivation purposes.

d. Depositories. AAVS operates and maintains depositories that acquire, preserve, and store Air Force audio-visual products, principally original photography, video tapes, and sound recordings of contemporary and enduring historical value. They range from films of the early developments in aviation to the latest combat documentaries from South-east Asia.

e. Distribution. AAVS manages a central film library at Norton AFB and eight overseas regional libraries to distribute audio-visual products to authorized users.

f. Television. There are two fixed TV facilities installed at Los Angeles AFS and Hill AFB, Utah to support management and training requirements, respectively. In addition there are two mobile television facilities, each consisting of a trailer truck van containing a four-camera production studio. The mobile facilities currently support training of Air Materiel depots civilian work force. The vans are air transportable.

3. Budget.—The AAVS operating budget for FY 70 is $10.9 million.

4. Film production.—During FY 69 AAVS produced 148 films and 36 TV film clips. Twenty-four films were cleared for public viewing. The TV film clips were released to the public. Production by categories was as follows:

	Productions	TV film clips	Cleared for public showing
Special film projects	28	----------	10
Film reports	76	----------	14
Training films	44	----------	0
TV film clips	----------	36	36
Total	148	36	60

5. Films for public exhibition.

a. Air Force films which are cleared for public showing are listed in AF Manual 95–2, Air Force Film Directory, which is supplied with this reply.

b. Civilian agencies may obtain cleared film by:

(1) Mailing a request to:

Air Force Audio-Visual Center.
USAF Central Audio-Visual Library.
Norton AFB, CA 92409.

(2) Personally contacting the Information Officer at a local Air Force Base.

c. Requests for films are filled in the following order of priority:

(1) Active Air Force organizations.

(b) Air Force Reserve, Air National Guard, and AFROTC.

(3) Army and Navy.

(4) Air Force contractors.

(5) Other government agencies.

(6) Civil Air Patrol and Boy Scouts (Air Explorers).

(7) Authorized non-government activities such as schools, religious organizations, TV stations, civic, fraternal, and social organizations, and professional interest groups.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the Information Development Branch of the Office of Information, the Air Force states:

. . . develops short- and long-range story ideas and places them with all types of communication media through liaison with field extension offices, regional communication media, and other division branches.

One of its services last year was to supply a weekly 5-minute "Pro Sports Report," which carries "Air Force promotional spot announcements," to about 150 commercial radio stations. The Special Projects Branch—conducts the Air Force books and magazine features program. It maintains the Air Force story book and recommends marketing procedures for these themes and performs liaison with industry concerning public information programs of mutual interst.

Perhaps I am not properly attuned to the terminology of Madison Avenue but it strikes me as somewhat unseemly for a military organization to refer to its public selling effort as "marketing procedures." Other productions, aimed at radio audiences, were—

Profile Radio Service.—a short radio spot feature planned for use three times each week; it is used by 1,139 commercial and armed services radio stations.

Serenade in Blue.—a weekly 30-minute radio show broadcast by about 4,000 commercial and military radio stations.

Film production in the Air Force for public showing, was big business, as it is in all of the armed services. In the last fiscal year the Air Force film facility had a budget of $10.9 million, and produced 148 films and 36 TV film clips. Twenty-four of the films were cleared for public showing. The list of films added in the last fiscal year to the Air Force film libraries is intriguing. One film is "Exercise Pathfinder Express," described as follows:

Depicts largest airborne training exercise in Europe. Demonstrates USAF, U.S. Army, and Spanish troops in hypothetical combat situation. Pictures Morón, Spain, center of activity, where men, equipment and supplies are dropped in enemy territory. Portrays paratroopers in mass assault to secure airfield. Shows effective tactical air power with Spanish-American cooperation. Closes with proud forces marching before commanders. Depicts bullfight and reception given by Spanish people in honor of participants.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield at that point?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Is that in the name of American security?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is an official quotation described as "Exercise Pathfinder Express," carried on by the Air Force.

Mr. GORE. Is this expenditure for the purpose of making this Nation secure?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is to glorify the Air Force and procure larger appropriations from the public. That is what the ultimate objective of this whole public relations program is for, as distinguished from internal information.

Mr. GORE. I do not quite get how closing a movie with a bullfight will get more money out of Congress. That might be the purpose, but how does it operate?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not justify this program. The purpose of my comments is to show that they are not justified in the public interest, nor are they justified by, or even relevant to, the security of the United States. I am only relating here what the Air Force actually does.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator identify for whom the troops were parading? Was that before Franco?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. This was in Spain. Morón is one of the largest air bases in Spain. It is not the largest; I believe it is the second largest.

I may say this matter was discussed in a little different context before the committee, with regard to the renewal of the Spanish bases, in which we then had information with regard to the cooperative exercises between our forces and the Spanish forces.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator think that we could dispense with this kind of expenditure without injuring the security of the country?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I most certainly do. That is the whole purpose of these comments.

In view of the concern of many members of the Foreign Relations Committee over U.S. military involvement in Spain, I am sure that this film, showing our servicemen fighting alongside the Spanish forces in quelling a rebellion, will be of considerable interest to a number of Senators. I have obtained a print of this film from the Air Force.

Another 1968 addition is "The Other Side of the World" which:

Documents civic action programs conducted in Thailand's rural areas by Air Force's 606th Air Commando Squadron. Shows operation of medical and dental clinics and construction of sanitation facilities. Also depicts educational programs for children.

Until seeing this listing I had not realized that our military forces in Thailand were engaged in what would appear to be a Vietnam-style pacification program. Perhaps the committee might learn more about the American presence around the world in watching Defense Department movies than it does in briefing by executive branch officials. This particular Air Force program in Thailand is now being phased out.

I ask unanmous consent that the list of Air Force films be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIST OF AIR FORCE FILMS

AUGUST 1, 1969.

AFIF 164—THE UNITED STATES STRIKE COMMAND

Depicts mission, organization and worldwide areas of responsibility of U.S. Strike Command (USSTRICOM), a composite of Army ground forces and Air Force tactical units. Shows how USSTRICOM's highly flexible, fast operating methods support normal Middle East operations and provide instant response to world-wide trouble spots and disaster areas. Depicts large and small scale maneuvers and exercises that keep USSTRICOM in constant readiness. 21 Min. Color. 1967. PE, TV, PS.

AFIF 171—THE FIRST TUESDAY AFTER THE FIRST MONDAY

Traces history and evolution of presidential voting in this country from election of George Washington. Depicts creation of the two-party system, the caucus, absentee ballot and women's voting rights. Shows how cross-country campaigning has grown from whistle stops and motor calvacades to modern air travel and television debates. Stresses importance of every eligible person exercising the right to vote. 20 Min. B & W. 1967. PE, TV.

AFIF 172—KNOW YOUR ENEMY—THE VIETCONG

TF 6301—SPACE NAVIGATION

Shows techniques and equipment used in lunar missions. Summarizes accuracy achieved in interplanetary trajectory. Cites methods used in target positioning, precise ways of determining target course, and the 20th century tools in measuring. Demonstrates base tracking techniques and new optical techniques in measuring velocities. Explains how to determine current position and correct course. Stresses importance of gathering experience for more complex missions. 21 Min. Color. 1968. PE, TV, TH.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Like the other services, the Air Force maintains an active speech bureau. The July speaking engagement bulletin lists 109 speeches and appearances by top Air Force officials. But this is only the tip of the iceberg. Throughout the Air Force, personnel are encouraged to go out and sell the Air Force program. For example, the semi-annual Community Relations Report of the Air University, Maxwell Air Force Base, noted that:

Air University personnel made 1,574 speeches, radio broadcasts, and television appearances. Live audiences totaled almost 185,000, while the 86 television appearances and 17 radio broadcasts expanded the total audience to well into the millions. Lt. Gen. A. P. Clark, the Air University Commander, spoke on 23 different occasions.

I ask unanimous consent that the list of speakers and the Community Relations Report be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. AIR FORCE—SCHEDULE OF SIGNIFICANT EVENTS, APPEARANCES, AND SPEECHES, JULY 23, 1969

This report is a monthly series of bulletins listing events of interest to Air Force units. This report includes major speeches and appearances, engagements of the USAF Band, Air Force Thunderbirds, and Air Force exhibits.

The report projects a schedule for a six-month period. IO's should utilize this schedule as a means of stimulating interest and participation in scheduled events. You are requested to forward to the appropriate SAFOIC Branch, through your major command, any events which should be included in future reports.

SPEECHES AND PUBLIC APPEARANCES (SAFOICD)

AFR 190–2 and HOI 190–7 require that speaking engagements and public appearances be reported to SAFOICD, ext: 76205/72769. (A) indicates "Appearance Only." (Date, speaker, event, and place.)

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
HEADQUARTERS AIR UNIVERSITY
Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala., February 11, 1969.

Reply to Attn. of: AU (AUOI).
Subject: Semiannual Community Relations Report (RCS: DP–PA(SA)65).
SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, D.C.

1. EXCEPTIONAL ACCOMPLISHMENTS AND RESULTS

a. Speakers' Program. Air University personnel made 1574 speeches, radio broadcasts, and television appearances. Live audiences totaled almost 185,000, while the 86 television appearances and 17 radio broadcasts expanded the total audience well into the millions. Lt. Gen. A. P. Clark, the Air University Commander, spoke on 23 different occasions

Through programs to civilian groups, Air University made a significant contribution to public understanding; letters, telephone calls, and newspaper publicity indicated enthusiastic response to messages given by our people

(1) The Air University Aerospace Presentations Team. Members of the team made 512 presentations to civilian groups. At the invitation of the American Chamber of Commerce of Mexico, team members visited Mexico City, Mexico, 24–26 July. During this time, they presented four programs to schools and civic organizations. They also took part in a radio interview, which reached approximately 250,000 persons. During 24–30 November, a team visited Puerto Rico, where they made six presentations to live audiences. In addition, they participated on four radio and television programs, which reached approximate audiences of 735,000.

Increased understanding of Free World nations undoubtedly resulted from our Allied officers' activities in the civilian community.

(3) Safety Education. The State of Alabama has been plagued with an ever-mounting number of highway fatalities. Consequently, the Alabama Department of Public Safety has taken positive action to combat these disasters by launching an all out safety drive. Air University has cooperated fully with the State of Alabama in this endeavor.

In September, the Director of Security, Office of the Inspector General, Headquarters Air University, delivered a speech to 43 officers of the State Police Academy, explaining the new speed detection device, VASCAR (visual average speed computer and recorder). In December, one member of the AU Office of Information and two members of the Wing Information Office conducted a four-hour seminar at the academy. They discussed information and public safety techniques and showed a film on traffic safety. Also in December, four instructors from the Academic Instructor and Allied Officer School presented a half-day workshop on effective oral communication for Alabama troopers who have been selected to speak on safety to groups throughout the state.

Through working with the police academy, increasing the knowledge of safety officials, and improving the communicative abilities of safety speakers, Air University personnel have made a definite contribution to prevention of fatalities on Alabama highways.

(4) Community Service by Air War College Student. Following the sudden resignation of the pastor of Our Redeemer Lutheran Church, the congregation asked an Air War College student, who is a chaplain, for assistance. In his service as "supply" pastor, he did an outstanding job. He also devoted many hours to counseling sessions with congregation members and worked with the church's youth groups. The president of the congregation, in a letter to the Air War College Commandant, stated, in part:

"Each of these services was far beyond what the congregation asked or expected of him. He, his wife, and his children have set superior Christian examples of an Air Force family. We have deeply appreciated their contributions to the life and spirit of the congregation."

b. Charity Activities. For the tenth consecutive year, the Dean of Curriculum, Academic Instructor and Allied Officer School (AIAOS), planned, coordinated, and led the Executive Action Seminar (8–12 July) in training 40 loaned executives for the United Appeal. As Dean of this one-week seminar, he not only coordinated the activities of Montgomery leaders but participated actively throughout the training period as teacher, supervisor, problem solving leader, and keynote speaker. The graduates of the seminar are directly responsible for the ever-increasing participation of business, industry, and government agencies in the annual United Appeal Campaign.

Having spoken on "Motivating the Volunteer" at the 18th Annual Campaign Leaders Conference, United Community Funds and Councils of America, the AIAOS Dean of Curriculum was invited to give keynote addresses for United Fund Campaigns in several communities. During September and October, he gave "kick-off" talks in Johnson City, Tenn.; Grand Forks, Wahpeton, and Fargo, N.D.; Lima, Ohio; and Decatur, Ala. In connection with these engagements, he also made radio broadcasts and television appearances.

c. Activities with International Implications.

(1) Course in Cross-Cultural Relations. AIAOS conducted a pilot course designed to train persons going overseas in cross-cultural relations. Its mission was to develop within selected U.S. Air Force officers cross-cultural awareness in order to increase their effectiveness in a different cultural environment. The evaluation of the course disclosed that it was extremely effective. The techniques, methodology, content, and design are highly effective in helping USAF personnel to communicate and interact more effectively with their overseas host counterparts and can be adopted by other services and commands.

(2) Second USAF International Conference on Matrix Methods in Structural Mechanics. The Air Force Institute of Technology (AFIT) co-sponsored this conference with the Air Force Flight Dynamics Laboratory, 15–17 October, at Wright-Patterson AFB. More than 250 engineers and scientists attended from Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Holland, India, Ireland, Japan, Norway, United Kingdom, and the United States. They reviewed the state-of-the-art, the latest developments in matrix methods, and areas of future research.

(3) Seminars for Turkish Armed Forces. Four AFIT personnel conducted a series of Resources Management Seminars for the Turkish Armed Forces, 2–22 November. The seminars, which were attended by representatives of the Turkish Armed Forces and governmental ministries, and State Department personnel, were sponsored by the Military Assistance Program in conjunction with the Military Assistance Group in Ankara, Turkey.

(4) Reception for Foreign Personnel. Minister Sterling Cottrell, State Department Advisor to the Air University Commander, represented the State Department and Air University as guest of honor at a reception for foreign personnel presently residing in or visiting the State of Alabama. The City of Birmingham and the Birmingham Business and Professional Women's Club sponsor this annual affair, started in 1962. Approximately 500 people attended the 1968 reception.

(5) Research Project in England. An AFIT associate professor of electrical engineering served during July-September with the University of Aston, Birmingham, England. Part of his research work dealt with brain damage which involved brain mapping work with spastic or brain-damaged children referred by the Birmingham Regional Hospital Board.

d. Cultural Activities. The office of Minister Cottrell was instrumental in securing the Ecuadoran Ambassador to the United States to open the Montgomery Museum of Fine Arts exhibit of colonial art of Ecuador on 21 September. Minister Cottrell's office worked closely with the museum's exhibit chairman and with the Ecuadoran Embassy. The opening of this exhibit drew crowds of art enthusiasts in this area. It received wide publicity in Montgomery and surrounding areas.

A member of the Arts and Graphics Department of AFIT was instrumental in organizing the first annual Wright-Patterson AFB Art Fair, held on 13 October. The fair was open to the public and was devoted to the artistic efforts of military and civilian personnel. It offered a medium whereby community people and base personnel could interact in a cordial and friendly atmosphere. It also furthered the cultural interests of both groups.

e. Special Programs. From December 16 until December 20, the Air War College provided a one-week course of instruction to 50 Reserve and Air National Guard colonels, representing areas throughout the United States. This course provided information to nonactive duty officers which brought them up-to-date on the military aspects of our national security policy. Also, Air Force plans, programs, and problem areas were discussed.

Five seminars were conducted by AFIT personnel as part of the Honor Seminars of Metropolitan Dayton, Inc. This program provides an opportunity for outstanding area high school students to attend a series of seminars, laboratory sessions, and field trips under the guidance of outstanding scientists and educators.

As President of the Montgomery Chapter, Air Force Association, the AIAOS Dean of Curriculum, worked with over 200 civilian members of the community, along with over 400 military members of all service components. At the 2d Annual State AFA Convention, he was elected President of AFA (Alabama).

2. PROBLEM AREAS

a. Lack of TDY funds prevented AU personnel from filling some speaking engagements out of the local area. Two Vietnam returnees have traveled considerable distances on several occasions, at their own expense, to speak on their personal experiences in Southeast Asia.

b. Funding constraints preclude further development of the cross-cultural relations courses conducted by AIAOS.

c. The community relations report received from Detachment 755, University of Puerto Rico, listed as a problem area: "We continue to get the impression that Air Force personnel who are Stateside continue to think of Puerto Rico as a foreign country."

Under "solutions" and "recommendations for improvement," the Professor of Aerospace Studies stated:

"1. Recommend Hq AFROTC publish briefings on Puerto Rico and the status of Air Force ROTC and of Puerto Rican Air Force officers.

"2. Recommend Hq. AFROTC contact SAFOI and Hq USAF Advertising Division and inform them of the status of AFROTC in Puerto Rico and seek direct support from them for the AFROTC mission at the University of Puerto Rico. We feel that the mission here is unique for two main reasons. First of all, the official language is Spanish, but most of the Island is bilingual. Secondly, there is no influence of USAF Recruiting Service here and so the Air Force image, which might otherwise be enhanced, is blurred; at least in the San Juan area where no active duty AF units exist except AFROTC. Therefore, we have taken the challenge of promoting the entire Air Force and not just the AFROTC."

3. FORECAST

a. Speakers' Program. We anticipate an exceptionally active speakers' program during the first half of 1969. We have already filled numerous speaking engagements. The Aerospace Presentations Team is heavily booked until summer. Allied officers will continue their bi-weekly television appearances, as well as speeches to civilian groups.

Air University personnel plan to continue working with the Alabama Public Safety Department and other officials in an effort to decrease the heavy toll of traffic fatalities. The Advisor to the Governor on Traffic Safety has been invited to brief Air University and Alabama officials on the status of safety conditions. Additionally, we plan to invite the Governor, the Director of Public Safety, and other state officials to visit Air University for a briefing on operations and plans concerning military actions in this area.

b. City-to-City Project. During April, AFIT will sponsor a two-day orientation tour for the Chamber of Commerce of Montgomery, Ala. Members of the Montgomery Chamber will receive tours and briefings on AFIT and other parts of Wright-Patterson AFB. AFIT will maintain close liaison with the Dayton Chamber of Commerce and will sponsor joint sessions for the two chambers.

c. National Security Forum. The major community relations event scheduled for Air War College during the first half of 1969 is the 16th annual National Security Forum, 12–16 May. Approximately 55 distinguished civilian guests from areas throughout the United States will attend. They will represent executive-level, professional, industrial, business, and labor sectors. They will hear lectures by outstanding speakers from military, governmental, and educational fields. They will also participate in seminars, along with Air War College students.

M. A. ROTH,
Colonel, USAF, Director, Office of Information.
(For the Commander).

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, another interesting aspect of the Air Force public relations effort is the "distinguished visitor program" which provides free trips for local opinion makers to Air Force installations. Popular spots to visit were Las Vegas, Hawaii, and Florida. Some of the trip objectives, as stated in routine reports of local commands, were:

First. A trip by Texas attorneys to the Air Force Museum in Wright Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio: "Give prominent members of the civilian bar throughout the State of Texas" an opportunity "to become more familiar with the Air Force's history and mission."

Second. On a trip by Ogden and Salt Lake City civic officials to the Lockheed plant in Marietta, Ga.: "Community leaders received a briefing on the C–5A and its meaning to future Air Force logistics."

Third. A trip by Kansas City newsmen to Cape Kennedy was "scheduled to build rapport and improve media relationships between this headquarters and greater Kansas City news media."

SAC Headquarter's last community relations report lists five groups of "distinguished visitors"—from Boston, Minneapolis-St. Paul, New York City, Los Angeles, and San Antonio—and 12 "specialized groups," ranging from the Smaller Business Association of New England to New York artists, as visitors over a 6-month period. The Aerospace Defense Command reported that its 3-day distinguished visitor program, of "18 to 20 trips annually exposes 450 to 500 key community leaders from all parts of the United States to aerospace defense." The list of those who have received the Air Force's favors in the last year is long, varied, and interesting.

I ask unanimous consent that the Air Force list of civilians traveling on Air Force planes be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
HEADQUARTERS, AIR FORCE SYSTEMS COMMAND, ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE,
Washington, D.C., July 18, 1968.

Subject: Reporting non-local travel for public affairs purposes.
To: Secretary of the Air Force.

Non-local travel for AFSC activities for the month of June 1968 were as follows:

a. Air Force Missile Development Center, Holloman AFB, New Mexico.

(1) AFSC Orientation Tour for dignitaries from the El Paso, Texas, Alamogordo-Las Cruces, New Mexico area (19 including escorts) from Holloman AFB, to Nellis AFB, Nev.; Vandenberg AFB, Calif.; Space and Missile Systems Organization, Los Angeles, Calif.; and Kirtland AFB, New Mexico. An AFMDC aircraft (C–54) was used for this tour. Approval was received from this Headquarters and SAFOIC.

b. Air Force Special Weapons Center, Kirtland AFB, New Mexico.

(1) The information officer, 1st Lt. Joe A. Davis accompanied two displays airlifted from Kirtland AFB, to Santa Rosa, New Mexico in a C–47. These displays were used in the dedication ceremonies of Santa Rosa's new municipal airport.

HAROLD M. HELFMAN,
Deputy Director, Office of Information
(For the Commander.)

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
HEADQUARTERS, MILITARY AIRLIFT COMMAND,
Scott Air Force Base, Ill.

Subject: Use of military carriers for public affairs purposes.
To: Secretary of the Air Force.

1. This report of non-local airlift is submitted in compliance with AFR 190–13.

2. On 12 Jun 1968, Al Muenchen and Harry J. Schaare, Artists, The Society of Illustrators (New York), departed Dover AFB, DE, by C–141, to Ft Campbell, Ky, and returned to Dover AFB 13 Jun 1968. Purpose of Travel: To photograph different phases of Air Force operations for the Air Force Art Collection.

Lieutenant Colonel ORLO F. DUKER,
Deputy Director of Information
(For the Commander).

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
HEADQUARTERS, AIR FORCE LOGISTICS COMMAND, WRIGHT-PATTERSON AIR FORCE BASE, OHIO,
July 24, 1968.

Subject: Use of military carriers for public affairs purposes.

1. Reference para 6d, AFR 190–13.

2. This report covers the period 1 May–30 June 1968.

3. On 1–3 May 1968, the Ogden Air Materiel Area, Hill AFB, Utah hosted a group of civic leaders from Ogden and Salt Lake City, Utah on an orientation tour of Lockheed-Marietta, Marietta, Ga., and the Special Air Warfare Center, Eglin AFB, Florida. The following information is reported:

a. Names, affiliations, and positions of persons transported (Atch #1).

b. Points of origin and destination (Date, local time, and place):

1 May 1968: 0800, Departed Hill AFB, Utah; 1800, Arrived Robins AFB, Ga.

2 May 1968: 1120, Departed Robins AFB, Ga.; 1300, Arrived Eglin AFB, Fla.

c. Mode of Transportation: C–54 aircraft.

d. Public Affairs Purpose Accomplished: Community leaders received a briefing on the C–5A and its meaning to future Air Force logistics. The Special Air Warfare demonstration increased their understanding of the Air Force mission and responsibilities in the Vietnam war. Increased interest and understanding of the Ogden Air Materiel Area mission and sounder community relations was achieved through this visit.

HARRY A. HABERER,
Chief, Information Division

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
HEADQUARTERS, 64TH TACTICAL AIRLIFT WING, SEWART AIR FORCE BASE, TENN.
July 1, 1968.

Subject: Nonlocal travel and transportation for public affairs purposes.

In accordance with paragraph 6d, AFR 190–13, the following report is submitted on travel and transportation for public affairs for the month of June 1968.

a. Names, affiliations and positions of persons transported or types of cargo; points of origin and destination; and mode of transport used:

One hundred teachers (see attached list) from Tennessee participating in the Aerospace Workshop this summer at Middle Tennessee State University in Murfreesboro were airlifted from Sewart AFB to Wright-Patterson AFB on 20 June in two C–130E Hercules aircraft. After a brief visit there, they were airlifted back to Sewart on the afternoon of the 20th. Four Air Force buses were used to transport the group from MTSU to Sewart, and on the return to MTSU.

b. Public affairs purpose accomplished:

As a public affairs function, this airlift accomplished a two-fold purpose. It gave us an opportunity to "show and tell" the teachers about Sewart's tactical airlift mission. Two rated officers served as escort officers on the flight and answered questions about Sewart, C–130's and the Air Force. It also gave the teachers an opportunity to visit Wright-Patterson AFB and the USAF Museum.

13 Sep 68, 1440, 1850, Departed Kelly AFB, Texas; Arrived McClellan AFB, Calif.

c. Mode of transportation: C–118 aircraft.

d. Public Affairs purpose accomplished: This trip was the first of its kind for all but three of the guests. The group was impressed by the complexities and importance of Air Force Logistics Command operations from the standpoint of interface and cooperation between air materiel areas. More depth of understanding between manufacturer and the people responsible for maintenance and support of new aircraft was also achieved. The image of the Sacramento Air Materiel Area as being a vital and important part of the overall AFLC operation and support of the Air Force was enhanced.

Report for November is as follows:

1. The National Geographic Society is compiling material for a book on Alaska. A writer and a photographer have been in the state in excess of 60 days. The photographer, Mr. George Mobley, requested support from the Alaskan Air Command to get many of his photos. Mr. Mobley's travel, although within Alaska is in support of a publication which will be distributed internationally. His military travel is as follows:

a. An H–21 helicopter was used to transport Mr. Mobley from Eielson AFB, near Fairbanks, to the site of the Alaskan Command Arctic Survival School, and return on 14 November. His purpose was aerial photos.

b. Mr. Mobley was aboard a T–33 aircraft on a training flight to photograph F–102's in flight. The flight originated and terminated at Elmendorf AFB on 27 November.

c. Mr. Mobley was transported from Elmendorf AFB to Iliamna, Alaska, and return on a C–130 aircraft on 2 December. The flight was made to support search and rescue efforts for a civilian crash on that date.

2. Mr. James Finnell of the Los Angeles Society of Illustrators, was transported from Eielson AFB to old crash site and return on an H–21 helicopter on 13 November. Mr. Finnell was also given an orientation flight in a T–33, originating and ending at Eielson AFB on 13 November. Both flights were made so Mr. Finnell could gain insight into Alaskan Air Command air operations. He is painting for the Air Force Art Collection.

The following report is submitted for the month of December 1968:

Date: December 17, 1968.

Origin: Andrews AFB, Maryland.

Destination: Kitty Hawk, North Carolina via Elizabeth City, N.C.

Passengers: See attached list.

Type of carrier: C–131 from Andrews to Elizabeth City—CH21B(2) from Elizabeth City to Kill Devil Hill.

Purpose of trip: The event is designed to celebrate the 65th Annual observance of the first powered flight by the Wright Brothers at Kitty Hawk, North Carolina. The event is hosted by the National Aeronautic Association.

The airlift support provided by this Command for the 65th Anniversary of powered flight at Kill Devil Hill, N.C., produced an occasion for numerous contacts between the Office of Information and the Air Force Association. The close association between this Command and the several sponsoring agencies improved rapport and established the Command as an organization responsive to needs of the Washington area aviation community.

Subject: Public Affairs Airlift.

To: SAFOIC.

1. Of the eight guests who traveled to Ellington AFB on 17 March, the following information may clarify the status of four of them: Mr. Walter Englert, Lt. Col. USAF (Ret.); Mr. Barry Trader, Captain, AFRes.; Mr. Noel Bullock, CPO, UNS (Ret); and Mr. Chester Ted Beattie, Major, USAF (Ret).

2. The aircraft, scheduled to carry USAF military and civilian personnel on valid orders, had additional space available even after the above-named personnel were considered. Four additional persons were manifested, all of whom qualified for transportation under the provisions of AFR 190–13. These men and their affiliations were:

Mr. Roy Haug, Denver AFA Chapter President and Defense Communications Manager, Mountain States Telephone Company.

Mr. Dan Partner, Military Editor, The Denver Post.

Mr. Bill Hinkley, Member, International Aerospace Education Federation and former Superintendent, Aurora Public Schools.

Mr. Larry Smith, Boulder AFA Chapter President, and newspaper representative, Boulder Daily Camera.

3. Our error was one of not requesting clearance for these last four men through OASD/PA and SAFOIP under paragraphs 3b(2)(a) and (c) of AFR 190–13.

4. The use of this airlift, although not authorized in advance through OASD/PA, further cemented the fine public and community relations support of an influential segment of the local press, radio, TV and civilian leaders in the community. Exceptionally good coverage of the five Outstanding Airmen of the Year from Colorado resulted from this trip. Additionally, many inches and minutes of publicity on the speeches of Secretary Seamans, General McConnell, the Apollo astronauts and many other facets of the Air Force, were produced as a result of this airlift.

IO.
After Action Report. Overseas Travel of Mr. John W. Ternus.
AFRES (AFROIP).

1. Reference OSAF Msg R101841Z Apr 69, authorization for Carmichael Courier Publisher, Mr. John W. Ternus for overseas travel. A report on this mission follows.

2. The actual itinerary of the mission was slightly different than it was planned. There was an additional stopover at Iwo Jima due to a cargo delivery to that island. The actual itinerary was:

Departed, 1310, 19 Apr 69, McClellan AFB, Ca.

Arrived, 1630, 19 Apr 69, McChord AFB, Wa.

Departed, 0800, 20 Apr 69, McChord AFB, Wa.

Arrived, 1910, 20 Apr 69, Hickam AFB, Hawaii.

Departed, 1120, 21 Apr 69, Hickam AFB, Hawaii.

Arrived, 1920, 22 Apr 69, Wake Island.

Departed, 1125, 23 Apr 69, Wake Island.

Arrived, 1755, 23 Apr 69, Tachikawa AB.

Departed, 0835, 25 Apr 69, Tachikawa AB.

Arrived, 1215, 25 Apr 69, Iwo Jima.

Departed, 1440, 25 Apr 69, Iwo Jima.

Arrived, 0100, 26 Apr 69, Wake Island.

Departed, 1730, 26 Apr 69, Wake Island.

Arrived, 0540, 26 Apr 69, Hickam AFB, Hawaii.

Departed, 2140, 26 Apr 69, Hickam AFB, Hawaii.

Arrived, 1140, 27 Apr 69, Travis AFB, Ca.

Departed, 1315, 27 Apr 69, Travis AFB, Ca.

Arrived, 1345, 27 Apr 69, McClellan AFB, Ca.

3. Mr. Ternus was met and briefed by the local IO's at McChord AFB, Wake Island, A.S., and Tachikawa AB. Mr. Ternus was very impressed by the professional support given to him by Sgt. James Kennedy, the NCOIC of the AP section and acting IO at Wake Island and also the support given to him at Tachikawa AB by the OI of 6100 SPTWg. He has gathered valuable briefing material at these bases and eventually should be using many of them.

4. Due to the change of the itinerary, the unexpected landing at Iwo Jima was a delightful treat for Mr. Ternus. He was a naval officer during WW II and was stationed in a destroyer during the Iwo Jima conflict.

5. The U.S. Coast Guard personnel stationed there, drove Mr. Ternus and the reserve crew from the Japanese Air Base to their station and the aircrew had a few hours of very interesting rest, observing the Japanese Shrines and American Memorials. The Commander of the Japanese base who was an ex-Kamikaze Pilot and his personnel were also very courteous and hospitable. They took their time and chatted with the reserve crew and Mr. Ternus.

6. Due to the Carmichael Courier being a weekly issue, Mr. Ternus has not finished the complete story yet and he is not expecting to finish them until the end of next month. However please refer to the enclosed clippings which were already printed.

7. Mr. Ternus indicated he was very impressed with the treatment he had received by the AFRes crew and by the local IO's. LtCol William G. Emmon and Maj John J. Donahue, the aircraft commanders and their crew gave outstanding assistance to our guest throughout the trip. Some members of the crew even accompanied Mr. Ternus during the crew's rest at every location.

8. This information officer feels that the mission was an unqualified success. It left a favorable impression on Mr. Ternus, as reflected in his stories and his enclosed letter of appreciation to the Group Commander. During these days, more close contact with the news media such as this and allowing them to become a part of the various missions as a first hand witness, would certainly make them realize that the US Air Force and AFRes is their own organization and they are here to serve the public.

Signed

JOHN Y. KARAPINAR,
Capt, AFRes,
Information Officer
(For the Commander).

CARMICHAEL COURIER,
May 5, 1969.

Col. SIDNEY NOVARESI,
Commander, 940th Military Airlift Group, McClellan Air Force Base, Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR COLONEL NOVARESI: This is to express my profound thanks to you and the crew members of the C-124, No. 0112, for the recent most rewarding trip to Japan.

Lt. Col. William G. Enmon and his men accorded me every courtesy and made the trip a most pleasant one.

It is not often that one is privileged to gain such an experience and I am very grateful. Please also extend my thanks to Capt. John Y. Karapinar, whose courtesy, consideration and expertise with the Japanese language made his presence very valuable and congenial.

Sincerely,

JOHN W. TERNUS,
Publisher.

REPORT ON NONLOCAL TRAVEL AND TRANSPORTATION FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS PURPOSES RCS: DD–PA(M)591 HEADQUARTERS AIR TRAINING COMMAND APR. 1–30, 1969

Date	Names and positions	Points of origin and destination	Type aircraft	Purpose
Apr. 7–10, 1969	See attachment 1	Moody AFB, Ga., to Lowry AFB, Colo.; Northern Air Defense Command, Colorado; Air Force Academy, Colorado; Nellis AFB, Nev.; Vance AFB, Okla.; and return to Moody AFB, Ga.	C–131	Moody AFB enjoys good community relations with area civi leaders. This tour, an opportunity for the participants to view other types of Air Force operations, strengthened this basic goodwill and understanding.
Apr. 24–26, 1969	See attachment 2	Laughlin AFB, Tex., to Homestead AFB, Fla.; and return to Laughlin AFB, Tex.	C–131	Laughlin AFB area civic leaders were given the opportunity to view other facets of the Air Force operation. These tour participants gained increased insight into the importance and complexity of the Air Force mission.
Apr. 27–28, 1969	See attachment 3	Chanute AFB, Ill., to Patrick AFB, Fla., and return to Chanute AFB, Ill.	C–131	The tour participants opinion molders in the Chanute AFB area, strongly support Air Force activities. Seeing the complex technology at Patrick AFB pointed out the necessity of ATC's technical training centers such as Chanute AFB.
Apr. 28–30, 1969	See attachment 4	Webb AFB, Tex., to Hurlburt Field and Eglin AFB, Fla., and return to Webb AFB, Tex.	T–29	These tour participants who work in cooperation with Webb AFB were given a broader view of Air Force functions on this trip to Eglin AFB and Hurlburt Field.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the Air Force, the Army, and the Navy are all engaged in intense competition for public support of their particular weapons systems. The Department of Defense, the purpose of the National Security Act notwithstanding, does not speak to the public with one voice but with at least four; one seeking a larger slice of the Federal Government's pie and the other three seeking a larger share of the Department of Defense pie; and all of them urgently demanding more money for war. Measured in dollars, the term that matters most, with one-third of the total military budget going to the Air Force, its public relations program must be termed a resounding success.

This concludes my third statement on this subject. Friday, December 5, I will discuss the public relations activities of the Army.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

TAX REFORM OF 1969

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. May I inquire as to the time remaining to my side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has 16 minutes. The Senator from Louisiana has 22 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. LONG. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to eliminate entirely the depletion allowance on oil and gas produced overseas. Over the years I have tried to get the oil depletion rate lowered. I was unsuccessful in trying to get the rate reduced to 20 percent, as provided in the bill passed by the House. I am hopeful that when the bill goes to conference we can get the conferees to accept the House figure.

On the other hand, I do not believe this is the proper way to approach such a change, because, if we adopted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, we would be establishing a dual tax structure as relates to domestic income and foreign income.

Based on the best information submitted to the committee by the Treasury Department and by the staff, the revenue which would go to the Treasury Department the first year, as a result of the amendment, would be $25 million. After that, however, the foreign countries in which the oil is produced could easily adjust their laws so that the revenue coming to the U.S. Treasury would be zero from then on. Not only would it be zero as far as the result of this amendment is concerned, but in fact we would lose revenue, because as the foreign countries adjusted their revenue laws, there would be less income coming back to this country for us to tax.

I have tried for years to reduce the depletion rate, and will continue trying to change it later if we fail to hold the rate at 20 percent. But, I still think this rate should apply across the board. I do not think the pending amendment is the proper way to do it. Therefore, I shall not be supporting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The figures show that the oil companies are bringing back to this country virtually all of the profits they are making in their averages of operations. They then are declaring as much of that out in dividends as they can. If this amendment is adopted, it is likely that the foreign countries will proceed to increase their taxes. As a result of those additional foreign taxes, the profits of these companies available for dividend payments in this country will be reduced.

Because of this it is estimated that after the first year, the Treasury would lose between $5 million and $15 million a year, because the Treasury would not collect taxes on the profits that would have been declared as dividends but which would now be paid as taxes to the foreign countries. So while the Treasury might be making $25 million the first year, from that time on it would be losing at least $10 million a year as a result of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator is correct. I might say that the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), which I supported, would have corrected the problem that I think the Senator from Ohio is seeking to correct here. Not debating the Proxmire amendment over again, since the Senate has made its decision, but had the Proxmire amendment been adopted, it would have corrected the problem in a manner by which the revenue picked up would have accrued to the U.S. Government to the extent that it would have been an additional tax on the corporations.

What I fear in this situation is that if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio we would only be taking money away from the companies and passing it on to the foreign governments. At least we know that could be the result and past experience indicates the foreign countries would take advantage of the opportunity to get the additional revenue.

So I do not approve of this amendment, and shall not support it, although, as I say, I wish we had been successful with the Proxmire amendment, which I think would have accomplished the purpose.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I, too, support our distinguished chairman in his position on this amendment. In addition to what has already been called to our attention by the distinguished Senator from Delaware, which spells out the fallacy of this type of approach, it should not go unnoticed that the Department of Defense has stated certain objectives that it feels are vital in support of national security considerations. Following closely behind the development of mineral resources within this country and within the hemisphere, it places the control and ownership of oil in foreign countries as next in importance; is that not correct?

Mr. LONG. Yes, the Senator is correct about that.

Mr. HANSEN. I think it has also been pointed out previously that the balance of payments that has helped to support our Treasury, which comes from this ownership of foreign oil, is an important item. That, coupled with the petroleum in the hands of American companies that can help supply other friendly nations throughout the world, has added to the ability of Americans to contribute to the kind of steady international development that we also recognize as being important. The amendment after a year or two will produce no extra revenue for the Treasury. It will make more difficult the desirable ownership, development and operation of foreign oil properties by American companies.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is correct. As I pointed out yesterday in the debate—as shown at page 36684 of the RECORD—under this bill, the oil companies are taxed an additional $155 million because of the reduction in their depletion allowance, and they are taxed another $200 million under the 5-percent minimum tax on their depletion and their intangibles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Does the Senator yield himself additional time?

Mr. LONG. Yes, I yield myself such additional time as I may require.

They are also taxed an additional $200 million on production payments. This is $555 million of additional taxes on the oil companies as such. In addition to that, they are being hit by the increase in the capital gains tax, and they are also hit by the elimination of the investment tax credit and by what we are doing with regard to accelerated depreciation.

So they are being hit in this bill in six different ways, the way it stands right now. But at least one can say that, insofar as striking at this meritorious industry, which is essential to national defense, is concerned, at least those things will gain his Government some revenue. But, on the contrary, the Senator's proposal would lose us money. In the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee, he pointed this out exactly as the Senator from Delaware has pointed it out and I might note that the Senator from Delaware is certainly not to be regarded as an advocate for the oil industry. I ask unanimous consent that Secretary Cohen's statement be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Finally, the bill eliminates percentage depletion with respect to foreign oil and gas production. Our analysis of this provision indicates, in the light of our foreign tax credit provisions, that after a brief period it will probably result in foreign countries increasing their effective tax rates on income from oil and gas production to "sponge up" any additional tax revenue otherwise accruing to the United States. Thus the denial of foreign depletion will increase the effective U.S. rate of tax on such income, which tax the foreign governments will then offset by increasing their rates. The end result will be that the U.S. taxpayer will pay additional tax to those countries, but no additional tax to the United States.

For these reasons, the elimination of percentage depletion on foreign deposits of oil and gas is unlikely to increase U.S. revenues significantly, and will merely increase the burden of foreign taxes on U.S. businesses. We recommend, therefore, that this provision be deleted from the bill. Our proposal with respect to the foreign tax credit, previously described, adequately deals with percentage depletion on foreign deposits by preventing the depletion allowance on foreign mineral production from being used to reduce U.S. tax on other income and will not induce the foreign country to raise its tax on the American company.

Mr. LONG. What the statement says, essentially, is that the amendment amounts to a tax increase on all companies doing business overseas. Some of those foreign countries have their laws written so that, automatically, the moment we increase our taxes on our companies operating abroad, the foreign countries increase their taxes, so that they can recoup for their countries the same amount that we increase the tax on those companies. The foreign countries' treasuries will get the money rather than our Treasury, because the company is entitled to a foreign tax credit against their U.S. taxes for taxes paid to foreign countries.

So, all the Senator's amendment would achieve is that those foreign countries that do not already automatically raise their taxes would change their laws or modify their procedures to do so very quickly. The Senator would simply take the money that would otherwise go to American citizens, American investors, and the American Government, and direct it to the treasury of some foreign potentate or foreign nation.

Mr. President, I think we are doing enough for those foreign countries now, without subsidizing the Sheik of Kuwait or the Government of Venezuela, and thereby penalizing American investors and the American Treasury.

Even the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) admitted yesterday that he agreed that if you reduce the depletion allowance overseas, it will just result in the foreign countries raising their taxes. Our Government would get nothing, and the money that would be brought back here and declared out in dividends and result in taxes being paid into this Treasury to the tune of $10 million, would not come in to our Treasury. An equal amount of money or perhaps twice that much now going to American investors, will simply be directed into foreign treasuries. It makes no sense whatsoever, and it tends to kill the goose that laid the golden egg.

Here is an industry that brings back $2 billion a year that it is making abroad in foreign countries by foreign investments with foreign labor—more than a billion dollars above what they send abroad for investment. This is one of the largest single favorable items we have in trying to offset our unfavorable balance of trade, and the industry is doing perhaps more than any other industry to offset our unfavorable balance of payments.

Of that money they bring back in, $455 million a year of it is paid out in dividends with the taxes on those dividends going into the U.S. Treasury; but some people just cannot be satisfied with that, apparently, because some folks in this country do not like the oil industry—an industry essential to our defense—and want to give it bad publicity. They propose to eliminate the depletion allowance and put the oil companies out of business overseas, while other countries are subsidizing their oil companies which are doing the same thing for those countries that American-owned companies are doing for ours. The effect is that they would be unable to continue to advance our national interest.

I guess people can vote to kill the goose that laid the golden egg. But if they do so, they are not doing it with the support of the Treasury, they are not doing it with the support of the Committee on Finance, and they are not doing it with the support of a lot of Senators who would vote for everything against the oil industry except this. They realize it does nothing to help our Government, does nothing to help our position anywhere in the world, defeats its own purpose, and for that reason, achieves nothing in the national interest. Anything it could achieve would be against the interests of American investors, American taxpayers, and the American Government—it would be a totally negative amendment, frustrating itself and achieving nothing. I hope, Mr. President, the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may require to the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McINTYRE. May I inquire, Mr. President, as to how much time remains to the distinguished Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I rise today to propose that we eliminate the oil depletion allowance on oil from foreign sources. I have an amendment at the desk, numbered 335, which is very similar to the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG). So I join with the Senator from Ohio in proposing to the Members of the Senate that we eliminate the oil depletion allowance on oil from foreign countries. This step has already been taken by the House in its own deliberations on this tax reform bill. If there is to be any logic at all to our tax policies governing the oil industry, it is imperative that we today follow the action of the House.

We have long been told that the purpose of the oil depletion allowance is to foster a strong domestic oil industry by promoting the exploration and development of oil here in the United States. Such an industry, we have been told, is essential to our national security.

Yet for many years there have existed in our tax laws a number of incentives which encourage also the exploration and development of oil from foreign sources. Indeed when the foreign depletion allowance is considered in conjunction with the system of foreign tax credits now enshrined in our tax structure, there are even greater tax incentives to explore for oil outside rather than within the United States. What a farce!

This basic anomaly is further heightened by the effects of the oil import quota system. We got stuck with that back in 1959. Not only are American taxpayers—counter to all recognized principles of national security—subsidizing the production of low-cost foreign oil, but they are also then prevented by the oil import program from ever getting that oil into the United States where it can be of benefit to American consumers. No wonder that I call the oil industry the secret government of the United States. Instead, this oil goes to Europe, Japan, and other foreign countries, whose own consumers derive the benefit of our subsidies.

Mr. President, this really strikes me as a most ridiculous situation. It is illogical and self-defeating. It uses American tax dollars to lower the costs of foreign consumers. And it is destructive of the very national security which the depletion allowance was designed to protect in the first place. I hope we will allow this absurdity to continue no longer and will act today to eliminate the foreign depletion allowance.

The need to do so is obvious to me. The Ways and Means Committee of the House thought so also in its own deliberations on the tax reform bill. It said:

> Present law also extends . . . percentage depletion allowances to income from oil and gas wells located in foreign countries. Insofar as percentage depletion is intended primarily to encourage the exploration and development of new wells, the granting of percentage depletion to income from foreign deposits results in a large loss of revenue without commensurate advantages.
> [Our] bill provides that percentage depletion is not to be allowed for foreign oil and gas wells. This permits percentage depletion for these items to be confined to areas where it will achieve its objective of stimulating exploration and discovery of domestic reserves.

Some, however, will urge specious arguments against our following the lead of the House. It might be worthwhile to take a moment and to examine how little merit there is in such arguments.

First, it may be alleged, the activities of our international oil companies are beneficial to our balance of payments. If we eliminate the foreign depletion allowance, this argument runs, we will diminish the contribution they have made to our international monetary position.

The answer to this argument is simple. I pointed out earlier that all foreign oil produced abroad with a subsidy from our Treasury must go to foreign consumers. Many of these are industrial consumers, who use this low-cost foreign oil to turn out a wide range of products at prices our own companies at home cannot match.

Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. McINTYRE. I thank the Chair.

Let me digress for a second and say that if we really want to help the balance of payments, let us do away with some part of the mandatory oil import quota program and allow the petrochemical industry to have a chance to operate with the benefit of low-cost foreign oil. Then we will see our balance of payments make a real improvement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, we have a tacit agreement that the Senator will help us with the time problem. However, I yield to the Senator on my time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is the Senator aware of the fact that if we permit foreign oil to capture 50 percent of the U.S. market for oil, it would create an enormous balance-of-payments problem?

How does the Senator propose we would earn enough foreign exchange, if 50 percent of the oil we consume in this country were foreign oil?

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, the Senator is talking about a situation that is a long way off. He says that the mandatory oil import program might be so affected that 50 percent of the oil consumed here would be foreign oil in competition with our domestic oil. We have not a chance of that. The Senator is talking of a nebulous fantasy.

Mr. LONG. That is what the Senator advocates.

Mr. McINTYRE. It is not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will contemplate what he is advocating. He should not advocate it unless he is willing to live with it.

I hope that the Senator will conceive of the possibility that if we have no mandatory oil import quota system, 50 percent of the oil in a short time would be foreign oil.

That would mean an enormous additional burden on our already unfavorable balance of payments.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, at the present time only about 12.2 percent of the oil we are consuming is foreign oil as opposed to domestic production.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator includes everything, it is about 25 percent.

Mr. McINTYRE. The Senator is now including Canada and Mexico?

Mr. LONG. And the west coast.

Mr. McINTYRE. In our effort to see this mandatory oil import program worn down and liberalized a little, we may at times indicate that perhaps the whole thing ought to be scrapped, but we are really trying only to reach the point where some important oil redounds to the benefit of the consumers in the area of the country from which I come, from the cold region of New England. At present this is not the case.

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows it does not apply to residual fuel oil.

Mr. McINTYRE. No. 2 fuel oil is not residual fuel oil. And it is No. 2 fuel oil with which we heat our homes in New England.

Mr. LONG. But it is coming in.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I do not want to be characterized as one who says that he wants to see the oil import program scrapped entirely without any offsetting protection for our national security.

To return, however, to my argument regarding the balance-of-payments effects of the foreign depletion allowance, I say what I said before, that if we really want to help the balance-of-payments, we should liberalize the mandatory oil import program and let the petrochemical people really get to work.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it would be easy enough to give them a ton of imports for every ton of exports so that they would have the benefit of the world market price on oil. However, they do not want that. They want something more advantageous. And insofar as they want more than they should have, it seems to me that they are demanding too much. That is why they cannot get it.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, if we want to improve our balance of payments, we will eliminate the foreign depletion allowance and we will do something more as well. We will modify our oil import program to allow a certain amount of foreign produced oil into the United States.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McINTYRE. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, would the Senator, the author of this amendment, tell me how this amendment would affect companies like the Occidental Petroleum Corp. in connection with the proposed Machiasport project, under which it seeks to bring in foreign oil for refining at a proposed refinery at Machiasport, Maine.

Mr. McINTYRE. How would the Libyan deposits of oil, which the Occidental Oil Co. currently controls, be affected pricewise?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. That is correct.

Mr. McINTYRE. My best information is that there might be a slight increase in the cost of that foreign oil but not enough to affect what both the distinguished Senator from Maine and I hope to see as a result of the Machiasport project, and that is some No. 2 fuel oil at reasonable prices in New England.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McINTYRE. I might add that possibly it would raise the price of Libyan oil about 5 cents a barrel. But the current cost of a foreign barrel of oil is $1.30 cheaper than our domestic oil, so there would still be tremendous benefits for New England consumers if the Machiasport project were approved.

Mr. President, I do accept the basic national security justification underlying our policies toward the petroleum industry. But there can certainly be a significant increase over present levels. If this occurs, and cheap foreign oil is made available to our petrochemical industry, its competitive position in foreign markets will be vastly improved. With its costs lowered, it will be able to reduce its prices abroad. Then we will see a real improvement in our balance of payments.

Another specious argument which has been urged on behalf of the foreign depletion allowance is closely related to the argument just discussed. It has been said that repeal of the foreign depletion allowance would interfere with the ability of our international oil companies to compete with companies of other nations.

I have no qualms about the ability of our international oil companies to compete in world markets. As a quick check of their operations in recent years makes clear, they have been eminently successful competitors. Between 1964 and 1968 the profits of the 12 largest companies in the industry rose $1.3 billion, or 33 percent. They will have little trouble adjusting to repeal of the foreign depletion allowance.

One reason the adjustment will be easy is that it will represent not a discrimination against them, but an equalization of their tax burden with the tax burden faced by companies of other nations. No other country in the world has an oil depletion allowance as liberal as our own, and many have none at all. Repeal of the foreign depletion allowance will put our international oil companies on an equal footing with those of other nations. I am sure they will do well in such an environment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. LONG. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McINTYRE. Finally, I might say a word about the revenue consequences of my proposal. The revenue gains will in fact be minimal. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has estimated them at a total of $35 million, $25 million in 1970 and $10 million in 1971. They will not be larger because the oil industry will still have available to it excessive amounts of foreign tax credits with which to offset any increases in its U.S. tax which might otherwise occur. Many of these tax credits arise, of course, not because of legitimate tax payments to foreign governments, but because what are really royalty payments can under our present tax laws still be treated as taxes. If we really want revenue consequences—if we really want to raise the funds which will make it possible to give low- and middle-income taxpayers the relief they want and so sorely deserve—we could accompany our repeal of the foreign depletion allowance with an overhaul of the industry's foreign tax credits.

All I ask today, however, is that we repeal the depletion allowance on oil from foreign sources. It would be a sound first step on the road to a more rational tax policy as regards the petroleum industry.

In conclusion, I want to say again, Mr. President, that if the rationale for a substantial oil depletion allowance is to better our national security, to give it a greater bulwark of strength by encouraging the exploration and development of domestic sources of oil, it is impossible for me to understand why we pursue a policy of encouraging the development of foreign sources of oil, by giving this depletion allowance on oil from foreign sources. It runs counter to the very purpose for which the oil depletion allowance is given domestically in the first place.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McINTYRE. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I compliment the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire on his remarks and join in them.

As the Senator knows, I submitted an amendment to the same effect to the Finance Committee, for its consideration. not only because of the irrationality which the Senator from New Hampshire has identified, but also for another——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, how much time remains on both sides?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has 9 minutes remaining, and the proponent has no time remaining.

Mr. LONG. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MUSKIE. It is said that the foreign depletion allowance is justified on national security grounds, the reason being that we need it in order to explore new sources of oil overseas; but, at the same time, we impose limitations upon the importation of this oil, and that policy is based upon the same argument—national security. I do not see how we can, at one and the same time, in the name of national security, explore and develop oil overseas and then prevent its importation into this country. It is for that irrational fact that I support the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McINTYRE. I could not agree more with the Senator from Maine.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. RUSSELL).

CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS, 1970

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 557, House Joint Resolution 1017, continuing resolution that will enable the departments for which appropriations bills have not been enacted to stay in business after this weekend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1017) making further continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1970, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this is a continuing resolution, in the commonly accepted form, which extends until the end of the present session of Congress the authority of the agencies whose appropriation bills have not yet been enacted to continue operation at the same tempo and under the same conditions as were prescribed in Public Law 91–117 signed November 14, 1969. I do not see any alternative we have.

The Committee on Appropriations met yesterday and ordered reported to the Senate the military construction and District of Columbia appropriation bills and House Joint Resolution 1017, making further continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1970. The current continuing resolution will expire this Saturday night, December 6.

House Joint Resolution 1017, which passed the House of Representatives December 1, extends the expiration date of the current resolution from December 6 to the sine die adjournment day of the present session of Congress. Passage of this resolution will enable any department or agency of the Government, whose annual appropriation bill for fiscal year 1970 has not become law, to operate until the sine die adjournment.

As of today, four of the appropriation bills have been signed into law—the Treasury-Post Office, Department of the Interior, independent offices, and the Department of Agriculture appropriation bills. There are three appropriation bills in conference—the State-Justice-Commerce, the legislative, and the public works appropriation bills. On the public works appropriation bill, the conference report has been signed and is expected to be cleared for the President's signature shortly. As indicated earlier, the District of Columbia and the military construction appropriation bills were reported by the committee yesterday and are now on the Senate Calendar. The Subcommittee on the Department of Transportation is meeting this afternoon to mark up that appropriation bill, and the present plan is for the Labor-Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation bill to be marked up in subcommittee on Tuesday, December 9, or Wednesday, December 10.

There are three appropriation bills still in the House—the Department of Defense, foreign aid, and supplemental appropriation bills. Hearings on all three of these bills are virtually completed or are in progress in the Senate committee.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be imperative that if those departments or agencies of the Government which have not yet received their funds for fiscal year 1970 are to continue functioning, the joint resolution should be passed. I therefore urge the passage of House Joint Resolution 1017.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Where seems to be the slowup? Is it on the Senate side?

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, I do not like to undertake to assess the blame. I think it goes all the way around. In the first place, the President did not get his revisions in the budget here until April 15 of this year. That threw Congress off stride.

Then, without casting aspersions on the House, they have been very slow in getting the bills over here. For example, the Defense Department appropriation bill, which carries about one-half of the total expenditures, has not yet been taken up in the House and it will not be until next week. My committee has had extensive hearings. We have compiled several volumes of hearings.

But under this constitutional fiction, and that is all it is, that only the House can originate appropriation bills, we are compelled to wait until they get to us from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the resolution not count on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. It was not my purpose to cast any reflection on the House. I have great admiration and affection for that body. But I think we, as Senators, are responsible for the operation of the Senate.

Is it not true that as bills have come over here they have been processed with considerable dispatch by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RUSSELL. With a few possible exceptions they have been considered and dispatched more expeditiously than in all the time I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which has been more than 35 years. I regret very much that the Senate, by implication, has been made somewhat responsible. If the Senate has done anything that is wrong it is because we have not lived up to our responsibility as a coequal body and given more exhaustive and painstaking consideration to these bills. If we had done so we would only have aggravated the already bad condition.

Mr. CURTIS. I remember the long time it took to enact the military authorization bill. That was not the fault of the committee. The Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) was in the Chamber and he and other Members pushed as fast as possible. Bills undoubtedly are delayed in conference. There is always some time taken to iron out differences.

Mr. RUSSELL. There have been delays in two or three of them in conference but not undue delays. As a matter of fact, there are three appropriations bills still in the House that have never come over, and they are the Department of Defense, foreign aid, and the supplemental appropriation bills. We have already practically completed hearings on those three bills in the Senate, although they are still in the House committee.

Mr. CURTIS. There is nothing to do but to pass the continuing resolution for the essential functions of Government but I am sure we all agree this is not a wise budgeting, appropriating, or spending process.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a very unfortunate situation that the departments of Government have to operate in this manner for 6 months, as they do in some cases. It is very unfortunate. I hope we are never confronted with this situation again.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask a question of the distinguished Senator?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Is it not also true that appropriation bills must await passage of the authorization measures, and that in several instances the fact that the appropriation bills have had to be delayed can be explained by the fact that the authorization measures have not been passed?

Mr. RUSSELL. In at least two instances that is markedly true.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am sorry to detain the Senator. My question, I hope, will not be troublesome to him.

We had quite a dispute about education in the last continuing resolution. I gather that what this does is to carry on whatever we achieved.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is my construction. I do not see how any other interpretation could be placed on it.

Mr. JAVITS. Bearing in mind what the Senator from West Virginia said, that authorization legislation is a problem, I am wondering if any thought has been given to what might happen if even by sine die adjournment any area should not have authorizing legislation.

Mr. RUSSELL. That situation has not arisen yet but I assume Congress would not adjourn sine die without taking appropriate action. I am hopeful this situation will straighten itself out. We are working diligently. I think we will get the bills through before the end of this session.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield so that I may ask one other question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Would it not be desirable, so that Senators will know what the situation is, to have a memorandum placed in the RECORD as to the parliamentary situation which would exist if we have appropriation bills before us but no authorization bills?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sorry. Will the Senator repeat his suggestion.

Mr. JAVITS. I was suggesting a memorandum as to the parliamentary situation which would exist if the House sent us an appropriation bill, and we had no authorization law; if they did that, for example, in foreign aid.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I was thinking of the foreign aid bill. The authorizing legislation has not been passed. I think it could be passed very shortly if we confine our attention in the Senate committee to the amounts of appropriations only. I understand the Committee on Appropriations has already had hearings an the appropriation bill for foreign aid.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Subcommittee on Foreign Aid Appropriations is having hearings at the present time.

Mr. AIKEN. How long after the authorization bill has been approved would it take the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RUSSELL. That varies so greatly it would be impossible to make a categorical response. But I think it could be handled rapidly if the authorizing legislation were passed. As a matter of fact, if the House sends us an appropriation bill even without an authorization, we could still take it up in the Senate.

Mr. AIKEN. The committee had planned to have a meeting this morning. I am speaking of the Committee on Foreign Relations. However, it was stopped by the objection to any committees meeting. We hope to have a meeting tomorrow morning if there is no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. The subcommittee had been holding hearings on the appropriation bill.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, the subcommittee has completed its hearings on foreign aid, except for appeals. The House bill will be over here, I was told last night by the chairman of the House committee, on Tuesday, and this subcommittee will be ready to deal with appeals at that time. The jurisdiction is another factor.

Mr. AIKEN. I think there is a way to get authorization bills through promptly by the early part of next week, but whether we will do it remains to be seen.

Mr. McGEE. Through which device; the continuing resolution?

Mr. AIKEN. No, we have had continuing resolutions several times.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the House passes an appropriation bill based on an authorization bill they passed, that bill would be in order here?

Mr. McGEE. Yes. We will have the House bill on appropriations next Tuesday.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I see no alternative except to pass this continuing resolution. This is a sorry way to do business though. It is nearly Christmas and several appropriation bills remain to be passed. I think the Senate could get these bills through if Senators would limit themselves in debate and in the number of amendments they offer.

The one big hurdle that I see is the Defense appropriation bill. If we take 2 months on the appropriation bill as we did on the authorization bill, the appropriation bill would not clear until spring. But this morning the President said if Congress adjourns without passing the appropriation bills, he will immediately call us back into session. I think he would be right in doing that.

I agree with the statement made by the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. We have a saying in my part of the country: "He spoke himself out." I hope we have about spoken ourselves out on the military authorization bill and that we would not have lengthy debate when we reach the appropriation bill. I think it should be fully debated. But I would not like to see a week or two of repetitious statements, repeating what was said when the authorization was here.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. May I say this, and I hope I shall not be thought critical of any of my colleagues, but during my service here in the Senate, some of its most effective Members were men like Senator George, from the Senator's own State, and Senators Taft and Vandenberg, who usually confined themselves to 30-minute speeches, some of them only 15; but now many speeches are 2 to 3 hours in length. I hope I am not hurting anyone's feelings when I say that. I am only trying to expedite most important legislation that must be passed before we adjourn.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from North Dakota is certainly not hurting my feelings. In the past, I have often spoken at great length, but the time has come when I now confine my remarks to a great extent. The causes for which I fought in the past have vanished.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The distinguished Senator from Georgia made reference to the fact that the new administration took a brief time at the beginning of the year to revise the budget——

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not say that in a critical sense. I understand their reasons, but that was one of the causes of delay.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I realize that. As we look toward the next session of Congress, to begin shortly after the New Year, I am sure we expect and want the administration, in accordance with its constitutional responsibility, to have a new budget ready to submit shortly after the next Congress convenes. Would the Senator agree with me, as the end of this year approaches with a number of appropriation bills not yet passed, and as we operate the Government on the basis of a continuing resolution, that it would be very difficult for the Bureau of the Budget and the administration to prepare a budget to meet that deadline?

Mr. RUSSELL. It would add to their difficulties. I do not think it would make it impossible because they could base the new budget on the old budget and the bills as passed by the two Houses. But, certainly, it would add to their difficulties. I think the President's urgency is completely justified. Insofar as the Senate Appropriations Committee is concerned, we are doing everything in our power to obviate the necessity for any such action. We cannot take up bills until they are brought over here.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Georgia. I join him in urging that the joint resolution be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1017) was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state that the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will be glad to allow other Senators, speaking in opposition, to make comments at this time if they wish; otherwise, I think I have made my position clear with regard to the proposed amendment. The Treasury recognizes that adoption of the amendment would mean the Government would make no money in the long run. Only in the first year would it make any money. By increasing the tax on American oil companies, it would be an incentive for foreign nations to increase their taxes on the companies doing business there. Foreign countries have done so in the past. Some of them do so most drastically, having drafted laws so that they automatically increase taxes, even without their parliaments meeting. The result is that foreign countries would gain from any tax increase involved here, merely by raising their taxes.

The companies would be entitled to a credit for the additional foreign tax paid against the tax paid to this country, with the result that the companies would pay the tax not to our Treasury but to some foreign treasury and this Government would lose money rather than make it. Our Treasury would make money only for a few months to a year—only for the time it would take the foreign countries to change their laws in order to scoop into their treasuries the money which otherwise would go into ours. Starting the second year, this Nation would lose about $10 million in taxes on dividends that would have been paid except for the increase in foreign taxes which reduces the companies' earnings.

The amendment also would hurt our balance of payments. Even the Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS), who has made strong arguments for cutting the depletion allowance, and who has been one of the most consistent opponents of the depletion allowance, took the floor, when there were not many Senators in the Chamber, to say that he felt certain that this amendment would defeat its own purpose at a cost to American investors and to the Government.

It would achieve nothing to benefit this Nation. It would only benefit the foreign treasuries. Therefore, there is no good reason why the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. President, I am willing to yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I thank the Senator from Louisiana. Mr. President, very definitely, if this amendment is adopted and we go along with the other body on this foreign oil depletion matter, our Treasury will benefit next year to the extent of some $25 million.

Let me say, finally, that it has seemed to me that the arguments made by the Senator from Louisiana, who is the chairman of the Finance Committee, are not valid in that they are purely speculative. This amendment should be agreed to. It will not be for the benefit of a sheik in Kuwait and his wives, but for the benefit of American taxpayers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has now expired on the amendment.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH) would vote "yea."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) is absent on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) is detained on official business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 68, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 351

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, which would delete from the bill a provision which exempts certain gas pipeline contracts from the repeal date of the 7-percent investment tax credit. This matter was thoroughly explained in the House by Congressman BOB ECKHARDT, of Houston, Tex., and other Members of the House, and was explained to the Senate Finance Committee in July by Congressman ECKHARDT, and others. It is not a new matter. It was discussed in the House and in the Senate Finance Committee.

One of the most significant tax reform proposals contained in H.R. 13270 is the repeal of the 7-percent investment tax credit. It is widely recognized that the investment tax credit has long since outlived any usefulness that it might have ever had and is now nothing more than a vast loophole through which the Government loses billions of taxable dollars each year.

H.R. 13270 provides for the permanent repeal of the investment tax credit in the case of property acquired or construction of which is begun after April 18, 1969. However, to avoid economic injustice to those taxpayers who have commenced construction or acquired property pursuant to a binding contract entered into before April 8, 1969, the bill specifically exempts such taxpayers from the repeal of the investment credit and makes the credit available to them. This is a fair and reasonable exemption since it has never been the policy of this country to penalize those who in good faith have relied on existing laws.

Unfortunately, H.R. 13270 does not stop with this one justified exemption from the general repeal of the investment tax credit. There has also been inserted into H.R. 13270 a special exemption for gas pipeline contracts which cannot be justified on any basis except that its proponents desire additional special treatment for an industry which is already specially protected and specially favored by our laws. The exemption to which I refer may be found on page 420, at line 21 of H.R. 13270 and provides:

(B) Where, in order to perform a binding contract or contracts in effect on April 18, 1969, (i) the taxpayer is required to construct, reconstruct, erect, or acquire property specified in any order of a Federal regulatory agency for which application was filed before April 19, 1969, (ii) the property is to be used to transport one or more products under such contract or contracts, and (iii) one or more parties to the contract or contracts are required to take or to provide more than 50 percent of the products to be transported over a substantial portion of the expected useful life of the property, then such property shall be pre-termination property.

On its face, this seemingly innocuous language would not appear to be a vehicle for serving a special interest. However, on closer examination it is clear that the only purpose for this provision is to grant to certain gas pipelines a special privilege in dealing with the investment tax credit which no other industry or taxpayer in America has.

To appreciate the necessity for striking this insidiously clever provision from H.R. 13270, it is important to understand: First, the nature of a gas pipeline contract; second, why there is no reason for a special treatment of these contracts; and third, the history of gas pipelines and the investment tax credit.

I. THE NATURE OF A GAS PIPELINE CONTRACT

A gas pipeline contract, unlike the other contracts to which the exemption from the repeal date of the investment tax credit applies, is not a contract for the purchase of capital goods but is a contract for service or supply. That is, the gas pipeline contract obligates the company to supply its customers with a specified number of units of natural gas. Nowhere in this contract between the company and the customer does the gas pipeline company obligate itself to build or expand its facilities to perform the contract. However, section 7C of the Natural Gas Act of 1938 requires:

No natural-gas company or person which will be a natural-gas company upon completion of any proposed construction or extension shall engage in the transportation or sale of natural gas, subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission, or undertake the construction or extension of any facilities therefor, or acquire or operate any such facilities or extensions thereof, unless there is in force with respect to such natural-gas company a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Commission authorizing such acts or operations.

Therefore, until the FPC grants the gas pipeline company a certificate of public convenience and necessity, the company cannot lawfully fulfill its contract to the customer. Thus the certificate is a necessary prerequisite to a valid binding gas pipeline contract.

In determining whether to grant a certificate to a gas pipeline company, the FPC takes into consideration whether the proposed expansion in service is physically and economically feasible. The FPC will and often does, allow a gas pipeline company to withdraw its application for a certificate upon a showing of just cause. The "just cause" for which an application may be withdrawn might well include a showing by the company of a loss in profits by the repeal of the investment tax credit.

Furthermore, the regulations of the FPC afford a company with a way of having the application dismissed by the FPC. Section 157.12 of the FPC regulations provides that in the absence of a showing of good cause, "failure of an applicant to go forward on the date set for hearings and present its full case in support of its application will constitute grounds for summary dismissal of the application and the termination of the proceedings." Therefore, without showing "just cause" an application can be dismissed by inaction on the part of the gas pipeline company.

What this amounts to is that gas pipeline companies are not subject to the same economic hardships as taxpayers who have bound themselves contractually to construct, reconstruct or acquire property. The simple truth is that without the certificate of public necessity the gas pipeline company is not contractually bound to do anything. This gives the gas pipeline company the right to have the benefit of the investment tax credit for contracts that they may void at will.

There is no justification for this type of special advantage.

II. WHY THIS SPECIAL TREATMENT IS NOT NECESSARY

As I have previously pointed out, these gas pipeline contracts are not binding on the company in the absence of a certificate of public necessity and convenience. Thus, this does not justify this special exemption. Are there any economic reasons for this special treatment? A review of the facts clearly reveals that the answer is "No."

The gas pipelines are strong and financially healthy. It is one of the very few operations in America which is guaranteed a profit by the Federal Government. The rates charged for natural gas are regulated by the FPC so as to assure the gas pipelines a reasonable profit each year. Very few other industries in America can be assured that year in and year out they will be operating in the black.

Since 1958, the revenues and assets of the gas pipeline companies have doubled. According to a recent industrial survey conducted by Standard & Poor's, the revenues of gas pipeline companies are expected to reach new highs in 1969. The American Gas Association estimates that gas sales in 1969 will reach 152,650 million therms. This is an increase of 5.7 percent from 1968.

The outlook for future growth is also quite encouraging. The American Gas Association estimates an increase in sales of 6 percent for each year from 1967 to 1980. By 1985, gas utilities sales are expected to reach 356 billion therms. This is an increase of 144 percent from the amount of gas sold in 1968.

In addition to the increase in sales, the rate of return to the companies is also increasing. At present, the rate of return on old contracts is between 6½ and 6⅓ percent. However, the FPC recently granted one company an annual rate of return of 7¼ percent. There are numerous other applications pending before the FPC which request returns of 8 to 8½ percent.

III. HISTORY OF GAS PIPELINE INDUSTRY AND THE INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

The alleged purpose behind the enactment of the investment tax credit in 1962, was that it would encourage business investments in new machinery and equipment. The plain facts reveal that the gas pipeline industry never needed enactment of the 7-percent investment tax credit, the gas pipeline industry did not suffer from lack of growth. From 1957 to 1961 the net investment in gas utility plants rose from $6 to $8 billion. After the enactment of the investment tax credit, the net investment in gas utilities plants grew at about the same rate, $8 to $10 billion. This clearly shows that the investment tax credit was not needed to stimulate growth.

The whole history of the investment tax credit and the gas pipeline industry has been one of special and unjustified favoritism. To begin with, the gas pipeline was allowed the 7-percent credit, whereas the other major public utilities were allowed only 3 percent. What was the reason for this? I submit that the only reason for it was the strength of the gas pipeline industry's lobby.

Furthermore, the FPC is prohibited by a 1964 amendment to the Internal Revenue Act from treating a reduction in income tax, arising from the investment tax credit, as a reduction in the gas pipeline cost for determining rates. Thus, a gas pipeline company is free either to retain the tax savings for reinvestment or payments to stockholders, or pass along the tax savings to its customers in the form of volunteer rate reductions. It should come as no surprise that according to figures compiled by the FPC in 1967 alone, more than 94 percent of the amounts generated and utilized by gas pipeline companies from that investment tax credit was retained by the companies and less than 6 percent passed on to the consumer by rate reductions.

IV. CONCLUSION

This provision of H.R. 13270 which my amendment is designed to eliminate is the sort of special interest legislation which has generated the present demand for tax reform by the majority of the people of the United States. Our people are tired of carrying the greater portion of this Nation's tax burden while their own elected representatives write special exemptions into the tax laws for big business.

The people of the United States have challenged the 91st Congress to reform this Nation's tax laws. They expect their interest to come first for a change. Special exemptions and favoritism for industries such as gas pipelines will further undermine the people's confidence in our Government.

I submit that it is time for Congress to turn its attention to problems and needs of average Americans. These people cannot afford expensive lobbying efforts to get their point of view across. They must depend on us to represent them. Let us show them that we are concerned by closing this loophole. President Grover Cleveland once warned:

> But to the extent that the mass of our citizens are inordinately burdened beyond any useful public purpose and for the benefit of a favored few, the Government, under the pretext of an exercise of its taxing power, enters gratuitously into partnership with these favorites, to their advantage and to the injury of a vast majority of our people.

I urge all of my colleagues to give my amendment careful consideration and join with me in remedying this inequity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD the statement of Congressman BOB ECKHARDT, of the Eighth Congressional District of Texas which was given before the Senate Finance Committee by Congressman ECKHARDT on July 8, 1969.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. BOB ECKHARDT, A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. ECKHARDT. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I have a written statement which I would like to ask permission to be filed as stated, and I shall only deal largely with one part of the statement.

Senator TALMADGE. Without objection, it will be inserted in the record in full and you may summarize as you see fit.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I would not be so presumptuous as to reiterate the general arguments against the surtax extension to this committee after, of course, there has been so much said by persons who have had so much experience with it and have said it perhaps far better than I can.

I would though like to address myself to the point that has raised most of the questions of this committee and that is the exception with respect to natural gas pipelines.

In my experience in the Texas legislature for a good number of years before I came to Congress I noted a considerable reach of gas pipelines in that body, but I was rather surprised that its reach was as long as it does appear to be.

As the committee, of course, understands, the bill provides that there be three requirements for gas pipelines to come under the exception. First, there must be a contract to supply gas; and, second, there must be an application before the FPC, and then a certain amount of the gas must be transported by the company seeking to obtain the exemption over the facilities thus designated.

The point that I should like to make very clear here and, of course, I understand that the committee understands this, but I fear that perhaps it has not been made clear enough to the public, that the contract involved here is a contract of supply of gas rather than a contract with an equipment supplier. I do not believe this was at all clear on the debate on the floor of the House. I think it is extremely important that it be made as clear as possible for the public's attention.

In that debate it was said by one of the chief supporters of the amendment, a Texas colleague, that they, the gas pipelines, "Should not be denied the benefit of the credit because some Federal agency is sitting aside and refusing to act."

The implication of the floor debate was that a contract for the purchase of capital goods was binding as between seller and purchaser, contingent only upon FPC approval constituting the exception to be qualified. Thus, Mr. Bush, with whom the amendment originated in the committee, in answer to my question said, "The contract spells out the equipment required and if these people have a bona fide contract, they should not be denied the benefit of the credit."

Well, in fact, the contract only spells out the obligation of the gas pipeline company to supply gas to the person or the municipality or the company to whom the supplier is to supply the gas.

The place where the equipment is described is in the application, not in the contract, and I believe that the discussion implied that the contract was, in fact, the contract to supply equipment, which of course, it is not.

Mr. Boggs, who carried the bill on the floor, equated the provision to the ordinary contract for purchase of capital goods in the following language.

"The contract has been entered into and qualifies as a binding contract. If you were to build a plant * * * and no equipment has been installed, but they have simply entered into a contract, a binding contract, prior to April 19, that equipment is eligible for the full 7 percent."

Now, I had previously been told by an Under Secretary of the Treasury that such was all that the amendment did. Now in candor Mr. Boggs did at another point explain the amendment accurately, and I do not attribute to anyone an intention to mislead. But the matter is technical and complex and needs clarification, both as to its provisions and as to its justification.

In fact, the contracts in question are not contracts to acquire property but are rather contracts to supply gas. These contracts are not binding without a certificate of approval from the Federal Power Commission, and it is in these certificates that the only requirement of designation of the capital goods to be acquired is made.

In order for a gas pipeline company to obtain approval for an extension of service it must file an application with the Federal Power Commission within which it must include, among other things, an analysis of the equipment needed to fulfill the contract. This includes a detailed estimate of total capital costs of the proposed facilities for which the application is made. But unlike the case of other pretermination contracts, contracts here are not binding without the certificate of approval, and hence the companies involved are not likely to be injured by the withdrawal of the investment tax credit. The FPC will allow gas pipeline companies to withdraw an application for an extension of service if the company can show just cause. Just cause might well include a reduction in the profitability of the contract. Presumably a loss of the investment tax credit would indicate lower profits.

This is a means of escape from the contract which would not be as profitable as anticipated. But there is another even surer safeguard that pipelines have with respect to the withdrawal of investment credit that ordinary businesses do not have, and this is based on their status as a public utility. As a public utility, of course, they are entitled to a reasonable profit, a reasonable rate of return on their investment. Therefore, they have been granted both the reasonable return on their investment, plus the overriding advantage of the investment credit of 7 percent.

In 1964 Congress provided that the question of the rate structure and the return on the investment should not be affected by the 7-percent investment credit. So, in effect, the 7-percent investment credit is cream on top of the profit.

Now, the main point I want to make is not so much the technical question of whether or not this equates a pipeline's position with that of an ordinary business, but I would like to simply make the point that pipelines do not need special treatment. They do not need the pretermination condition at all.

In the first place, it is impossible for me to see why Congress granted to the pipeline companies a 7-percent investment credit in the first place when to all other public utilities it only granted a 3-percent investment credit. In addition to this, we give pipelines a special treatment in an area in which they do not need special treatment, because they are protected by their status as a utility, and they are also protected by the fact that there are means by which they may withdraw their application.

Now, I am not so sure how much this means in dollars, as Mr. Vanik is. I respect his view on the thing, and I certainly respect his figures, and I know that he most carefuly checked with the FPC with respect to those figures, but I believe it is very, very difficult to come out with a precise figure without very deep investigation of the details of the applications.

But I think this can be said, that over the period of 5 years the pipelines have received, in these 7-percent investment credit accruals and use they have received somewhere around $250 million. Now that means that they are getting an advantage from the investment credit at the rate of about $50 million per year.

Now, the applications are seasonal. They usually come at the beginning of the year or they come about the middle of the year. I do not know to what extent this special treatment would step up the time that the investment credit applies, but I know what it would set it up substantially—if it would set it up in effect as much as 6 months we might estimate that the amount in investment credit accrued, if this exemption is passed, would be at least $25 million or half the $50 million figure.

Now, I do not set this down as a positive figure. I do not know precisely how much it would be, but I know it would be a very substantial advantage to gas pipelines which I do not think we need to give them, in all fairness.

Now, I would like to point out here that as I understood investment credit, it had originally been established in order to encourage rebuilding of old plant, also to encourage and increase the GNP of the Nation, but I do not think it was necessary with respect to gas pipelines in the beginning, certainly not necessary at 7 percent, or more than twice the figure that was given, say, to electrical utilities.

I think this is clearly pointed out by the fact that natural gas utility sales were 100.81 billion therms in 1962. In 1967 they were 133.42 billion therms. This is from Gas Facts, 1968. This is an extremely fast growing business that does not need encouragement to continue to grow, because obviously the larger the plant and the larger the expenditure in capital investment, the larger the return.

Gas pipelines are entitled to make a reasonable return on investment. I do not know any reason in the world why they should have enjoyed a 7-percent investment credit for all this time in the first place, and then to give them special treatment with respect to closing out investment credit seems to me to be an extremely improvident thing for Congress to do.

Now, I have considerably more detail with respect to this growth that would show that the total amount of plant, of net plant, for the period immediately preceding investment credit had grown at about the same rate or even at a greater rate than it grew subsequent to investment credit. Of course, I have that in the statement in order to show that investment credit was not needed in the first place.

But what I am arguing here is that gas pipelines do not need special treatment and should not be given special treatment by this legislation.

PREPARED STATEMENT BY HON. BOB ECKHARDT, A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

SUMMARY

A. Outline of statement

I. Opposition to the surtax on general grounds:

(a) Review of past opposition: offsetting of the effects of the surtax by rising war expenditures—fear of more of the same.

(b) In full agreement with the Senate as to need for tax reform.

II. Opposition to the surtax respecting exemptions:

(a) Explanation of the loophole in the House-passed bill that allows the gas pipeline industry an unnecessary and unjust exemption from the April 18 deadline for repeal of the 7% investment tax credit.

(b) Because the government allows this industry a guaranteed rate of profit. Investment tax credit not warranted in the first place.

III. Need for responsible, effective alternatives:

(c) Excess profits tax.

B. Specific recommendations

I. Continue the higher withholding rates. The economic restraining effects not lessened and the pressure for tax reform continues unabated. Should the economy turn downward, Congress could lower withholding rates to their normal level and permit refunds; otherwise, institute the surtax retroactively.

II. Reinstate an excess profits tax. This would shift the burden from the poor and middle income groups to those benefiting most from the conflict in Southeast Asia.

III. Institute "excess interest" tax analogous to excess profits tax. Revenues generated by this tax could be used to subsidize home mortgages and municipal bond markets.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, I appreciate this opportunity to come before you on perhaps the most pressing and urgent problems facing our Nation today. No one can argue with the fact that we are in the midst of of rampant inflation and that we are experiencing some of the tightest money conditions in United States' history. The appropriate question that we should be considering is not whether economic restraint is needed—no responsible legislator or competent economist could doubt that fact—but rather, what form this economic restraint should take.

I voted against the 10% surtax extension, just as I voted against its original adoption last year. I shall state briefly why I oppose this particular form of economic restraint, the defects that appear in the House-passed bill, and my recommendations for responsible and effective alternatives to the surtax.

I

I opposed the imposition of this tax in 1968 because I did not feel that it would succeed in halting inflation. This is not to say that I have no faith in what is popularly referred to as the "new" economics; on the contrary I believe very strongly in the efficacy of fiscal and monetary policy. But these policies can only succeed if they are not subjected to other government operations whose economic effects are in the direct opposite direction. I am referring, of course, to the expansionary and inflationary effects of the continued high spending on the war in Vietnam. This is how I made my case against the surtax last year and I see little reason to expect the situation to be any different this year. If our people are taxed—in the guise of fiscal constraint—when any meaningful disinflationary effects are negated by war expenditures, the effect is only to add the tax burden to the burdens of high interest and high prices.

Also, I wish to add my voice to the many urging that we not continue the surtax without adding meaningful tax reform. The surcharge is a tax on a tax, and, if one manages to avoid paying any taxes, he automatically escapes the surcharge. How can we, with a straight face, tell income earners and honest sharers of the tax burden that they must bear the burdens of fiscal restraint when many people with largely exempt incomes, capable of making many extravagant purchases, are not forced to curb their spending or fairly share the burden? I am heartened by the sentiment in the Senate for closing the many nefarious tax loopholes before final approval is given for extension of the surtax.

II

Now, I would like to point out to the Committee a very serious inequity in the House bill that passed on June 30.

As you know, one very important provision of the bill was the repeal of the 7% investment tax credit. Let me first say that I am very much in favor of this action for it has been effectively demonstrated that the investment credit is the primary contributor to the inflationary expansion of investment demand.

The bill sets the repeal date as of April 18, 1969 but quite correctly makes provision for construction begun, and binding contracts in effect, on or before that date. The general rule is that pre-termination property, i.e., property eligible to receive the investment tax credit, includes "any property . . . (that) is constructed, reconstructed, erected, or acquired pursuant to a contract which was, on April 18, 1969, and at all times thereafter, binding on the taxpayer." If such facts do not prevail, action taken after April 18 does not accrue an investment credit.

But among the exceptions is this one:

"Where, in order to perform a binding contract . . . in effect on April 18, 1969, (i) the taxpayer is required to . . . acquire property specified in any order of a federal regulatory agency for which application was filed before April 19, 1969, (ii) the property is to be used to transport one or more products under such contract . . . and (iii) one or more parties to the contract . . . are required to take or to provide more than 50% of the products to be transported over a substantial portion of the expected useful life of the property, then such property shall be pre-termination property."

This is the section (Section 4a) of the bill that I have a strong objection to.

The report accompanying H.R. 12290 explains this seemingly harmless exception to the general rule defining pre-termination property.

"An example of the type of case covered by this provision would be a situation where a company has entered into a binding contract to transport fuel through a pipeline for another party who will provide more than 50 percent of the fuel to be transported over a substantial portion of the estimated useful life of the pipeline. The provision would be applicable in this case, however, only if the company had filed prior to April 19, 1969, its application with the Federal regulatory agency for an order permitting it to construct the pipeline."

In sum, this provision is presented as one justly extending the deadline for those companies entering into contracts for which necessary Federal agency certification is not received by April 18. The major beneficiary of this exemption would be the gas pipeline industry. One of their chief supporters in the House, a Texas colleague, stated: ". . . they should not be denied the benefit of the credit because some Federal agency is sitting aside and refusing to act."

This is a dangerous, unnecessary and inequitable provision, and explanation of it on the floor of the House was misleading.

The implication on the floor debate was that a contract for purchase of capital goods which is binding as between seller and purchaser contingent only upon FPC approval constituted the exception that would qualify.

Thus, Mr. Bush, with whom the amendment originated in the committee, in answer to my question said: "* * * the contract spells out the equipment required and if these people have a bona fide contract, they should not be denied the benefit of the credit."

Mr. Boggs, who carried the bill on the floor, equated the provision to the ordinary contract for purchase of capital goods in the following language: "* * * the contract has been entered into and qualifies as a binding contract. If you were to build a plant . . . and no equipment has been installed, but they simply entered into a contract, a binding contract, prior to April 19, that equipment is eligible for the full 7 percent."

I had previously been told by an Under Secretary of the Treasury that such was all that the amendment did. In candor, Mr. Boggs did at another point explain the amendment accurately. I do not attribute to anyone an intention to mislead, but the matter is technical and complex and needs clarification, both as to its provisions and its justification.

In fact, the contracts in question are not contracts to acquire property but are rather contracts to supply gas. These contracts are not binding without a certificate of approval from the Federal Power Commission, and it is in these certificates that the only requirement of designation of the capital goods to be acquired is made. In order for a gas pipeline company to obtain approval for an extension of service it must file an application with the Federal Power Commission within which it must include, among other things, an analysis of the equipment needed to fulfill the contract. This includes a detailed estimate of total capital cost of the proposed facilities for which application is made.

But, unlike the case of other pre-termination contracts, the contracts here are not binding without the certificate of approval; and hence the companies involved are not likely to be injured by the withdrawal of the investment tax credit. The FPC will allow a gas pipeline company to withdraw its application for an extension of service if the company can show just cause. Just cause might well include a reduction in the probability of the contract. Presumably a loss of the investment tax credit would indicate lower profits.

This is a means of escape from contract which would not be as profitable as anticipated. But there is another even surer safeguard against an improvident contract (in anticipation of investment credit) which might actually result in a loss.

As a public utility, the gas pipeline industry has its rates regulated by the government, and these rates are set so as to give the company a reasonable rate of profit on its investment. If the rate of profit is set, the company cannot possibly be stuck with an unprofitable venture. True, it may not generate an investment credit, which is "cream" on top of profit, but it may be presumed that the utility would have expanded its market for the sake of profit alone. It did not act to its detriment envisioning, improvidently, an investment credit.

Obviously there is, and was, plenty of inducement to improve and increase plant from gas pipelines without any investment tax credit. Even before the 7% investment tax credit provision was enacted, net gas utility plant for the entire Nation had grown from about $6 billion to about $8 billion from 1957 through 1961. After the enactment of the investment tax credit, through the next six years, net gas utility plant grew at about the same amount, from about $8 billion to about $10 billion. It is apparent from these figures that the investment tax credit was not needed to encourage investment in plant and it apparently did not affect such investment.

Actually, the gas pipeline industry has grown at a rate at least comparable to the other utilities which received only 3% investment tax credit. There is no apparent reason why the pipelines were favored, but in the Revenue Act of 1964 Congress favored them again by eliminating any authority on the part of the Federal Power Commission to use the investment tax credit without the consent of the company involved in determining its cost of service. The tax savings from the investment tax credit could thus be used by the companies for reinvestment or dividends without regard to their rate of return.

From 1962 through 1967 the interstate natural gas pipeline companies generated $296,124,000 in investment tax credits. Of this amount, they utilized and retained $247,106,000. (Statistics of Interstate Natural Gas Pipeline Companies, 1967, Federal Power Commission, p. ix.)

Now the gas transmission companies are again asking for special treatment, as if they needed special relief. Are they weak? Are they an industry with a declining growth pattern? Quite the contrary, the industry has grown by one third in the last five years. In 1962, natural gas utility sales were 100.81 billion therms and in 1967 they were 133.42 billion therms. (See 1968 "Gas Facts" of American Gas Association.)

It is just not possible to put an exact dollar value on this special provision in the surtax and investment credit bill as to how much it benefits gas pipelines. But it clearly would defer the cutoff date for withdrawing the investment tax credit. As I have pointed out, they never needed it or deserved it in the first place; and, at more than twice the figure granted other utilities, it was nothing but a windfall for the stockholders—not the consumers.

The windfall was at an average of about $50 million a year. Typically, in past years, the highest number of rate applications by the gas pipelines have been in the winter months. In the winter of 1967 and 1968 approximately as many permits were filed as during the entire remainder of the year. This was not exactly the situation in the FPC fiscal year 1968–69. In that year over 70% of the applications had been filed by January 1.

I am frank to say, I cannot tell the significance of the timing of the applications other than to say an adroit timing of applications well in advance of actual equipment purchases could keep the 7% investment credit going for a considerable time. If this extended time be 6 months, the special treatment in this law is worth $25 million in investment credits generated to the gas pipelines.

I served for a good number of years in a legislative body which was very sympathetic with gas pipeline companies, and I have had the experience of their long arm reaching right into a conference committee of the Texas Legislature to render a tax unconstitutional. I thought I had escaped this tampering when I came to Congress, but I underestimated their reach.

III

Because I do not believe the surtax to be a fair way to halt inflation, or even a feasible way if present spending patterns continue, and also because the bill contains several questionable clauses, I voted against it in the House on June 30. But it would be quite irresponsible to oppose the surtax and leave it at that. As I said at the opening of this statement, we are facing an inflationary spiral affecting prices, wages, and interest rates. Some viable alternative to the 10% surcharge must be suggested.

The Senate and House have voted to continue the withholding rates, as if the surtax were still in effect, as a temporary fiscal measure. This in itself is a logical and practical alternative to the President's fiscal package. It would preserve and continue the economic restraining effects of the surcharge while allowing time for further consideration of its need.

We should simply continue such withholding while we hammer out tax reform.

The benefits of following this course are several:

1. We would be able to avoid legislating on such an important matter under the pressure of a deadline.

2. Many economists are convinced that we will be in the throes of a dangerous economic slowdown in the first quarter of 1970. If the Congress took no action other than to extend the withholding rate, the economy would be rejuvenated by a great influx of spending money to the public at the time of its greatest needs, i.e., at tax refund time. If inflation is controlled or reversed, Congress would simply pass legislation lowering the withholding rate to its normal level.

3. The Congress, without engaging in a blind guess, would then be able to decide if the surtax was or was not needed. Congress is pretty good at "hindsight," and it could apply it then. If the inflation continued unabated the surtax could be enacted retroactively while none of the necessary economic effects would be lost in the interim. Retroactivity would not hurt the normal taxpayer because he would have paid his taxes by the previous withholding.

4. Tax reform minded Representatives would have the leverage that they have so long sought in this area. We would be able to put the heat on the President to push for tax reform without risking the dangers of too early relaxation of fiscal restraint.

5. Also, Congress would retain a real budget control. We could be satisfied that the cuts that are made by the administration forces are not made in the programs most vital to cities and to the poor. Likewise, that some reductions are made in areas of extravagance like some military boondoggles. With the surtax question impending after the budget cuts, Congress would have potent bargaining strength.

As another alternative, either independent of or in combination with the extension of the withholding rates, I would propose the institution of an excess profits tax. This worked successfully during the second World War and during the Korean War. It is unfair for most to suffer increased war-time burdens while others enjoy increased wartime profits. I fully concur with the efforts of Senator McGovern in this area.

One of the most serious manifestations of the inflation we are experiencing are the extremely high interest rates. I fully comprehend the meaning of the market and how unwise it is to tamper with the market mechanism. There can be no doubt that the high money rates are a manifestation of market pressures and cannot be condemned sweepingly as an explicit effort by the banking industry to raise its profits. I would not support legislating a ceiling on interest rates—I feel that that would only serve to disrupt what is an orderly, but very tight market.

What I would propose is that the Congress pass a tax on excess interest rates, as on excess profits. Such would drain off the excess income engendered by the tight money market, just as excess profits from the inflationary war stimulus is drained off by an excess profits tax.

I am not criticizing the banks for the recent increases in the prime interest rates. They are simply reacting to the huge loan pressure and the constricted supply of money. I am willing to accept the fact that the huge growth in bank earnings—largely due to the higher rates charged on loans—is incidental. But, just as I feel that it is unfair for corporations to earn extraordinary profits from the war, I feel that it is unfair for the banks to retain a fortuitous, incidental benefit from inflation. Unlike other industries, the costs of doing banking business during inflation does not rise as rapidly, or more rapidly, than revenues. As the price they charge for money goes up, so must their profits. Recent bank statements of earnings confirm this.

Note the following table showing net operating earnings of seven great New York banks in the second quarter of 1969 as compared to the second quarter of 1968. The increases are largely due to an advance in prime interest rate from 6–6½% in 1968 to 7–7½% in 1969, and, of course, accompanying increases in all interest rates. On June 9, 1969, the prime rate has further increased to 8½% which will undoubtedly be reflected in even greater earnings in the third quarter.

If, as the banks say, they must raise their interest rates in order to ration their loanable funds, there would be no hindrance. An additional benefit could be gained by using the revenues generated by this excess interest tax to subsidize home mortgages and interest on municial and state bonds.

Perhaps an example of how this tax would work would help to clarify my proposal. In order to allow for normal growth in the demand for money and to make sure that this tax would only be effective in times of very high interest rates, let us take as our base the 8% prime interest rate. Then any loan for more than $10,000 at a rate of over 8% would be subject to the tax.

Using this as the base for our interest tax, a possible levy could be 1.0% for every 0.1% increase in the rate of interest over 8%. Thus, a $10,000 loan at the current 8½% prime interest rate would bring in $850.00 per annum in interest which would be taxed $42.50 (5% of $850.00). The bank would earn $807.50, just a little more than it would have earned at the lower 8% rate. The following table demonstrates how this tax would work over a range of interest rates (assuming a loan of $10,000):

Interest rate (percent)	Total interest payment	Rate of tax (percent)	Bank earnings	Tax
8	$800	0	$800.00	0
8½	850	5	807.50	$42.50
9	900	10	810.00	90.00
9½	950	15	807.50	142.50
10	1,000	20	800.00	200.00

As you see, the interest earnings cease to grow after a certain point while government revenues from the tax rise rapidly. There would be no profit incentive for the banks to raise their rates although there would be nothing to prevent them from doing so if the pressures of the market made such raises expedient. Meanwhile, the revenues raised by the tax could be reserved for home mortgage subsidies and interest subsidies for states and municipalities on their bond issues.

We cannot in good conscience abandon the fight against inflation. This does not mean, however, that the Congress must passively accept whatever proposals the administration brings forth in the battle. I strongly believe that a combination of extended withholding rates, an excess profits tax, and an excess interest tax could most effectively curb inflation and high interest rates and, at the same time, pass the burden over from the least able to pay to the most able.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the amendment I offer today is not a new matter. Congressman ECKHARDT brought this matter to the attention of the House, and of the Senate Finance Committee in July as evidenced by his statement. I wish to commend him on his efforts to eliminate this type of special interest legislation and urge my colleagues in the Senate to read his statement carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, today I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me, to H.R. 13270 to permit the recovery of reasonable court costs in civil cases involving the internal revenue laws.

The present internal revenue tax system has become so complicated that it is rarely understood by individual taxpayers. As a result, most taxpayers feel compelled to retain professional legal and accounting services when differences with the Internal Revenue Service arise. Such services are expensive and increasingly, taxpayers who are innocent of wrongdoing find it cheaper to pay taxes and penalties not owed, than to contest unfair Internal Revenue Service rulings in the courts. As a result, there is a great temptation for the Internal Revenue Service to resort to tactics which frequently border on extortion.

In a recent conversation with an official at the Internal Revenue Service, I was amazed when he told me that, "if the taxpayers of this country ever discover that the Internal Revenue Service operates on 90 percent bluff, the entire system will collapse."

Every citizen of this country must pay the full and fair amount of tax due under our law. With that responsibility, the taxpaying citizen must also have the protections against unfair taxation. This amendment helps assure an innocent citizen that he cannot be forced to incur unfair costs by unwarranted accusations by an agency of the Federal Government.

Under our present system, the Internal Revenue Service may communicate with the taxpayer and tell him that he owes the Government of the United States a certain sum of money. The citizen has two alternatives when this occurs. One, he can pay the Internal Revenue Service the amount claimed due. Or, he can go to court and try to prove that the amount is not due the Federal Government. But if, in a court action, the citizen does prevail, he is still burdened with the attorney's fees and other costs that are incidental to the litigation, which may exceed the amount claimed by the Internal Revenue Service.

Unless the sum claimed by the Internal Revenue Service is large, the citizen is likely to pay the amount the Internal Revenue Service claims is due and forgo his right to prove his innocence.

This amendment will strengthen the ability and the will of American citizens against an arm of our Government, which many feel is unduly repressive, by allowing recovery of court costs when they prevail in an action brought by or against the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Tragic Case of John J. Hafer and the IRS," written by John Barron and published in the Reader's Digest of January 1969, and an article entitled "Tyranny in the Internal Revenue Service," written by John Barron and published in the Reader's Digest for August 1967.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Reader's Digest, January 1969]

THE TRAGIC CASE OF JOHN J. HAFER AND THE IRS

(By John Barron)

(NOTE.—In preparing two major articles about the Internal Revenue Service, The Reader's Digest has encountered a shocking number of acts of tyranny by our tax-collecting agency. Across the land, IRS has confiscated the money and property of scores of citizens who owed the government nothing. With the help of readers, lawyers, accountants and IRS employees themselves, the Digest has now assembled enough such examples to fill a book.

(Of all the cases examined, however, one stands out as illustration of the agony and injustice that IRS can visit upon an innocent man. We do not maintain that the Hafer case is "typical." Yet we feel an obligation to recount it because it did happen, here in America. We hope that every citizen, every public administrator and every member of Congress will ponder this chronicle, then join in demanding the reforms necessary to ensure that such a thing can never happen again.)

It all began one October morning in 1958. An Internal Revenue Service agent strode into the Cumberland, Md. (pop. 33,500) office of John J. Hafer, just as he might enter any businessman's office, and announced that he wanted to make a routine tax audit. For the next five months, Hafer made all his books and records—plus desk space—available to IRS. The agent worked irregularly, a couple of hours one day, maybe not at all the next. His sporadic audit uncovered no evidence of wrongdoing. Yet, because Hafer's taxable income for 1956 and 1957 was comparatively low, he developed "a feeling" that something was amiss.

Thus, in November 1959, Special Agent Milton Kyhos appeared with orders from regional IRS headquarters to begin an all-out criminal investigation. "In over 250 cases," Kyhos warned Hafer, "I've never lost one."

"Well, sir," boomed Hafer, "you're about to lose your first."

A tall, powerfully built man with a voice that could rattle windows, John Hafer, 54, felt secure in the knowledge that he had nothing to hide. From German ancestors he had inherited abiding faith in labor, thrift, self-reliance. After working his way through the University of Pennsylvania, he had opened a furniture store in Cumberland and had saved enough to buy a 144-acre farm. There he had established a small dairy and a roadside vegetable stand which grew into a country restaurant. Later, he had taken over a funeral home, expanded it, and acquired still another farm. He kept complete, accurate records, and regularly had them checked by accountant John W. Rollins. Pointing to his books, Hafer said to the IRS investigator, "I hope you'll begin right here in my office."

Kyhos promised he would. But he explained that he would be delayed by other cases for a while.

UGLY RUMORS

For the next two years no one from IRS visited, telephoned or even wrote Hafer. Kyhos, though, while investigating around town on other matters, dropped the word that sooner or later he was going to start on John Hafer.

Because these little asides bred ugly rumors, Hafer, in January 1962, called on Kyhos to ask that IRS get on with its investigation and allay suspicions that were being created.

"I would like to take your books," replied Kyhos.

"On one condition," Hafer said. "Don't go up and down the street telling everybody I'm under investigation. It could ruin my business."

"Oh, I couldn't promise that," the agent replied.

Angered, Hafer vowed, "You'll never see my books the longest day you live."

IRS had already examined Hafer's records once, of course, and all of them had long been open for any additional inspection it wished to make. By law, Hafer now had to surrender his corporate books—and he did. But in withholding the personal records he had previously made available, he was within his legal rights.[1] For this, though, IRS stigmatized him as "uncooperative." And he soon began to learn what can happen to an individual who so incurs IRS wrath.

Now Kyhos did start the investigation, contacting banks, merchants, farmers, even Hafer's church—more than 150 people in all—asking questions which cast their own aura of guilt. Hafer's phone rang often. "Kyhos says you're going to jail, John," salesman James A. Morgan, Jr., reported. IRS prowled around neighboring Pennsylvania and West Virginia, planting doubts about Hafer among creditors and suppliers. The bank called: "Mr. Hafer, we think you ought to know that IRS is copying records of your account." Secretly, the post office was ordered to hand over Hafer's mail before delivery so that IRS could identify and question people who wrote to him. ("Routine for a party that does not cooperate," Kyhos later told a Senate investigating subcommittee.)

IRS dispatched agents in Missouri, Pennsylvania and Texas to hunt down Hafer's married daughters. One of them, Mrs. Frances Wells Ferris, was forced to defend her own tax returns and financial records and was subjected to interrogation at the IRS office in Houston.

The IRS tactics ultimately had their effect. Hafer had long been known as a community leader, an honest, free-speaking man who could be stubborn. "One thing about John, he was never afraid to stand up and be counted," recalls County Commissioner Lucile Roeder. "He was the kind of man a community needs more of." But now belief spread that Hafer must be guilty of something. More and more, Hafer's customers, even friends, shied away. Business dwindled. Lenders, once eager to supply operating capital, now found reasons to deny it. Hafer had to sacrifice his dairy business, then a store.

"What can I do?" he asked his wife. "They say all these things behind my back, but they don't make any charges for me to answer." The truth was that IRS had made no charges because, despite efforts spanning nearly four years, it still was unable to build a case.

YOU ARE UNDER ARREST

Finally, fuming with anger, on June 1, 1962, Hafer went to IRS headquarters at the post office for a face-to-face talk with Kyhos. When Kyhos saw him entering, he dived under a table, fearful of attack. "Come on out. I'm not going to hurt you," Hafer said. Kyhos hid under the table until a second agent came in; then he jumped up and grabbed a revolver from a file cabinet. "Mr. Hafer, I think you'd better leave," the other agent said. Hafer left.

Seven days later, three IRS agents crowded into his office. "Mr. Hafer," one announced, "you are under arrest for assaulting a federal agent." Incredulous, Hafer was hauled away to the police station, fingerprinted, photographed and held prisoner until his brother-in-law put up $5000 bond.

Now Hafer recognized that he was in trouble. He could be imprisoned for three years. "John, you'd better hire a good criminal lawyer," an attorney friend advised.

At the assault trial in Federal District Court in Baltimore, which began on September 10, 1962, the government conjured up a scene of mayhem and portrayed Hafer as a wild man "bent on murder." Nevertheless, one fact could not be erased: by Kyhos' own admission, no one had so much as touched him. After a three-day trial, the jury returned the verdict: "Not guilty."

"It's all over now," Hafer said to his family. But it wasn't. IRS had ordered still another agent to Cumberland to intensify the pursuit of Hafer. And, in November 1962, four years after the audit began, Kyhos officially recommended that Hafer be prosecuted for criminal tax fraud.

A MATTER OF ROUTINE

IRS boasts that its system of internal checks and balances protects every taxpayer against malicious or groundless charges by an individual agent or service clique. Kyhos' report, for example, had to be studied and approved first by his group supervisor; then by the IRS intelligence chief in Baltimore; next by the IRS Assistant Regional Commissioner for Intelligence; and finally by the IRS Regional Counsel's office in Philadelphia. Yet not one of these supposed checks wrought any change. The grave recommendation that Hafer be charged as a criminal was approved swiftly and routinely all the way up the line.

IRS then asked the Justice Department to try to put Hafer in jail. The case was assigned to U.S. Attorney Joseph D. Tydings (now U.S. Senator from Maryland) for prosecution. After examining it, Tydings refused to prosecute. "I strongly advised the Justice Department to drop the case," he recalls. Concerned, Justice Department officials conferred with Hafer in Washington. Then they, too, rejected the charges and refused to prosecute.

Yet IRS wouldn't give up. It switched the charges from criminal fraud to civil fraud, which its own lawyers are empowered to prosecute. On July 31, 1963, IRS officials ruled that Hafer owed $34,463.12 in back taxes and fraud penalties.

Now, for the first time, Hafer received a detailed bill of particulars. "Why, they've made up these charges out of thin air!" exclaimed his son, John, Jr., as he studied the computations. To make its case, IRS simply had disallowed legitimate, documented business expenses. Also, without offering any evidence, it had claimed that Hafer must have spent $15,000 more on living expenses than his tax returns indicated.

[1] Federal courts have ruled that no one has to supply personal records which might be used against him in a criminal investigation.

Hafer submitted a detailed analysis, pinpointing each fallacy in the IRS claims. To no avail. His son traveled to the district IRS office in Baltimore with the evidence—without success. He drove several times to the regional office in Philadelphia. Still IRS wouldn't budge. The series of safeguards which, IRS claims, guarantee fair treatment to all taxpayers simply did not function. An IRS decision had been made, and apparently nobody dared be the one who found it wrong.

A DAY IN COURT

His business a shambles, Hafer now lived for what he had demanded—a hearing before the U.S. Tax Court in Philadelphia. It was scheduled for March 21, 1966. Meanwhile, he talked little and enjoyed nothing, so obsessed had he become with thoughts of exoneration. But now, as time for the trial neared, it became evident that IRS was anxious to duck a showdown in open court. On February 18, Hafer's tax lawyer, Frank S. Deming, phoned Hafer: "The IRS says that if you will admit fraud, they'll settle the whole case for $4000."

"Admit that I'm a crook when I'm not?" Hafer replied. "No, sir!"

Soon Deming telephoned again: "IRS is willing to settle for $3000."

"I don't owe a cent!" Hafer shouted. "If I give in now, no one will ever believe I'm innocent."

In the pre-dawn darkness of March 21, 1966, Hafer and his son drove from Cumberland to Philadelphia. When the Tax Court opened, they were there, surrounded by books and ledgers, ready to fight. Then they saw Deming hurrying toward them.

"Mr. Hafer! IRS here has decided to recommend that the whole case be dropped!" the lawyer jubilantly told them. "Washington has to approve, but I'm told that this will take only a short time. All you have to do is agree not to go to trial now."

Hafer hesitated, feeling that IRS might only be stalling. But finally he agreed. The ordeal that had consumed nearly eight years of his life seemingly had ended.

Only one minor problem remained. Hafer had consented to appear before a Senate judiciary subcommittee investigating IRS abuses. His lawyer and friends urged him not to testify lest he further anger IRS. "No," he said. "Maybe if others hadn't been afraid to speak out, this wouldn't have happened to us."

So Hafer told his story to the Senators. "My sole purpose in appearing here is to try to save other taxpayers from this awful experience," he said. "But for my belief in a living God who gave me good health, guidance and perseverance, I would have succumbed."

Back home, Hafer waited impatiently for official notice that IRS had formally dropped the case. But no word came. Then, on May 17, through Deming, Hafer learned the truth: IRS in Philadelphia had dishonored its pledge and decided to renew the case. Hafer had been duped. Now he had to go through the agony of waiting indefinitely until the trial could be rescheduled.

ORDERED AND DECIDED

Meanwhile, within IRS, an honorable man was wrestling with his conscience. He was Edward L. Newberger, the senior IRS attorney ordered to prosecute Hafer. As an outstanding tax specialist and trial lawyer, Newberger had doubted the government charges when he first scrutinized them in preparation for trial. "Our figures for living expenses are just unsupported estimates," he argued. "We don't have a case at all." And it was at his insistence that IRS had pledged to drop the case.

He knew that he now had much to lose personally by protesting further. In effect, he would be declaring that all IRS officials who had endorsed the prosecution of Hafer were wrong. Yet his conscience left him no choice. So he drafted a 34-page memorandum which ripped the government case to shreds. It asserted that the government claims were based on erroneous figures and unsubstantiated estimates. Finally, Newberger cited the findings of a crack IRS agent whom he had asked to make an objective study of Hafer's records. The analysis had disclosed that the books and records were complete and agreed with the tax returns. Then he went from IRS office to office showing the memorandum and arguing for justice.

Hafer, of course, knew nothing about this. As the memorandum was slowly shuffled up the line to Washington, he received notification that his trial had been rescheduled for the term beginning December 5, 1966. Wearily he began preparing all over again for a court fight. But, on the night of November 1, while getting dressed for a Lions Club dinner, he collapsed in uncontrollable convulsions. He was rushed to a Baltimore hospital. Surgery disclosed a malignant brain tumor. Hafer's power of speech waned, and he grew weaker by the day.

John, Jr., assembled the family. "Whatever we do," he said, "we can't let anyone know just how sick Dad is. If IRS finds out, it will drag the case on, and he may never be cleared." So, as far as IRS knew, Hafer was as prepared as ever to meet it in court on Monday, December 5.

IRS in Washington waited until the last possible minute. Then, on Friday afternoon, December 2, Deming telephoned John Hafer, Jr., from Philadelphia. "Your dad's vindicated!" he said. "Washington just called IRS here. They're dropping the case once and for all."

"Get it in writing," the son said. "Otherwise, we'll see them in court."

A copy of the final decree of the U.S. Tax Court arrived three weeks later. It read: "ORDERED AND DECIDED: That there are no deficiencies in income taxes due . . ."

The son sat at John Hafer's bedside praying that his father would regain consciousness. Seeing his father's eyes move, he said, "Dad, you've won! IRS has admitted in writing that you're not guilty of anything, that you don't owe anything. Can you hear me, Dad?"

Tears welled in Hafer's eyes, and he reached out to touch his son's hand. Soon he lapsed into a coma. Five days later, without comprehending another word, John Hafer died.

(At IRS headquarters in Washington, two Reader's Digest editors reviewed this case in detail with three senior officials of the agency. After every fact had been confirmed, IRS was asked to comment on how it all could have happened.

(The IRS reply came a month later: "Mr. Hafer refused to cooperate. In our opinion, the system of checks and balances . . . was not at fault. Rather, the system was frustrated by Mr. Hafer's attitude . . .; nor indeed can we contemplate manageable means to prevent such persons from martyring themselves.")

TYRANNY IN THE INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE

Whenever an income-tax cheat gets by, the rest of us have to make up the loss in revenue for which he is responsible. In fairness to the great majority of honest Americans, we must encourage the Internal Revenue Service to use every honorable means to collect what is owed the government. But something is now dangerously amiss. In its pursuit of our dollars, the IRS is resorting to tactics that threaten all taxpayers.

"Too many Americans pay more than their share of taxes because they are intimidated by a tax-collecting octopus which has them at a disadvantage and keeps them that way," declares Sen. Warren Magnuson (D., Wash.). No one can know just how many are treated unfairly by IRS. Last year it subjected 3,500,000 returns to special examination, extracting extra payments from 1,900,000 citizens because of alleged errors.[1] Moreover, literally no one is beyond IRS's reach, whether he had made a mistake or not. Bewildered, afraid, lacking money to hire lawyers, the lone individual often succumbs in silence when the awesome powers of government are brought down upon him. But today evidence from all over the country shows that in the name of collecting taxes IRS has bullied, degraded and crushed countless innocent citizens—while unaccountably favoring others. For example:

In Kansas City, Mo., two IRS agents intruded upon Mrs. Michael Darrah while she was nursing her six week old baby. The young mother pleaded with the men to come back another time. Instead, for four torturous hours they questioned her about an income tax charge against her father, Kenneth R. Layne. When she sought to call him for advice, one man ordered, "Don't touch that phone." Unsure of her rights, Mrs. Darrah asked permission to call a lawyer. "That will only make it worse for your father," an agent threateningly told her. For the terrified woman, it was tantamount to being held a prisoner in her own home. Ultimately, a jury unanimously concluded that Layne was innocent of any crime. But his daughter, never accused of anything, suffered a nervous breakdown.

In Oakland, Calif., attorney Lew M. Warden, Jr., patiently answered questions about his tax return until an IRS agent demanded all his records. "Those files contain confidential information about some of my clients," Warden protested. "You have no right to them." So IRS arbitrarily disallowed his legitimate business deductions for three years and claimed he owed $19,501.41 in back taxes. It seized his bank account, ordered tenants of a cottage he owned to pay their rent to the government, confiscated his sailboat. Worse still, the constant IRS harassment took him away from his law practice so much that his income plummeted.

Insisting on a day in court, Warden spent his last savings preparing for his tax trial scheduled April 5, 1965. But on April 1, after hounding him for 33 months, the IRS suddenly dropped all charges. For, as it should have known all along, Warden had done nothing wrong and owed it nothing.

PROOF PILED HIGH

All this may sound incredible to those who have not yet been victimized by IRS. I was skeptical too—at first. But the proof has been piled high by court rulings, Congressional investigations, unrefuted sworn testimony, documented complaints to Congress and by the admissions of IRS officials themselves. It is so overwhelming that concern now grips a cross section of Congress.

More than half the Senate membership has gone on record as calling for something to be done about the way small taxpayers are abused by IRS. "My files, like those of every other Senator, are filled with moving appeals from taxpayers whose experiences with IRS have turned into nightmares of inquisition," says Sen. Norris Cotton (R., N.H.).

Alarmed by multiplying complaints, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure two years ago began asking IRS officials and their victims questions under oath. The ensuing Senate hearings produced astounding testimony disclosing that: IRS has defied court orders, criminally picked locks, stolen records and threatened reputable people. It has illegally tapped telephones, seized, opened and read personal letters while spying on the private mail of tens of thousands of citizens. It has illegally bugged phone booths and hidden microphones where taxpayers talk with their lawyers.

Moreover, such lawlessness has been encouraged from high levels of IRS. Its Washington headquarters has bought elaborate spying equipment for use about the country. IRS sent many agents to an official Treasury School near the White House to learn how to commit such illegal acts as wiretapping and lock picking. IRS has maintained on call in Washington a staff of specialists in illegal snooping. "I violate state laws at all times," special agent Thomas Mennitt has testified. "It's part of my duties."

Summing up interviews with 621 individuals and 2756 pages of sworn testimony, Sen. Edward V. Long (D., Mo.), chairman of the Senate subcommittee probing into IRS practices, declares: "IRS has become morally corrupted by the enormous power with which we in Congress have unwisely entrusted it. Too often, it acts like a Gestapo preying upon defenseless citizens." Senate Minority Leader Everett Dirksen, a subcommittee member, reports: "Outraged constituents have inundated my desk with letters blistering the Revenue Service's collection practices. They show it is frequently the small taxpayer who is hurt worst in his attempt to deal with a giant bureaucracy like IRS."

NAKED POWER

Many IRS employees who have witnessed such practices firsthand are deeply disturbed. As a result, they have secretly provided Congress with evidence, a major reason why IRS abuses are now being exposed. Indeed, IRS's own personnel have openly applauded, through their National Association of Internal Revenue Employees, the Senate investigation, even while top IRS bureaucrats have tried to cover up and withhold data. After privately interviewing dozens of IRS agents. I have concluded that most, as individuals, want to be just and reasonable.

What, then, is the matter? Meeting me furtively in San Francisco, one veteran agent explained: "Sometimes you feel like the cop who's got to hand out so many tickets a month if he expects to get ahead. You're judged by how often you bring in more dough. Under such pressure I have seen people determined to find taxpayer error whether it's there or not."

Clearly, from all the evidence, the root of the problem is the IRS "system." For Congress has given so much raw, naked power to this one agency that it is a law unto itself. Consider some of the things it can do—without the approval of any court, judge or anyone else.

IRS can audit, interrogate or investigate anyone, for as long as it wants. In Kansas City, Mo., policeman Paul R. Campbell halted a speeding car driven by an IRS agent. "We'll just have to check your taxes," the agent was quoted as saying, after other arguments failed to stop the officer from writing a ticket. Sure enough, soon after Campbell filed his next tax return, IRS ordered him to report for an examination which lasted two hours. Unable to find anything wrong, it nevertheless pestered him for another four months with phone calls, letters and more interrogations before admitting he owed nothing.

In a small Tennessee town, an IRS agent riffled through mail on a businessman's desk, pried open an envelope and found a letter linking him with "another woman." The agent showed a copy to the man's wife, trying to anger her so that she would agree to inform against her husband.

IRS can assert that a citizen owes taxes, force him to prove he does not. After contracting to sell his home in suburban Detroit, businessman Roger Logan (not his real name) discovered that IRS had slapped liens of $210.07 and $400.07 on it for alleged nonpayment of taxes. Logan's wife presented canceled checks and copies of past returns to prove no taxes were due, but without avail. "The best thing to do," an IRS clerk advised, "is to pay off the liens. Then, if you're telling the truth, you can sue to get your money back." Only after Logan got help from a lawyer friend would IRS even take the trouble to verify that he indeed owed nothing. The agency had tied up his home simply because it had two old claims against someone with a similar name.

IRS can merely claim that a citizen owes taxes; then, if he fails to pay instantly, it can immediately confiscate his salary or all the money he has deposited in a bank, or seize everything he owns.

Nobody knows this better than farmer Noel Smith of Taylor, Mo. IRS checked Smith's books for nine years without telling him it suspected any significant irregularity. Then one morning a friend ran up to him with a newspaper report that IRS was taking over his farms. Smith rushed to town, only to learn that IRS had confiscated all his money in the bank, the contents of his safe-deposit box, even an insurance policy belonging to his 70-year-old mother. Five days later, IRS formally demanded that he pay it a staggering $501,000.

With help from friends, Smith hired lawyers and accountants to unravel the fantastic IRS claims. Meanwhile, the agency began selling off his stored grain, using sledge hammers to batter apart his bins. "High-handed," "unlawful," declared the U.S. Court of Appeals upon hearing what IRS had done.

Nevertheless, IRS kept custody of Smith's property and denied him income from it for four years before deciding that he actually owed $54,573 in taxes. Smith paid his "ransom," as he termed it, so that he could recover his land. Another year Smith overpaid his taxes but had to sue to force IRS to give him back $7820 the government owed him. And to this day IRS is still after him. "I did not think it could happen in the United States," Smith told Senate investigators.

But I have found that it does happen. To make sure that people who complain are not just disgruntled crackpots or conniving tax dodgers, I traveled across the country talking to IRS victims, their families and neighbors. And I found that when IRS misuses its vast powers, the people most likely to suffer are not gangsters or rich tax cheats. They are ordinary people who do not command batteries of lawyers and who have no special influence in Washington. And what IRS does to one citizen, it can do to any other.

KICKING PEOPLE AROUND

Look at what happened not long ago in Richland, Mo., a small town in the Ozark foothills. As he told the Senate committee, the local bank president, Gordon W. Warren, was alone in his office when two IRS agents marched in and demanded the records of a depositor. "I'll just notify this customer," Warren said, reaching for the phone. "If you do that," an agent told him, "you'll be liable to a $10,000 fine and a ten-year imprisonment." The threats were as illegal as they were inexcusable. But how could Warren know?

Down the street an IRS agent confronted a waitress with a $275 tax claim. When she protested, the agent threatened to confiscate and "dispose of" her old car unless she paid up that day. Near tears, she went to see Warren, who agreed to lend her the $275 necessary to hold IRS off. Only after she spent days getting a sworn affidavit to document her deductions did IRS admit she didn't owe the bill which it tried to intimidate her into paying.

Across the railroad, Fred and Katherine Tomlinson run a one-room Dairy Queen shop. They have never made a lot of money, but enough to rear their children and make their own way. On March 31, 1965, a worried bank cashier ran to see them. "The IRS has seized your bank account," he reported. "They claim you didn't pay your taxes last year." Tomlinson couldn't understand: "The government's never said anything to us about owing any money." That night, he and his wife dug out a canceled check proving they had paid in full, and mailed it to IRS. Meanwhile, checks they previously had written bounced because of the IRS seizure of their funds. "I'm so ashamed," Katherine told her husband. Not until eight days later would IRS restore their money—without the least apology.

This callous disregard of the rights, feelings and welfare of ordinary people goes on all the time. Last March 28, IRS without forewarning attached the salary of Chicago salesman Jerry G. Pfinster. Thus Pfinster was branded as "financially irresponsible" in the eyes of his associates. Only later would IRS give him a letter admitting that it had made an error and he owed nothing. But that has failed to restore Pfinster's reputation.

CONFORM—OR ELSE

The attitude that it can do as it pleases sometimes causes IRS to lash out vindictively at people who disagree or cause it trouble, even at its own employes.

Claude F. Salter, for example, is a distinguished veteran of 34 years with IRS. His record as chief of its San Francisco audit division was so outstanding that IRS admits "we cannot deny that he did perform well." Salter was stubborn, though, when it came to principles. To superiors who asked special treatment for certain taxpayers, he consistently said no. So in the spring of 1964, these officials tried to have him declared unfit by ordering him to the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital and sending along a letter implying that he was mentally ill. A battery of psychiatrists and physicians told Salter that he was well adjusted, intelligent and healthy. Nevertheless, IRS soon demoted him to a lesser job where he could not influence policy.

In Dedham, Mass., 31-year-old accountant Donald R. Lord responded to a knock on his front door one Saturday morning, still in his pajamas, and three IRS agents pushed past him into his home. They ordered him to get out corporate records entrusted to him by a local businessman. "You'd better cooperate if you expect to stay in business," Lord was warned. "Don't make any phone calls, or you'll be subject to prosecution."

After interrogating him most of the day, the agents confiscated boxes of papers, threatening him with a jail sentence if he resisted, and drove away.

Soon thereafter, a neighbor phoned: "Some IRS men were here today, asking questions about you." Meanwhile, IRS agents went to Lord's bank and copied his financial records. Others hounded his relatives with interrogations and even tried to question his 88-year-old grandmother.

Angered and worried, Lord engaged a distinguished Boston lawyer, Lawrence O'Donnell. Subsequently IRS, by its own admission, subpoenaed Lord to appear at a conference in a secret office which had been carefully bugged in advance. Suddenly O'Donnell, too, was subjected to hostile IRS examination. An employe at Boston's Carney Hospital, where O'Donnell had undergone five critical operations, tipped him off that IRS was questioning his medical expenses. Moreover, as IRS later admitted, agents pored over his tax returns covering six years, hunting futilely for some error.

The Federal District Court in Boston declared that IRS's "unlawful pressures" against Lord came "close to extortion." It ruled the seizure of the business records completely illegal, and forbade IRS to make any further use of them. Yet, as O'Donnell subsequently proved wtih testimony of one agent who resigned in disgust, IRS made copies of these records and continued to use them—in arrogant contempt of the court order.

A DOUBLE STANDARD

And now, consider undisputed evidence which Sen. John J. Williams (R., Del.) has unveiled on the floor of the Senate. It shows that while mercilessly trying to take the last cent of some taxpayers, IRS has treated others quite differently.

Over a period of seven years, IRS allowed the New York-based real estate firm of Webb & Knapp to pile up tax debts of more than $27 million, while the Federal Housing Administration lavished on it $67 million in government-insured loans. Upshot? Webb & Knapp defaulted on the loans, and IRS in December 1965 wrote off a whopping $26 million as "uncollectible." Similarly, IRS last year simply wrote off as "uncollectible" a tax bill of more than $23 million owed by six American shipping companies controlled by Greek magnate Stavros Niarchos.

As Senator Williams notes, still harder to explain is the treatment of people like Lawrence L. Callanan. An official of the Steamfitters Local No. 562 in St. Louis, Callanan was convicted in 1954 of extortion, received a 12-year sentence. He was paroled in 1960, and in April 1964 President Johnson commuted his sentence, thereby enabling him to become a union leader again. The same month, IRS settled his unpaid tax debt of $40,219.84 for a token $17,000 plus an agreement that he would pay more if his income rose. "No prospect of any material increase (in income)," said IRS. A few months later, Callanan's union lieutenant, John L. Lawler, handed over $25,000 to "Friends of L.B.J." Next, Callanan, supposedly without money for his taxes, kicked in $2000 to the Democratic National Committee. Then he emerged as director of the lush "voluntary" political fund of Local No. 562, his salary reported at $15,000 to $20,000.

Honest citizens can derive little comfort, too, from the knowledge that IRS has issued a special ruling to reduce the tax that criminals owe on money they steal! Internal Revenue Bulletin No. 1966-42 of October 17, 1966, states: "Embezzled funds will be taken into account if a taxpayer chooses the benefits of the income-averaging provisions." So if a crook gets away with, say, $100,000, it will be okay for him to pay taxes on only $20,000 of stolen money a year over a five-year period.

A BRIDLE FOR BUREAUCRACY

In the face of such outrageous practices, why do we allow IRS power that we would not dare entrust to any other agency? We would never allow police to roam the land grabbing property, confiscating bank accounts, persecuting people at will. If we ever are to start preventing Big Bureaucracy from dehumanizing our lives, the place to begin is with the most powerful bureaucracy of all—the Internal Revenue Service.

Aghast at the discovery that IRS was reading private letters, Congress passed a law in 1965 forbidding it to further rifle the mails. Commissioner Sheldon Cohen has pledged an end to the illegal wiretapping, bugging and other illegalities, promised to purge IRS of the attitude that the taxpayer is the "adversary." Experience shows, though, that no government agency can be trusted to reform itself. Clearly, some reforms from the outside are needed.

Senator Magnuson, joined by 59 other Senators, has proposed the establishment of Small Tax Courts where taxpayers—without hiring a lawyer—could informally present grievances in disputes with IRS involving less than $2500. But, in line with the basic legal principle that a man is innocent until proved guilty, Congress must now make an exhaustive examination of the arbitrary powers which IRS has demonstrated itself unfit to exercise. Before grabbing anyone's salary or bank account, IRS should have to show in court some proof that taxes are owed. Before walking off with all a man owns, IRS should be required to convince a judge that the taxpayer is hiding his money or is about to flee.

It is important for all of us to stop being afraid of IRS. When it acts unfairly, we should speak out.

Let your Congressman know what you think of IRS abuses—and that your vote in 1968 is going to be influenced by what he does to stop them. Moreover, if you have documentary evidence of such abuses, give it to your Congressman or to the Senate investigators.[2] For only public indignation, backed by facts, will force reforms.

Reforms no doubt will make the work of IRS somewhat more difficult. But in recent years we have chosen, through the courts, to erect a maze of legal procedures to protect the rights of the most depraved and dangerous criminals. It is time we did something about protecting the rights of the honest American taxpayer, too.

Mr. BELLMON. I ask that my amendment be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

INCREASE IN SOCIAL SECURITY PAYMENTS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG's amendment was to add at the end of the bill the following new title:

TITLE X—INCREASE IN SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

That this title may be cited as the "Social Security Amendments of 1969".

INCREASE IN OLD-AGE, SURVIVORS, AND DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 215(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out the table and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Section 203(a) of such Act is amended by striking out paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) when two or more persons were entitled (without the application of section 202(j)(1) and section 223(b)) to monthly benefits under section 202 or 223 for January 1970 on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such insured individual and at least one such person was so entitled for December 1969 on the basis of such wages and self-employment income, such total of benefits for January 1970 or any subsequent month shall not be reduced to less than the larger of—

"(A) the amount determined under this subsection without regard to this paragraph, or

"(B) an amount equal to the sum of the amounts derived by multiplying the benefit amount determined under this title (including this subsection, but without the application of section 222(b), section 202(q), and subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section), as in effect prior to January 1970, for each such person for such month, by 115 percent and raising each such increased amount, if it is not a multiple of $0.10, to the next higher multiple of $0.10;

but in any such case (i) paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applied to such total of benefits after the application of subparagraph (B), and (ii) if section 202(k)(2)(A) was applicable in the case of any such benefits for January 1970, and ceases to apply after such month, the provisions of subparagraph (B) shall be applied, for and after the month in which section 202(k)(2)(A) ceases to apply, as though paragraph (1) had not been applicable to such total of benefits for January 1970, or".

(c) Section 215(b)(4) of such Act is amended by striking out "January 1968" each time it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "December 1969".

(d) Section 215(c) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"Primary Insurance Amount Under 1967 Act

"(c)(1) For the purposes of column II of the table appearing in subsection (a) of this section, an individual's primary insurance amount shall be computed on the basis of the law in effect prior to the enactment of the Social Security Amendments of 1969.

"(2) The provisions of this subsection shall be applicable only in the case of an individual who became entitled to benefits under section 202(a) or section 223 before January 1970, or who died before such month."

(e) The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969 and with respect to lump-sum death payments under such title in the case of deaths occurring after December 1969.

(f) If an individual was entitled to a disability insurance benefit under section 223 of the Social Security Act for December 1969 and became entitled to old-age insurance benefits under section 202(a) of such Act for January 1970, or he died in such month, then, for purposes of section 215(a)(4) of the Social Security Act (if applicable), the amount in column IV of the table appearing in such section 215(a) for such individual shall be the amount in such column on the line on which in column II appears his primary insurance amount (as determined under section 215(c) of such Act) instead of the amount in column IV equal to the primary insurance amount on which his disability insurance benefit is based.

INCREASE IN BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS AGE 72 AND OVER

SEC. 3. (a)(1) Section 227(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46," and by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(2) Section 227(b) of such Act is amended by striking out in the second sentence "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(b)(1) Section 228(b)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(2) Section 228(b)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46", and by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(3) Section 228(c)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(4) Section 228(c)(3)(A) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(5) Section 228(c)(3)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(c) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969.

MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF A WIFE'S OR HUSBAND'S INSURANCE BENEFITS

SEC. 4. (a) Section 202(b)(2) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Except as provided in subsection (q), such wife's insurance benefit for each month shall be equal to one-half of the primary insurance amount of her husband (or, in the case of a divorced wife, her former husband) for such month."

(b) Section 202(c)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (q), such husband's insurance benefit for each month shall be equal to one-half of the primary insurance amount of his wife for such month."

(c) Sections 202(c)(4) and 202(f)(5) of such Act are each amended by striking out "whichever of the following is the smaller: (A) One-half of the primary insurance amount of the deceased individual on whose wages and self-employment income such benefit is based, or (B) $105" and inserting in lieu thereof "one-half of the primary insurance amount of the deceased individual on whose wages and self-emplyoment income such benefit is based".

(d) The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969.

ALLOCATION TO DISABILITY INSURANCE TRUST FUND

SEC. 5. (a) Section 201(b)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of clause (B);

(2) striking out "1967, and so reported," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "1967, and before January 1, 1970, and so reported, and (D) 1.10 per centum of the wages (as so defined) paid after December 31, 1969, and so reported,".

(b) Section 201(b)(2) of such Act is amended by—

(2) striking out "1967," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "1967, and before January 1, 1970, and (D) 0.825 of 1 per centum of the amount of self-employment income (as so defined) so reported for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969,".

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I submit this amendment on behalf of myself and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF). In a moment, I shall ask that the amendment be temporarily laid aside so that the amendment of the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) may be considered next, but it is my feeling that before the Senate adjourns, we should vote on the increase in the social security payments recommended by the House of Representatives.

The House Ways and Means Committee has recommended a simple 15-percent across-the-board increase. Although, that may be opposed by the administration, there is no doubt in my mind that it will become law if the Congress is permitted to vote on it between now and January 1.

I do not wish to usurp the prerogatives of the House of Representatives at all. Ordinarily, the House would pass the bill, send it to us, and we would then have an opportunity to vote on it. But I do feel that we should vote on the measure before we adjourn for the Yuletide recess, if indeed there is one. In order that we can vote on it before the recess, I think it appropriate that the amendment should be offered. Senators who would like to add their names as cosponsors are welcome to do so, and I shall call the amendment up and ask for a vote on it at some point further along in the consideration of this measure.

I ask unanimous consent that the names of the distinguished majority leader (Mr. MANSFIELD), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. MONTOYA), and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) be added as cosponsors of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would like to be sure the Senator is not going to bring that amendment up today.

Mr. LONG. I have offered the amendment only because I wanted to direct it to the attention of the Senate. I shall not ask for a vote on it at this moment. I ask that it be temporarily laid aside, so that Senators who would like to do so may add their names to it as cosponsors, and I would hope that the House of Representatives will act on this measure before we have concluded action on this bill, so that we would not be jumping the gun on the House of Representatives, so to speak, by our action. It is the House's committee that has worked on this measure and, under the Constitution, the House should work on it first.

However, I do not think we should withhold action on the matter because, in voting for a simple 15-percent across-the-board increase in social security benefits, the House Ways and Means Committee is obviously planning to send us later a much more detailed bill. Though that subsequent bill may have much less revenue impact, it would probably deal with many more problems than are involved in this across-the-board increase upon which it is now proposed that the House of Representatives vote.

We are not likely to have time to conduct hearings on the bill increasing benefits 15 percent, and there is really not much reason for doing so. I think Senators will pretty well know how they want to vote on this matter when it comes before the Senate, and I think we would like to vote on it before Congress adjourns for this year. For fear that we might not have another opportunity to vote on it, it will be offered as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I understand this does not increase the minimum benefit; that still remains at $55, plus the 15-percent increase?

Mr. LONG. Yes. The minimum benefit would be $64, a 15-percent increase, rounded up to the next whole dollar. Basically, the bill simply provides a 15-percent across-the-board increase. It is my understanding that the House of Representatives, in voting on this matter, has in mind sending to us next year a much more detailed bill, going into the kind of matters that the Senator from Vermont has in mind. I would hope we could avoid going into very many other questions, such as the Senator from Vermont has in the past brought to the attention of the Finance Committee, and simply pass, before we go home, a 15-percent across-the-board increase; then, when we come back next year, we would consider the more extensive measure which the House of Representatives is planning to send us.

Mr. PROUTY. If the Senator will yield further, I have an amendment at the desk now which would increase the minimum monthly payment to $90, which is the same amount recommended by the President for welfare recipients who are 65 years of age or older.

I have another amendment which would simply increase the minimum to $70, and then 15 percent across the board. I shall offer that.

Mr. LONG. The Senator certainly has the right to do so. I would hope, however, that he will withhold doing that until we have the other amendment before us.

Mr. PROUTY. If the Senator will let me know when he calls it up.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, is it not a fact that at the present time the surplus in the social security fund, plus the surplus in the social security disability fund, approximates $33 billion, and by reason of that fact, the social security system will continue as an actuarially sound insurance system with the granting of this 15-percent increase retroactive to December 1 of this year, as provided in the bill just passed by the House of Representatives?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator, I am sure, is using those figures because he has reviewed them recently.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I am familiar with them.

Mr. LONG. I have not reviewed them in the last month, and, therefore, I shall have to accept the Senator's word for it. But I shall be glad, when we get the amendment before us for a vote, to have the latest information available so that I can respond more accurately to the Senator's question.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. May I say that years ago I served on the taxwriting Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. Also, I was a Member of the other body at the time that President Franklin D. Roosevelt proposed the Social Security System. I have followed it with great interest since. The fact is that the present surplus in both the disability and the social security funds exceeds $33 billion. Very definitely, the system will continue to be actuarily sound, as all of us want it to continue to be, if we grant this 15-percent increase to every present recipient—child, man, and woman—who receives his social security check on the third day of every month.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the House Ways and Means Committee has been responsible in the way it has handled social security bills, and I am sure that the same would be true in this instance; so I have no doubt that the answer to the Senator's question would be "Yes."

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. And that is true without any increase in contributions, as matters stand.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CRANSTON. I ask that my name be added to the amendment as a cosponsor.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator's name be added, and also the name of the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. My name also.

Mr. LONG. I have already asked that the Senator's name be added.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) be added as cosponsors of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I could not hear the Senator. However, am I correct in understanding that this would not be a substitute for the measure next year when the Senator will have before his committee and there will be before the Ways and Means Committee the so-called package deal that will be 15 percent at that time, but will raise the minimum proposal, whether or not we raise the exemption from $7,500 to $9,000.

If we do all of that, it is my understanding—because I have been listening to testimony on the matter this week—that the fund is running about 1.16 percent above what the actuarians say we might have to pay out.

If we include that 1.16 percent and keep the reserve of close to $31 billion, we could increase the minimum up to $100, if we wish, and we would still have the fund intact and still keep the reserves. We are running at the present time 1.16 percent above what is needed.

We could do this and still keep it sound, though the figure, as the Senator pointed out, of more than $30 billion is enough to keep it in sound shape and ready to do the job.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I am not going to ask for a vote at this point. I prefer that we vote on the matter at a later time, after the Senators have had a chance to consider the matter further.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be temporarily laid aside.

AMENDMENT NO. 332

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I call up the amendment, No. 332, introduced by Senator SCOTT and myself, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

"(f) NONPARTISAN ACTIVITIES CARRIED ON BY CERTAIN ORGANIZATIONS.—Subsection (d)(2) shall not apply to any amount paid or incurred by any organization—

"(1) which is described in section 501(c)(3) and exempt from taxation under section 501(a),

"(2) the activities of which are nonpartisan, are not confined to one specific election period, and are carried on in more than one State,

"(3) substantially all of the income of which is expended directly for the active conduct of the activities constituting the purpose or function for which it is organized and operated,

"(4) substantially all of the support (other than gross investment income as defined in section 509(e)) of which is normally received from three or more exempt organizations which are not described in section 4946(a)(1)(H) with respect to each other or the recipient foundation, from the general public, or from a governmental unit referred to in section 170(c)(1), or from any combination of the foregoing, and not more than 40 percent of such support is received over a period of 5 years, including the year in question, from any one such exempt organization, and

"(5) contributions to which for voter registration drives are not subject to conditions that they may be used only in specified States, possessions of the United States, or political subdivisions or other areas of any of the foregoing, or the District of Columbia, or that they may be used in only one specific election period.

Subsection (d)(4) shall not apply to any grant to an organization which meets the requirements of the preceding sentence."

Page 61, line 10, after "(2)" insert "except as provided in subsection (f),".

Page 61, line 15, strike out "(f)" and insert "(g)".

Page 62, line 22, strike out "(f)" and insert "(g)".

Page 63, line 16, strike out "(g)" and insert "(h)".

Page 64, line 1, strike out "(h)" and insert "(i)".

Page 64, line 7, strike out "(g)(2) or (g)(3)" and insert "(h)(2) or (h)(3)".

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is the Senator from Texas willing to agree to a limitation of debate on the amendment?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I am willing to have a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a time limitation on the pending amendment of 1 hour, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) and the manager of the bill.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I suggest that there be a limitation of 45 minutes to the side. Several Senators on this side have said they wanted to speak on the amendment. I will not use up all the time, but will be willing to yield back the remainder of the time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a time limitation on the pending amendment of one and one-half hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) and whoever is managing the bill at that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I yield myself 20 minutes.

The distinguished minority leader, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) was called out of the Chamber on a very urgent matter. He has requested me to state that I am making the statement on his behalf and as well as mine.

Mr. President, this amendment has received wide bipartisan support. Forty Senators have joined with Senator SCOTT and me as cosponsors of the amendment.

Mr. President, the sponsors of the amendment are listed as follows:

DEMOCRATS

Senator HARRIS of Oklahoma.
Senator HARTKE of Indiana.
Senator MONDALE of Minnesota.
Senator JACKSON of Washington.
Senator HUGHES of Iowa.
Senator CHURCH of Idaho.
Senator METCALF of Montana.
Senator INOUYE of Hawaii.
Senator HART of Michigan.
Senator YOUNG of Ohio.
Senator CRANSTON of California.
Senator McGOVERN of South Dakota.
Senator TYDINGS of Maryland.
Senator RANDOLPH of West Virginia.
Senator BAYH of Indiana.
Senator PROXMIRE of Wisconsin.
Senator RIBICOFF of Connecticut.
Senator MUSKIE of Maine.
Senator McGEE of Wyoming.
Senator EAGLETON of Missouri.
Senator McCARTHY of Minnesota.
Senator NELSON of Wisconsin.
Senator PELL of Rhode Island.
Senator GRAVEL of Alaska.
Senator FULBRIGHT of Arkansas.
Senator McINTYRE of New Hampshire.
Senator BURDICK of North Dakota.
Senator WILLIAMS of New Jersey.
Senator MONTOYA of New Mexico.
Senator CANNON of Nevada.
Senator BIBLE of Nevada.

REPUBLICANS

Senator GOODELL of New York.
Senator BROOKE of Massachusetts.

Senator CASE of New Jersey.
Senator PERCY of Illinois.
Senator COOK of Kentucky.
Senator SCHWEIKER of Pennsylvania.
Senator JAVITS of New York.
Senator HATFIELD of Oregon.
Senator PEARSON of Kansas.

Mr. President, I have read the names of the cosponsors to illustrate that this is a bipartisan measure. It is not a party matter.

The purpose of the amendment is twofold. First, it would restore to the Senate version of the tax bill the opportunity for legitimate private foundations to support nonpartisan voter registration projects.

Second, it would provide an effective means of curbing abuses that have occurred under the present law.

In short, our amendment presents a moderate and reasonable approach to authorizing legitimate voter registration activities, while insuring that past abuses do not reoccur.

II. THE NEED FOR THIS LEGISLATION

Under present law, there is no direct prohibition against a private foundation's supporting or contributing funds to voter registration projects. The present tax law does, however, prohibit private foundations from participating in or intervening in a campaign of a particular candidate for public office. Unfortunately, in a few isolated instances, a small minority of foundations have seriously abused their privilege to support voter registration and education projects in such a fashion as to clearly warrant legislation that will tighten the restrictions on political activities of tax-exempt foundations. The particular abuse of law that has caused the most controversy is the so-called "single shot" or "one time" voter drives. Simply stated, this type of activity is characterized by the formation of a voter registration drive that is localized in an area and dedicated to electing one particular candidate. Clearly, such operations are not educational or nonpartisan, but rather appendages of a particular candidate's campaign for office. This type of voter drive, although a perfectly acceptable political tool, should not be funded with tax-free dollars.

Every Senator who is supporting this amendment believes that this type of abuse must be curbed.

However, in focusing our attention on curbing abuses, it is all too easy to overlook the excellent work that has been done by private foundations in supporting legitimate nonpartisan voter education and registration projects. Thousands of Americans who have for years been locked out of our Government have been introduced to our democratic processes through the efforts of such well-recognized organizations as the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council, which have as their objectives the encouragement of all Americans, regardless of their political party or philosophy, to exercise their Constitutional right to vote. I believe the most active and successful of these organizations is the League of Women Voters. The successes that these two fine organizations have had in stimulating interest in voting and in registering people to vote who have never done so before are innumerable. However, I would like to point out some statistics which clearly show the positive effects of such voter registration drives.

In the 1968 presidential election, the League of Women Voters registered more than 18,000 new voters in New York's Harlem. During the same election, 750 league members registered more than 50,000 voters in California. In one weekend, the league registered 1,000 voters in a small town in the Midwest. These are but a few examples of the work the League of Women Voters has been doing throughout its 50-year history.

In the election in New York, most of these new registrants voted for the Democratic candidates. In the 1968 election in California, I believe that most of the new registrants voted for the Republicans.

We all know that the League of Women Voters is nonpartisan. During this time, the League of Women Voters has not been committed to a particular political party or candidate, but rather to the philosophy that an informed and active electorate is an essential part of our country's system of government.

The Southern Regional Council has dedicated its efforts to encouraging Negro citizens to exercise their right to vote and to take part in the affairs of government that so directly affect their lives and well-being.

This organization launched its first voter education project in 1962. The purpose of this project was to research the causes for low participation in government by Negroes and to stimulate interest in voting among this minority group. This program began in March of 1962, and ended in the fall of 1964, resulting in adding nearly 700,000 new voters to registration rolls. Because of the success of this project, the Southern Regional Council started a new project in 1966, which is still in operation. Like the first project, its purpose is also to bring many new voters into our political system.

There are numerous other organizations throughout the country that are working toward the common goal of encouraging minority groups to participate in government by voting rather than giving up on our way of government. Their efforts have greatly benefited the many members of minority groups who have long been systematically denied the right to vote, despite the plain language of the Constitution.

The House committee report on the tax bill is stated:

Two examples of existing private foundations which, based upon the committee's information as to their activities, are expected to be permitted to engage in such activities and receive other private foundation support are the League of Women Voters Education Fund and the Southern Regional Council.

The House committee put its stamp of approval on the activities of these two organizations, and I do not know of any dissent from that in the House committee report.

Organizations such as the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council all have certain things in common. First, none of these organizations has attempted to encourage membership in a party, elect a particular candidate, or champion a particular cause or political philosophy. On the contrary, what they have tried and are trying to do is to persuade people, regardless of their party or political beliefs, that our democratic system will respond to their needs and desires if they will only take the time to vote their convictions. Second, these organizations are dependent in large measure for support from private foundations to finance these important projects. Since our Government does not directly fund such voter-education projects, the burden of financing these operations has fallen on the private sector of our economy. Fortunately, civic-minded private foundations have responded to the need for these activities and have provided the bulk of the financing. Without foundation support, this very necessary work could not go on.

Consequently, in Congress efforts to curb abuses, we must be certain that we do not cripple legitimate programs. The amendment before the Senate today, I believe, succeeds in this endeavor. Of course, the amendment has 40 cosponsors. My staff and I did not write all of this by ourselves. Many people have worked on it, and this is the consensus we arrived at.

III. THE HOUSE BILL

In drafting H.R. 13270, the House of Representatives tried to curb the abuses that the present law allows and still protect such legitimate organizations as the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council. Unfortunately, the language of the House bill is much too restrictive and would actually eliminate rather than preserve legitimate voter education and registration programs.

More particularly, the House bill contains the following weaknesses:

First. The House bill requires that any organization engaged in voter education or registration with foundation support have as its "principal activity—nonpartisan political activity." This would directly eliminate the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council, because neither of these two organizations' principal activities are solely political.

Second. The House bill requires such organizations receiving foundation support to conduct their activities in five or more States. This unreasonable requirement would prohibit the activities of many legitimate organizations whose operations are conducted on a smaller scale.

Third. The House bill fails to prohibit voter registration activities limited to one specific election period. Without such a prohibition, the bill does not effectively curb the single-shot abuse. That is the real reason for the complaint that somebody would try to register enough voters in a city to control that city election. That is the problem. The House, in trying to tighten it up—the law—so as to prevent this abuse, failed to prohibit the one thing that has caused the controversy.

Fourth. The House bill requires that, if this organization receives foundation support, it must come from five or more foundations and that no one foundation supporter can give more than 25 percent to such an organization. This provision is much too restrictive and would seriously cripple the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council, because it is virtually impossible to find five foundations to support a voter registration project.

Fifth. The House bill does not prohibit the designation of contributions by a foundation for use only in one specific election. Therefore, it would still be possible for a foundation to indirectly finance a single shot voter drive under this House bill.

IV. THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE'S ACTION

Instead of trying to improve upon the House bill, the Senate Finance Committee took the ill-advised and completely unnecessary step of banning all foundation grants to organizations conducting voter registration and education projects. I believe this was unwise. What we should do is eliminate abuses. We should eliminate abuses such as the single shot, the attempt to control an election in one city, and we should have provisions that permit and protect the continuance of legitimate activities. The committee, on page 49 of its report, gave as its reason for this action that it is impossible to give assurances in all cases that voter registration drives would be conducted in a way that does not influence the outcome of public elections. In all respect to the committee, I submit that this reasoning is faulty. First, all elections are influenced by the number of voters who vote in them. Not only is this fact inherent in free elections, it is also desirable. In a democracy, it should be our aim to encourage the broadest range of participation and thought that is possible. Otherwise, we have government of the many by the select few. Furthermore, if the committee fears that effective legislation cannot be drawn that will solve problems under the present law, I submit that the amendment that Senator SCOTT and I present today will do this. We have too few people voting in this country, when we consider the percentage of adults who vote in other democracies of the world.

V. THE YARBOROUGH-SCOTT AMENDMENT

The amendment before the Senate is a moderate and reasonable solution to the perplexing problem of foundation support of voter education and registration projects. More specifically, the amendment provides the following:

First. The amendment eliminates the requirement that the organization conducting the voter project be engaged principally in political activities. The amendment provides that the organization's activities must be "nonpartisan"—not for either political party. This would allow organizations such as the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council, which have many nonpolitical activities, to engage in voter registration drives and receive foundation support. Thus, under this amendment, the organizations which qualify for foundation support will be less rather than more political.

Second. The amendment eliminates the unreasonable "five or more States" requirement and substitutes a requirement that the activities be conducted in "more than one State." This is far more reasonable and would meet the needs of the League of Women Voters.

Third. The amendment deals directly with the "single shot" voter drive by requiring that the organization's voter activities cannot be restricted to one specific election period. Under the present law, a foundation can put money in one drive in one city, just before an election, and influence the outcome of the election. That is not the purpose of this amendment. This amendment is to allow broad based support to qualify more Americans to vote, and not for a foundation to try to win one election in one limited area.

This is a safeguard that is not in the House bill which would protect against the practice of giving grants designated to affect the outcome of a particular election.

Fourth. The amendment eliminates the unreasonable requirement of support by five or more foundations, with a 25-percent ceiling on the contributions from each. In its place, the amendment substitutes a much more reasonable requirement of support by at least three foundations, with a 40-percent limitation on the amount any one foundation might give.

This change will protect against the abuse of one foundation controlling such an organization and will still not hamper the activities of the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council.

Fifth. As an additional safeguard against the single shot partisan voter drive, the amendment provides that no foundation can earmark its contributions to an organization conducting a voter registration drive for use in one specific election. This is also an additional protection not included in the House bill.

V. CONCLUSION

In summary, I wish to emphasize that it is the duty of Congress, as spokesmen for all our people, not to enact laws which will directly or indirectly exclude segments of our society from participating in our Government. This is particularly true in these days when many of our citizens, especially our young people, are questioning our whole system of Government. If our democracy is to survive, we must expand participation in Government to meet the increase in our population. If we do not do so, we will have a country which is governed by a select few. Such a situation would be contrary to the ideas and principles which are the very foundation of government in America.

In 1965, Congress took a major step toward fulfilling the American dream of a society which reflects the views and feelings of all our people by enacting the historic Voting Rights Act. This act embodies the belief of Congress and the majority of our citizens that the right to vote is fundamental and should be extended to all our people. As important as the Voting Rights Act is, it—standing alone—will not assure full participation in our Government. For the Voting Rights Act to be more than a scrap of paper, the people who have been denied the right to vote for so long must be educated as to their rights and encouraged to use them. Congress has left this task to private organizations. These organizations, with foundation support, have performed this task well. For us to pass this tax bill with the prohibition against foundation support of legitimate voter registration activities, without providing a workable substitute for such support, would not only undermine the Voting Rights Act but also be a direct blow to those people the act was meant to apply to. For these reasons, I earnestly request my colleagues to join with the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) and me and the other cosponsors of this amendment and approve it.

I wish to commend the able and distinguished minority leader for his leadership in this fight. He is known throughout the country as a strong supporter of voting rights legislation. It has been a pleasure to work with him on this important measure.

The Senator from Pennsylvania explained to me a commitment he has in connection with some people from out of the city. We had hoped to call up the amendment at a more convenient time. He has authorized me to say this statement, with which he is familiar, represents his views as well as mine.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Essential Tax Reform Amendments," published in the Washington Post today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ESSENTIAL TAX-REFORM AMENDMENTS

The disposition of the Senate to go along with the provisions of the tax-reform bill written by its Finance Committee, as it did in cutting the oil depletion allowance and in rejecting many other amendments, may be a sound general rule. It is very difficult to write a satisfactory tax bill on the Senate floor. There are some defects in the bill, however, which should not be trusted to the House-Senate conference committee.

One of these is the death sentence which the Finance Committee would impose on all foundations at the expiration of 40 years. The Finance Committee agreed upon this drastic action out of fear that foundations, if granted perpetual tax exemption, may exert "an undue influence on the private economy and on governmental decisions as well." But the committee offered no rational explanation as to why foundations would be more dangerous to the public in their second 40 years than in their first. Common sense suggests that if a foundation has rendered valuable public service in its first four decades it could be expected to continue doing so.

There seems to be no warrant for the belief that foundations are bringing about a dangerous concentration of economic power. A recent study shows that their aggregate assets have never amounted to more than 0.7 per cent of the country's wealth and that this percentage is now declining. We think there is much to be said for the requirement that a tax-exempt private foundation must distribute all its current income and in no event less than 5 per cent of the value of its assets. The same is true of the so-called supervisory tax, although the Finance Committee fixed the levy much higher than is necessary to cover administrative costs. But Congress should not arbitrarily decree the end of all foundations at the age of 40 (or by Jan. 1, 2010 in the case of existing foundations) without regard for the useful work they may then be doing.

Another amendment which should be regarded as a must is that offered by Senators Yarborough and Scott to save broadly based and nonpartisan voter registration and education programs financed by foundations. The House sought to limit foundation aid to programs of this sort which reach five or more states and which are not restricted to any specific geographical areas. The Finance Committee voted to black out any and all use of foundation funds to broaden participation in our democratic processes. The result would be to undercut the good work of the League of Women Voters Education Fund, the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council and various other organizations seeking to bring the citizen into closer contact with his government.

The Yarborough-Scott amendment would let this constructive work go forward and at the same time curb the abuses which have occasionally come to light in this sphere. It would allow foundation financing of nonpartisan voter registration and education projects if they are conducted in more than one state, if they are supported by contributions from the general public or from at least three tax-exempt organizations (no one contributing more than 40 per cent) and if the focus is not on one particular area or specific election. Certainly there are ample safeguards here. With this rational compromise at hand, the Senate would have no excuse for blindly cutting off the use of foundation funds to strengthen our democratic system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAXBE in the chair). Who yields time?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) and the distinguished Minority Leader, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT), which I have cosponsored, to permit private foundation funds to be used for voter registration. I supported the amendment when it was before the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member.

As has been made clear in the debate, if the action taken by the Senate Finance Committee is permitted to stand, voter education and voter registration activities of the League of Women Voters education fund and the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, along with other organizations would be eliminated. I hope that the Senate recognizes the outstanding work of these organizations and supports the Yarborough-Scott amendment.

Through the efforts of the Southern Regional Council voters education project, some 2 million voting-age Negroes in the South have been registered to vote. The League of Women Voters, operating through league members in 1,285 local leagues from coast to coast, has set up a voter education fund to distribute materials for the purpose of educating citizens about key and important issues and to organize citizen groups to register and involve voters in government. Other organizations have, on a smaller scale, carried out similar programs .

A democratic society must insure maximum participation by all citizens in the affairs of government, because the cornerstone rights of democracy are meaningless unless they are exercised. In recognition of this, some nations require citizens to vote. But in this country, high mobility and continued urbanization, coupled with involved residence requirements, are making it progressively more difficult for Americans to vote. In fact, 48 million eligible citizens—40 percent of all Americans of voting age—did not vote in last year's presidential election.

Mrs. Bruce B. Benson, president, League of Women Voters of the United States, in her testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, discussed the activities of the league in voter education and voter registration projects and commented on the importance of these projects stating:

> We believe that even more intensified efforts are needed in our society to involve more citizens at all levels of government; that a responsible democracy depends on citizens learning the importance and the responsibility of voting and of participation in the democratic process. Private philanthrophy plays a significant role in supporting the educational work needed to achieve the goal of an informed and active electorate.

Unfortunately, rather than intensify our efforts in this regard, we will take a step backward unless the Yarborough-Scott amendment is passed.

Adequate safeguards against partisan localized efforts are provided for in the amendment. If one truly believes in making this Government representative and in guaranteeing to all citizens the most fundamental of all rights of a democratic society—the right to vote—then efforts to educate and register voters must be continued and encouraged.

We answer those who advocate violence that the ballot box is still the most important weapon. The adoption of this amendment will undergird and strengthen that statement.

This amendment provides adequate safeguard against partisan localized efforts while encouraging those foundations which support this fundamental right of a democratic society. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished cosponsor of the amendment such time as he desires within our time limitation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas, who is the principal cosponsor with me on this amendment. I appreciate very much what the distinguished Senator from Texas said in introducing the amendment and his explanation in my temporary absence from the floor of the Senate during a part of his presentation.

As its primary Republican cosponsor, I welcome this opportunity to speak in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) to reinstate in the Senate version of H.R. 13270, the tax reform bill now before us, provisions which would permit tax-exempt foundation funds to be used for voter registration and education programs. I am pleased to note that this effort has a broad base of support in the cosponsorship of Senators from both sides of the aisle.

Our amendment has drawn support also from the Washington Post in an editorial of this morning which describes passage as—and I quote—"a must." The Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) has already had this editorial printed in the RECORD.

I would simply note now the editorial's conclusion that—

> The Senate would have no excuse now for blindly cutting off the use of foundation funds to strengthen the democratic system.

Mr. President, our amendment is addressed to the action taken by the Senate Finance Committee in totally deleting from the tax reform bill provisions which would permit private foundations funds to be used for voter registration activities. This action, in my opinion, was far more severe than justified or necessary. It complicated further the action taken earlier by the House of Representatives in approving restrictions which, in attempting to correct a few abuses, would have the practical effect of terminating the participation of many well recognized nonpartisan foundations in programs of this kind.

Our amendment, Mr. President, is not without its safeguards; its conditions for eligibility are explicit. It requires that voter registration activities be of a truly nonpartisan nature; that they be conducted in more than one State; that they be supported by contributions from the general public or from three or more tax-exempt organizations, and that no one tax-exempt organization contribute more than 40 percent to any given voter registration effort. Further, our amendment requires continuity by prohibiting the specific designation of tax-exempt funds for use in a particular geographical area or specific election. In short, our amendment, while broad enough to encourage legitimate voter registration and education, is drawn tightly enough to discourage a repetition of those few isolated instances in which foundations have misused the exemption granted them under our present tax laws by engaging in partisan political activities.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is deeply concerned by the potential impact which the Senate version of the tax reform bill would have in this area, if enacted without amendment. The Commission, while urging a more active Federal role, has officially recognized also that the right to vote will not be realized fully unless the burden of taking affirmative action to encourage voter registration is shared with the Federal Government by others. Two private organizations which come readily to mind for their success in nonpartisan efforts in voter registration and education are the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council. There are others, perhaps less well known, but equally deserving of public recognition and confidence. Unfortunately, the Senate bill not only fails to recognize the need for voter education programs of this kind, but it undermines totally private foundation efforts directed at stimulating voter participation.

Our amendment is designed to continue, with adequate safeguards, the tax stimulus needed to encourage and make possible this support.

As one of its strong proponents, I am encouraged by the progress which has been realized to date under the Voting Rights Act of 1965. This act embodies the belief of Congress, a belief shared by a clear majority of Americans, that the right to vote is fundamental to our democracy and should be extended to all of our people. I hope to see the Voting Rights Act further strengthened by extension in this Congress, and I intend to lend fully my support.

But as important as this act is, it cannot, by itself, assure full participation for all Americans in the governmental process. For this goal finally to be achieved, those citizens, who have been denied the voting right that the rest of us take for granted, must be educated about this right and encouraged to exercise it.

Private organizations have responded well to this challenge, and their hard work is reflected in increased voter registration throughout the country. Only this week, for example, the Bureau of the Census has reported that the number of Negroes in Southern States who voted in the presidential election last year increased to 51 percent, compared with 44 percent for the presidential election of 1964. The Bureau's report adds that 61 percent of the South's Negro population was actually registered to vote in 1968. The positive impact of this effort must not be abated, especially when so much remains still to be done, not only in the South, but also in the urban areas of the North and in the rural Southwest.

Therefore, I urge all Members of the Senate to give our amendment their serious consideration and support.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I support the amendment because I think it is extremely desirable. It is part of the omnibus amendment on foundations which I have introduced, No. 340. The theory of that amendment is to eliminate certain aspects of the bill which are highly deleterious to philanthropic activities, including the 40-year lifetime provision and the question of voter registration activities.

I intend to see what is done and what is not done by the Senate and then to present a composite amendment to the Senate on the subject and to authorize the establishment of a Presidential commission to take up from that matters we delete from the bill.

The Scott-Yarborough amendment is desirable, because it is an activist answer to the alienation of so many people from Government. This applies especially to the young. This provision would permit a foundation to proceed in an area in which Government cannot proceed—in voter registration drives. We would hardly expect the Government to engage in a voter registration drive because it would appear to be trying to exert political influence.

The most conclusive argument is that it will be worse to have the Government engage in this activity than for the foundation. It is argued that foundations should not engage in this activity, for they then become too much involved in politics, and that if the foundation cannot do it, then the Government will have to do it. I reject this argument, and I think the Senate should reject it also.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Utah for questions.

Mr. MOSS. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas some questions. When the amendment was first drafted and presented to me, I considered being a cosponsor of it, and then I withheld because of the questions I had.

I want it understood that I think this is an advance over the terms of the bill. Certainly I would vote for the amendment but I feel that it is still too restrictive because I think we should encourage in every way we can voter registration and work of that sort. I wondered why the limitation is still on, requiring, for instance, in subparagraph (2) on page 2, the requirement that the action be carried on in more than one State?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Because of objections to the present law which have been raised to the so-called "single shot" voter drive. Political experience has taught that in some isolated cases a foundation has gone into an area just before a particular election, and registered the voters, urging them to elect a particular candidate. The requirement in our amendment that the organization must be active in one or more states will curb this type of abuse without harming legitimate projects.

The House bill restricted foundation support even further than this amendment, by requiring that they operate in at least five or more States.

Now as between the House provision and the Senate provision, which prohibits altogether foundation support of these voter prospects, the amendment we have offered provides a reasonable and workable solution to the problems that exist under the present law. The purpose of this amendment is restrictive, but restrictive only for the purpose of trying to keep these activities nonpartisan. If they are not, then the foundation loses its tax exemption.

Mr. MOSS. Why then does subsection 4 carry the requirement that not more than 40 percent be received over a period of 5 years including the year in question which is really a requirement that there be three or more organizations involved in the registration?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. That is right.

Mr. MOSS. Why cannot the foundation, just as a blanket matter, seek to have voters registered whether anyone else comes in with them or not?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Because under the present law, experience has shown that it's undesirable for one foundation to contribute all the funds for a voter drive. This amendment is an effort to get a reasonable regulation to fit the widespread objections in this Nation, which prompted the action of the Finance Committee.

Mr. MOSS. What about an organization like the League of Women Voters? They do great work in my State and I believe in all the other States of the Union. One of their activities is voter registration. They also study issues and things of that sort, but they are also active in voter registration. In other words, it does not seem to me that we should be putting more roadblocks in the way but should be trying to urge everyone we can to get people registered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The League of Women Voters has been an entirely nonpartisan organization. They fully support this amendment. The feeling about the major purpose of this amendment is to let them continue. This amendment will not harm their activity. There is an old proverb in my State that, "Money makes the mare go." If one foundation puts most of the money into a voter drive, we might have a voter project which is slanted one way. This should not be. But if two or three foundations put up the money, the chances of domination are eliminated. True, it makes it harder to raise the money, but it will also make it more likely to be truly nonpartisan if more than one foundation is involved.

Mr. MOSS. I will vote for the amendment but I still have my reservations. It seems to me that when we are getting people to register so that they will be in a position to vote, even if at the same time we are trying to persuade them how to vote after they register, we have gained an advance in the democratic society in which we live and in which we urge people to register and vote. We do all those things, but if somebody comes in, or does not come in and do it properly, or otherwise spends money to get people to register so that they are eligible to vote, when election day comes it seems to me that is still an advance. I do not like to see any restrictions put in the way of doing that.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I agree in theory with the distinguished Senator from Utah. I agree with the ideal. But we face a practical problem that must be solved. We face the situation in this country where we have only 70 percent voter participation. In West Germany it is 90 percent. In England, it is 76 percent. In my State of Texas, in the 1960 elections, with the spirited presidential election, only 43 percent of adults in the State of Texas voted.

There was the greatest interest in that election than in any other in my State. I think in Idaho there was a participation of 86 percent. Our friends across the Red River voted on the national average of 63 percent.

About 1.6 million of our citizens in Texas are Mexican-Americans and they have had fewer years of schooling than has any other minority. It is necessary to have voter registration drives to teach them the necessity of registering and voting, because they have been excluded for so many years.

We are trying to save the right of these foundations to participate in voter registration drives. This amendment is a better measure than came out of either the Finance Committee or the House.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY).

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the Scott-Yarborough amendment, I rise in support of its acceptance.

There are probably few provisions of the Tax Relief Act which are more important in preserving democratic principles and in developing fundamental citizen support for our institutions.

Foundations have contributed funds to organizations to enlist citizen support in registering to vote and in actually going to the polls to vote. The Southern Regional Conference and the League of Women Voters are two organizations that come to mind that have engaged in these activities.

Can there really be objection to permitting foundation money to be used for these purposes so long as partisanship is prohibited? Is there anything subversive in encouraging persons to engage in voting? If so, I am at a loss to understand how this could be.

We have heard much recently about the insidious control of large sums of wealth by a small group of men shielded behind the walls of foundations. Yet, except in a limited number of cases of abuse, these foundations have been instrumental in contributing hundreds of millions of dollars annually to education, charities, health, and other selected areas of public interest in addition to voter registration drives. These are innovative, constructive, and creative grants. They have strengthened our society. People are being involved to an ever-increasing extent in the operations of our institutions. We would be most foolish to undermine this effort.

The amendment before us authorizes foundations to fund nonpartisan voter registration activities to be conducted in more than one State. Contributions must be supported from three or more tax exempt foundations. No one tax exempt organization may contribute more than 40 percent to any given voter registration—education activity. Moreover, contributions may not be specifically designated for use in a particular geographical area or specific election.

Government cannot do everything. In fact, in recent years we are seriously questioning what it can accomplish in the area of social need. To an even greater extent, Government should not be permitted to interfere in the political processes of a free society. The prohibitions on foundations in the voter registration area clearly constitute governmental obstruction of efforts to strengthen citizen participation in democratic institutions. This is wrong. Enactment of the pending amendment will prevent this potential danger.

Mr. President, I would hope, also in addition to concentration on registration and voter participation, that we would have a broad-scale educational program for the American public emphasizing the need for participation in every election. It is disgraceful that in this country—almost 100 percent literate—only two-thirds of its people engage in presidential elections. It is even more disgraceful to see the low participation of eligible voters in local and primary elections.

I am sure my experience is the same as that of many others as we have toured college campuses and talked to students. Many of them charge that the political process simply is not responsive. Yet when one asks them what they know about a primary and how many of their parents participate in primary elections, we learn the percentage is very small indeed.

How can they expect to get the kind of candidates and the kind of Government they want so necessary to a two-party system if they do not participate in the selection of the candidates, not just at the Federal level, but at all levels.

Voter registration drives should include the teaching of the responsibility that goes with citizenship to register and vote.

Some people have suggested that we ought to tax people if they do not exercise their franchise. I would be against compulsion in that area. This is a voluntary society, but we ought to do everything we can to encourage voter participation in every election and make it a part of our activities as citizens.

Foundations have been able to do a magnificent, nonpartisan job in voter registration. That goes to the heart and essence of what a democratic republic should be. For us to stop these organizations from trying to strengthen the Nation would be wrong, as we see it.

I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

I desire to read from the Internal Revenue Code, paragraph (3), section 501(c). It reads as follows:

> Corporations, and any community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, no substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation, and which does not participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements), any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office.

That is the basis for "(c)(3)" tax exemption for all organizations, groups, foundations, and societies in our country. Congress wrote that into the Code on the premise that educational, charitable, philanthropic, and scientific organizations that pursued those purposes were benefiting mankind and deserved tax exemption.

Many of these groups have done an outstanding job. Cancer research has produced breakthroughs to extend the lives of human beings, for example. The Senator from Georgia could name thousands of benefits to humanity that have resulted from the activities of tax-exempt organizations.

Unfortunately, in recent years some of the very groups that tax exemption was designed to assist, have drifted more and more into the political arena. We have seen much of it in recent days and in recent years. We have reports that one foundation contributed $175,000 for a voter registration drive in the city of Cleveland alone. That foundation takes credit for the result of the election, and claims that it resulted in election of the mayor. That foundation used $175,000 that was exempt from tax under an act of Congress.

In the House, when this matter was being considered by the Ways and Means Committee, Representative ROONEY, of New York, appeared before the committee and testified that during the recent election he did not have to run against a candidate, but against a foundation. He ran against a man of enormous wealth, who had a family foundation. Every few days during the course of the campaign, this particular opponent of Representative ROONEY—and his name has been referred to: Frederick W. Richman, a wealthy businessman, industrialist, coffee manufacturer, owner of the National Casket Co., among other companies—would appear somewhere in the congressional district, according to Representative ROONEY's testimony, and announce another generous contribution by his family foundation to some ethnic or religious group. Of course, he would be applauded by that ethnic or religious group, and it made headlines in the newspapers. This man was running for Congress on tax-exempt money that belonged to his own foundation.

We could name hundreds of other cases. We have recently read about people who have been granted trips around the world by other foundations, for no probable reason that anyone could think of. There are many other instances of this kind, Mr. President.

The House Ways and Means Committee took affirmative action to tighten up this provision of the tax code. But the Senate Finance Committee, by an overwhelming majority, did not think it went far enough. The Finance Committee thought voter registration drives were fine. But the committee did not think registration drives ought to be conducted with tax-exempt money. The Senate Finance Committee thought registration drives ought to be conducted by people seeking election to public office, the way they always have been.

Every candidate who has ever been elected to this body, and every candidate who has ever run for local office, knows that the most important thing in any election is to get your supporters registered, and, after you get them registered, to get your supporters to the ballot box. That is the very essence of politics. That is the A and B in politics: first registration, and second voting.

If Congress wants tax-exempt foundations to do that, we can approve this particular amendment. But I do not believe the Congress nor the people of the United States want tax-exempt foundations—and they have been estimated to be as many as 400,000 in number, with $31 billion in assets—in the political arena; and I do not think such foundations belong there. Foundations ought to be divorced from politics. Foundations ought to be restricted to the purposes stated in the code, which I read to the Senate a moment ago: scientific, charitable, educational, and phlianthropic. I do not think foundations belong in the political arena.

Let me tell you what they can do in the political arena. I read from the Senator's amendment here, on page 2, paragraph 2, line 2. He says that here are the conditions under which he would permit tax-exempt organizations to participate in voter registration drives:

First, they have got to be nonpartisan.

Well, I can think of a lot of people who are nonpartisan. I have got a lot of friends in Georgia who are nonpartisan. If my nonpartisan friends can conduct voter registration drives, you can bet your bottom dollar my next campaign will be successful.

So far as I know, the John Birch Society is nonpartisan. So far as I know, the Ku Klux Klan is nonpartisan. And so far as I know, the Black Panthers are nonpartisan. You can just pick out any nonpartisan group you want and give them foundation money—just so long as that nonpartisan group is friendly to the man you want to elect—and you have complied with the nonpartisan provision of this amendment.

Let us look at the amendment again. The activities it must be confined to more than one specific election.

I do not know of any politicians who run just one time, unless they get beat and retire from the battlefield. They plan to run more than once. So you finance more than one specific election with this foundation money. You just go in there and say, "Oh, no, we are not going to pick out our candidates for one-shot deals; we are going to finance once, twice, thrice with tax-exempt money."

What are the other conditions here? The Senator's amendment provides that the activities have to be carried out in more than one State.

What is more than one State? One State and one voter. Georgia plus the nearest adjacent and smallest precinct in Tennessee, with 18 people registered. Then you have complied with the Senator's amendment. That is how ridiculous it is.

Let me tell you what I would do if I happened to be the Governor of New York, and this amendment were agreed to. The Governor of New York happens to belong to an enormously wealthy family. The Governor of New York has many foundations. The Governor of New York happens to have a brother who is Governor of another State. He is an enormously wealthy man. Both have plenty of foundations.

If I were Governor of New York, I would just call up my brother and say, "Look here, it's time you and I got together. You get your foundations, and I'll get mine. I'll send my voter registration cards to Arkansas, and you send your voter registration cards to New York."

I am not charging, Mr. President, that that is being done. I am stating what could be done; and I know politicians do not always act with the greatest of altruistic motives. My opponents, particularly, have sometimes been known to do some pretty base things. [Laughter.]

I would think that a politician who had a foundation and really wanted to win the next election would pull out all the stops. You would see that foundation money start flowing to such degree that they would not even need a good cotton crop in the State of Oklahoma, because the foundation money would take care of them. They would not need one in Texas, either; and if I were in the position of the Senator from Texas, with some of the people with enormously wealthy foundations they have at their disposal, I would be somewhat leery of promoting an amendment whereby I could open all of the stopgaps or that foundation money that could be turned loose on me in the next election.

All of us are for voter registration. It just depends on who is going to do it. I know we need educational campaigns. I know we need more of our people registered. I am ashamed of the number of people that are registered in our country. But I am even more ashamed of the few that vote who are already registered.

I think, if we authorize the tremendous foundations of this country with $31 billion in assets, to go into the political arena, to choose elections of their choice, campaigns of their choice, and candidates of their choice, to promote registration drives with tax-free money, that would be a very dangerous thing. We have had too much of it already. The Senate Finance Committee wants to stop it, and the vote in our committee, after listening to the facts and the evidence, Mr. President, was overwhelming.

I now yield such time as he may require to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the privilege of tax exemption is almost an incomparable economic privilege in our society. There are an estimated 400,000 tax exempt organizations in the United States. It becomes imperative—it has already become imperative, and long overdue—for Congress to set some limits, to provide some specifics, to establish some definition of terms.

Under present law, a foundation can be created for the general purposes set out in the code, and achieve tax exemption. It is left almost entirely to the creator of the foundation himself to decide what is, for instance, a charitable purpose.

I wish to turn briefly, now, to the particular amendment here involved. To be perfectly candid with the Senate, Mr. President, there are not many Members of this body who might aspire to further service who might be greater beneficiaries of voter registration drives by tax exempt foundations than the senior Senator from Tennessee. But is that a charitable purpose? Is that a philanthropic purpose?

I suggest it might be a worthy purpose; but should we adopt a policy of saying that voter registration, whoever it may help or hurt, is a purpose for which tax exemption should be provided?

After hearing the evidence, after learning of the abuses to which voter registration drives had been subject, the political purposes, the partisan purposes to which they could be directed, I concluded to support the provision in the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. President, a political purpose may be a good civic purpose. However, if politics can be regarded as a proper use of tax exempt funds, then what other purpose would we exclude?

We must hew to the line as to the purposes for which tax exemption is extended.

Under the proposed amendment, it would not be left to the elected Representatives of the people to decide what political purpose would be served or what political conditions would be favored. Indeed, it would be left to this vast reservoir of money in foundations, now estimated to be in excess of $30 billion.

Thus, we would be treading on thin ice, on dangerous ground. I suggest that the amendment be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield such time to the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee as he may desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it has only been recently that anyone thought of voter registration drives as being anything other than political drives to influence an election for the benefit of those putting on the drives. In recent years, it has been contended that some groups put on voter registration drives without reference to whom they would help or hurt. However, I submit that in most instances voter registration drives are not put on so much as a matter of good citizenship as a matter of seeing that one side or the other prevails.

In an election, historically, with respect to political organizations, the first thing they would do would be to see that everyone who is likely to vote for their side is registered. They make no effort to see that those who they think might vote against them are registered.

It was very expensive in some cases, but organizations do it as a matter of necessity to win the election.

The second thing they would do would be to see that all of the people who favor them would get out and vote if they could do so.

I have made great efforts to try to increase registration in my State. I have gone about as far as everyone else does when they are seeking to have voters register.

I made it a particular point to get those people to register in the area in which I thought the people would vote for me when I was running for office. I suppose that everyone else would do the same thing in close years.

When labor thinks it is very important that those in a certain area be registered or that those who agree with their point of view are registered, they raise money and put on voter registration drives. Other groups do likewise.

There are some, let it be said, who perhaps put on a voter registration drive without desiring to have the election favor one group of candidates or another group of candidates or one philosophy or different philosophy. However, in most cases, voter registration drives have a political purpose—to elect those who agree with the philosophy of those putting on the voter registration drives.

Mr. President, some years ago we passed a civil rights law in the voting rights field. And some of us from the South have been trying to make that law applicable to the entire United States. We feel that if it is a good law, it ought to be applied everywhere.

If someone does not think it is good enough to be applied in his own State, he should not try to have it apply to another State.

In Louisiana, under that law, if someone feels that a minority group is being discriminated against because of race or some other reason, he has a right to send the Federal registrars down the road and register everyone who can write his name, so that everyone is on the roll whether he comes and votes or not.

I am not criticizing that. All I am saying is that if that principle is right in Louisiana, it should be equally right and applicable anywhere else. However, I do not object to using Federal money or any foundation money to see that everyone who is mentally competent and has the least modicum of education required, enough to know what he is doing, should be registered and qualified to vote. However, when people are privileged to use tax-free money in a way to say directly or indirectly which side should win an election, I find that very objectionable.

My uncle, who was three times the Governor of Louisiana, once told me, "If you spend money to try to haul voters to the polls, you ought to spend it in the areas where you think you will win. If you spend money in the areas where you think you will lose, most of the voters there will vote for the other fellow."

Mr. President, I think generally that most people interested in voter registration will spend their money in the areas where they think their philosophy is more likely to win.

There are a lot of political purposes involved. If these foundations with tax exempt money are permitted to use their money for voter registration, there is no way to keep politics from creeping into the matter.

I submit that this is not the kind of thing we had in mind when we provided a tax exemption and provided a charitable contribution deduction so that up to 70 percent of the funds would be Government money in order to do charitable and educational work or provide benefits for humanity.

That money was not intended to be used for the political advantage of one group or the other. I submit that there is no way in the pending amendment or in any similar amendment by which someone cannot find a way to use it to his advantage, in spite of any safeguards provided by the Senator from Texas.

I hope the amendment is rejected.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-two minutes remain.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield such time as he desires to the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be rejected. The committee went very thoroughly into the whole principle of allowing charitable contributions to be deducted from income for tax purposes and allowing tax exemption for foundations on the premise that the money would be used for charity and charitable activities.

Certainly political activities do not come under that category. As has been pointed out by my colleague, there is no such thing as a voter registration drive in any one area that cannot be diverted toward the benefit of the party of the choice of those having the voter registration drive. It can be either for or against some particular party or candidate in an area.

All they have to do is to select the area in which to have the voter registration drive. If they select one State or two States, they can still carry out the same objective.

I think that if the amendment is agreed to, it will make it possible for the foundations to continue to use their money for political activities. It will make it harder for us in conference and in the committee to hold the advantages which the foundations now enjoy otherwise and which we would like to have preserved for them.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas is prepared to do so, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I believe it will be necessary to use our 4 minutes.

How much time does the distinguished Senator from Kentucky desire?

Mr. COOK. Two minutes.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOK. Mr. President, I might be wrong, but I have a notion that we, as politicians, may think a little more of ourselves than we are entitled to think, because in my State that is not the only thing voter registration is used for. There are other reasons for putting people on the rolls. We have some school systems in the United States that, because so few people are registered, vote down taxes, and the schools are closed and cannot open after Thanksgiving or in the spring. We have major issues in communities that want to build a better community, and so few people are registered, who always vote against things, that you cannot pass a bond issue.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. Does the Senator think it is the responsibility of foundations to register enough people to vote for things instead of against them?

Mr. COOK. I might suggest to the Senator that I think it is the responsibility of foundations, if they feel, and if we in this body feel, that it is within the framework of the law of this land, they might take upon themselves the responsibility of educating people to the fact that they ought to exercise this right.

I think it is rather an odd and shameful thing in this Nation that we can vote, when we get around to it, in a presidential year, 70 percent of the people; and in countries throughout the world 98 and 99 percent of the people stand in the rain to vote.

I might suggest to the Senator that I have a notion that it is not just the foundations that vote for the political races. I think they want to get people registered for many other things, and they are put on the rolls for many other things. They can accomplish many other things as a result of it, and I support the amendment.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, this amendment specifically provides that a foundation cannot support one particular candidate or one particular issue. Furthermore, the foundation cannot earmark the money for one particular purpose.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia suggested to me that I might not want to see any of the foundation money in Texas flow in against me. Let me say that I have had all the corporation money of America against me, and there are not enough foundations to equal that, when you see all the vast corporations turn out their junior executives the last 3 weeks in Houston and Dallas and swarm over Texas like locusts. I am not afraid of foundations in comparison with what already has been turned loose by the large corporations of America.

The Senator from Kentucky is correct—we politicians are too egotistical.

There will be issues on the Texas ballot next year that will stir the people of my State more than all the politicians or all the parties can. These are constitutional amendments.

Last year we had 4 million people registered in Texas out of over 6 million adults. That is only 66⅔ percent of the eligible voters. In the hottest race in Texas, the gubernatorial campaign, only one out of four adults voted. It is a problem to get people registered; it is a problem to get them to vote.

It is a shame that we have such poor voter registration in America. Let us at least make it possible for the people to qualify to vote. This amendment would do this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I have a request for time from the distinguished Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY. I should like 2 minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I am interested in the colloquy. I also have had some background and experience in practical politics, and I also know that the purpose of tax-free foundations has been clearly spelled out, as read by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, and it was carefully put in the law, so that the moneys that are tax-free will be used for these specific purposes.

I know that my distinguished colleague from Texas would not think of having a tax-free foundation try to affect anybody's registration or voting. But I am afraid that, if this amendment is adopted, the control might slip away from this Chamber and from this carefully operating body, and somebody down the line might decide that they could register in certain areas and neglect to register in others. I think we are naive and are kidding ourselves if we think this will not happen and if we do not know that it already has happened. One of the objections to many of the foundations at the present time is that they have gone into areas that are illegal, which they should not have gone into, and they are attempting to influence political policy; and that is one of the things we are talking about or will be talking about later.

I agree that everybody should be registered. I agree that everybody should exercise his right to vote and should be interested and should be educated. But I do not think that the only way to achieve this is by tax-free money. I think that might be the worst possible way to achieve it, because I am afraid some individuals—knowing the weaknesses of human nature—would not be able to resist the temptation to use the money to influence an election or a candidacy in the furtherance of one political party against another.

I think this would be a very dangerous amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, if we are going to proceed on the premise that only foundations can get this job done, would it not be better to levy a broad tax against the foundations, put the money into a national pool, and let them go out and register all Americans, in all 50 States? Then there would be no partiality. If the foundations really want to register people, let them come forward, and we will put a tax on them and put it all in one pot, rather than have somebody sitting in an ivory tower say, "We will register voters only in a State where they will vote my way."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I think the Senator's suggestion is a good one. I recall that 3 years ago, in the poverty war, we found evidence that poverty money was being used to register people, and only in certain areas, and the results of those registrations were strange—almost selective.

It will be recalled that I went to great lengths to try to get everybody who was being paid by the poverty funds put under the Hatch Act, to take them out of politics.

Certain areas should be nonpolitical, and I think a tax-free foundation is one of them. By design, they are barred from politics, and they should keep out of politics and not even help in registration.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I shall be brief.

No one objects to voter registration. Everyone should approve of all qualified registered voters being on the registration lists. The only argument I have with the amendment of the Senator from Texas is that it would authorize so-called tax-exempt charitable institutions, which do not pay money to their Government, to engage in voter registration. Voter registration is politics in an extreme form.

When we get down to the final analysis, the most important thing about politics is, first, get your friends registered; second, get your friends to put a ballot in the box on election day. If this amendment is adopted, we will authorize tax exempt foundations to engage in 50 percent of that political activity.

We do not even permit corporations to make contributions to political campaigns. It is a violation of the law. It is a criminal offense. It is a criminal offense for labor unions to make political contributions. They recognize that they should not be engaged in the field even though corporations pay taxes on their income.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TALMADGE. But here we have an amendment that would provide—yes, this tax exempt organization—it is tax exempt because it is supposed to be engaged in charity and philanthropy—is going to be permitted to do things tax free that are denied corporations and denied labor unions. That is the essence of what the amendment boils down to.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will take their seats. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I think people of this country have made up their minds that they want tax free organizations, foundations, and charitable groups that are supposed to be engaged in scientific, philanthropic, educational, and charitable activities, to cease political activities.

Mr. President, we have had too much of it, and I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I find it hard to understand how legislation intended to correct Federal tax inequities has come to include a provision forbidding the use of foundation funds for nonpartisan democratic activities.

Voter registration programs such as those sponsored by the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council have been legitimate forms of citizen education for nearly 50 years. These activities have been successful in many parts of the country in making the democratic ideal a reality.

In the 1968 national conventions, both political parties pledged their best efforts to increase citizen participation in government at all levels. The pending amendment would protect that pledge by restoring the opportunity for private foundation support of nonpartisan voter registration and education projects. And it would prevent abuses with new regulations insuring that the activities be truly nonpartisan and not limited to one locality or a particular election.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will emphatically endorse continued nonpartisan voter registration programs by adopting the pending amendment.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, one important aim of any democratic society should be to encourage citizens to participate in the electoral process.

One way to work toward that aim is through voter education campaigns.

For example, many local units of the League of Women Voters work each year on such activities.

The Southern Regional Council has for some years conducted a voter education program which has been successful in broadening participation in the electoral process.

Congress recognized the importance of broadening citizen participation in elections when it passed the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Now unfortunately, if Congress enacts the recommendation of the Senate Finance Committee or, for that matter, the House-approved provision, we will, in fact, turn our backs on that principal.

I speak of provisions in the Tax Reform Act of 1969 which would either prohibit or greatly reduce participation of tax-exempt foundations in voter education and registration programs.

The Senate Finance Committee recommended a complete ban on the use of tax-exempt foundations funds for such purposes.

The House version would allow such activity only if donations to the voter registration or education funds were not restricted for use in specific geographical regions and the campaigns were conducted by organizations active in at least five States.

Mr. President, if indeed some tax exempt organizations have abused the right to conduct voter education programs, that is no reason to eliminate that right completely. Nor is it any reason to hamstring such efforts as severely as the House version would.

For that reason, I strongly support the amendment now offered by Senator YARBOROUGH and Senator HUGH SCOTT, the minority leader. I was pleased to cosponsor the amendment and urge its approval as further evidence that Congress believes that it is in the best interest of our democracy to broaden citizen participation in the electoral process.

The amendment would allow foundations to put funds into voter education programs provided: First, these activities are truly nonpartisan; second, they are conducted in more than one State; third, they are supported by contributions from the general public or from three or more tax-exempt organizations; fourth, no one tax-exempt organization contributes more than 40 percent to these activities; and, fifth, contributions to such activities are not specifically designated for use in a particular geographical area or specific election.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires time, I am prepared to yield back my time and vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields back the remainder of his time. All other time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH). On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote I have a live pair with the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MILLER (when his name was called). I have a live pair with the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND). If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia (after having voted in the negative). I have a live pair with the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON). If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNEDY (when his name was called). Present.

I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH) and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) would each vote "yea."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) is absent on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) is necessarily absent.

The respective pairs of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and that of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) have been previously announced.

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 35, as follows:

So Mr. YARBOROUGH's amendment (No. 332) was agreed to.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT and Mr. JAVITS move to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TAXATION OF COOPERATIVE CORPORATIONS AMENDMENTS NO. 341

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I call up my amendments No. 341.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated by the clerk.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendments.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendments be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments (No. 341) are as follows:

Amend section 121 by relettering subsection (g) as subsection (h).

On page 148, after line 9, insert the following new subsection:

"(g) INCOME OF COOPERATIVES FROM ACTIVITIES NOT RELATED TO MARKETING OR PURCHASING FUNCTIONS.—

"(1) LIMITATION ON ADJUSTMENT OF COOPERATIVE INCOME.—Section 1382 (relating to taxable income of cooperatives) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(g) LIMITATION ON ADJUSTMENT OF COOPERATIVE INCOME FOR PATRONAGE DIVIDENDS, PER UNIT RETAIN ALLOCATIONS, NONPATRONAGE DISTRIBUTIONS, ETC.—The sum of the adjustments allowable under subsections (b) and (c) for the taxable year to any organization to which this part applies shall not exceed the taxable income of the organization (computed without regard to such subsections) for such year attributable to the related activities (as defined in section 1388 (j)) of such organization.'

"(2) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—Subsections (b) and (c) of section 1382 (relating to taxable income of cooperatives) are hereby amended by deleting the word 'In' at the beginning of each such subsection and substituting the phrase 'Except as provided by subsection (g), in'.

"(3) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN DISTRIBUTIONS.—Section 1385 (relating to amounts includable in patron's gross income) is amended by deleting the phrase 'subsection (b)' in subsection (a) thereof, inserting in lieu thereof the phrase 'subsections (b) or (d)', and adding at the end of such section the following new subsection:

"'(d) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN AMOUNTS AS CORPORATE DISTRIBUTIONS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, distributions of amounts for which adjustments under section 1382 (b) or (c) have been disallowed by reason of section 1382(g) shall have tax consequences determined by applying the rules of part I of subchapter C (relating to distributions by corporations) and all other provisions of this chapter relating to corporate distributions. Subsection (a) shall not apply to such distributions. For purposes of this title (other than this subchapter) such distributions shall be treated as having been made by a corporation which is not operating on a cooperative basis.'

"(4) DEFINITION OF RELATED ACTIVITIES.—Section 1388 (relating to definitions; special rules) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j) RELATED ACTIVITIES.—For purposes of this subchapter, the term 'related activities' means activities, carried on by an organization to which part I applies, which consist of marketing products of patrons of the organization (including preserving, storing, and packaging such products) or purchasing supplies for patrons of the organization (including mixing, packaging, and local delivery of such supplies)."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is the Senator willing to agree to a limitation of time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the amendment be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided between the manager of the bill and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield to me, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) be allowed to proceed, before the amendment is considered, with no time coming out of the time allotted to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

PARTICIPATION IN GUEST CRUISE ABOARD U.S.S. "CORAL SEA"

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me briefly for a correction of the RECORD?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on Tuesday, during a speech on Navy public relations, I said that Bertrand Harding took two trips to Hawaii aboard the U.S.S. Coral Sea as a guest of the Navy. Late Tuesday, I received the following telegram:

> Your speech on the Senate Floor this morning states that I was a guest of the Navy Department on cruises in the Pacific Ocean in September 1968 and March 1969. You have been misinformed. I did not participate in either of these cruises, or any other. The Secretary of the Navy invited me to participate in 1968 and I was unable to go. The invitation was reissued for the 1969 cruise and again I was unable to go.
> BERTRAND M. HARDING.

I regret the error. I note Mr. Harding's name was included on two lists supplied me by the Navy's Information Office in response to my request for those guests participating in the Secretary of the Navy guest cruises.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the two lists supplied to me by the Navy on which Mr. Harding's name appeared. The lists are headed "Lists of Guests Participating," and so on.

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY FINCH PRAISES SENATOR MURPHY'S LEGISLATIVE RECORD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, recently I had the pleasure of being one of the speakers at a series of testimonial dinners held in California for its distinguished senior Senator, GEORGE MURPHY.

Another speaker was the distinguished Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Mr. Robert Finch, who has been a long time intimate friend of the Senator. In his speech the Secretary praised both Senator MURPHY and his excellent legislative record.

Senator MURPHY'S colleagues in the Senate know of the articulate and effective manner in which he represents the people in California. Having served with Senator MURPHY on the Senate Public Works Subcommittee on Air and Water Pollution, I am intimately familiar with the leadership of Senator MURPHY in the pollution area as described by Secretary Finch.

I particularly recall his successful battle for clean air in California in 1967. Air pollution is, of course, a big national problem and of great national concern, but it is an even bigger problem in California and of even greater concern. During consideration of the Air Quality Act of 1967, Senator MURPHY, because of the extraordinary and compelling circumstances that exist in his State, offered what has become known as the "Murphy amendment," which allows California to adopt more stringent standards for the control of automobile emissions than exist in the Nation as a whole.

At first, the Public Works Committee was not inclined to grant California this special consideration, but Senator MURPHY'S insistence, determination, and persuasiveness, in the words of the report of the Senate Public Works Committee, "convinced the committee that California's unique problems and pioneering efforts justify a waiver of the preemption section to the State of California." The Murphy amendment was adopted by the State and the Congress and, as a result, California has been able to implement the State's Pure Air Act of 1968, the toughest antismog law for controlling automobile pollution in the country. This is only one illustration of the truly outstanding legislative accomplishments of Senator MURPHY, part of which Secretary Finch so eloquently described.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Secretary Finch's statement praising a great Senator from the Nation's most populous State be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE ROBERT H. FINCH, SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE, LOS ANGELES, CALIF., OCTOBER 15, 1969

It all started six years ago—and you'd better believe that the obstacles to George Murphy embarking on a political career were many and formidable. The cutting edge of our attack was made up chiefly of former Edsel dealers.

His opponent was a man of national stature . . . who had even acquired California citizenship in honor of the occasion. Murph's campaign manager had vast experience in local, State, and national elections . . . most of them losing elections.

And if you'll forgive me, Barry—taking part in the evening's festivities as you are, down in San Diego—1964 was not exactly what you might call a vintage year for Republicans.

The rest is history—a grand record of victory at the polls . . . leadership in the U.S. Senate . . . party efforts that started the Republican tide running, in the '66 midterm elections . . . and solid legislative accomplishments.

It's a rare combination that George Murphy brings to his job—his gentle Irish humor . . . a tough mind . . . a strong arm raised always in support of the public interest. And most of all it is his heart and conscience—his sense of compassion—as great as the needs of the people.

You name the area of concern—the truly fundamental concerns that affect the quality of our lives, our future prospects—and Senator Murphy has been there. Indeed, he has been in the very forefront of effective response.

Consider the human environment, for example—the problems of air, water, oil, and waste pollution. The full catalogue of Senator Murphy's contributions would take literally all night . . . so let me just list some highpoints:

He was author of the Murphy Amendment to the Air Quality Act of 1967. This confirmed California's leadership . . . its example to the Nation . . . in the control of auto emissions, the single greatest air polluter. Two times since January, I'm proud to note, as Secretary of HEW, I have invoked his amendment and granted waivers . . . and thus California remains the pacesetter in the fight against smog.

He sponsored and co-sponsored measures like the Water Quality Act of 1965 . . . to accelerate the Nation's efforts to preserve and restore sources of clean water.

In the present session of Congress, he is co-sponsoring aggressive regulations . . . controls with teeth . . . with regard to oil spills and liability for cleanup operations.

He is using his important membership on the Armed Services Committee to develop standards, and to regulate waste discharges in such ports and harbors as San Francisco Bay . . . where U.S. naval vessels account for fully 90 per cent of waste pollution.

Or consider education—another of those fundamental areas of concern where our successes, or failures, will in truth determine the future prospects of the human family.

Senator Murphy introduced measures this year that would focus additional school aid to areas . . . both urban and rural . . . where poverty and educational deprivation also are concentrated.

He was co-author of the 1967 Bilingual Education Act . . . which offers children of Mexican background the opportunity to utilize both Spanish and English in the early years of schooling.

And he was the author of one of our most productive experiments in educational innovation—the so-called "dropout prevention" program that searches out the roots of this national calamity.

Consider yet another area . . . one in which basic research must move forward in harness with tight yet practical controls—the area of alcoholism and drug abuse. Senator Murphy co-sponsored breakthrough programs for the rehabilitation of addicts and alcoholics . . . and he is vigorously supporting the drive against traffic in narcotics, particularly as it affects teen-agers.

Or consider the idea of tax-sharing—an idea whose time truly has come, and which now has become a major component of the President's revolutionary proposals for welfare reform. This is not just tinkering—rather, it attacks the cycle of perpetual dependency by way of fundamental structural reform.

The formula by which revenues will be distributed to States and localities closely follows the pattern originally devised by Senator Murphy and Senator Howard Baker of Tennessee. And tax-sharing has been termed by the President as the key to The New Federalism—which represents his determination to put the money . . . and the shared responsibilities . . . where the problems are, in the States and local areas.

These are just some highlights of a six-year track record—the record so far. I submit to you . . . and predict that the people of California will agree . . . that one such good term surely deserves another!

And in one more area of human concern—shared by all of us, and not just this day but every day—in the President's unrelenting search for peace . . . here, too, Senator Murphy has been a tower of dedication and of strength. Get him to tell you sometime about his Eagles' Club—maybe he'll even invite you to join! It defines the one key that truly will unlock the door to peace . . . the unified will of the American people.

Now, for just a minute or two, let me be entirely selfish. It is no accident that when I list the legislative areas in which the "Murphy Influence" has been so forceful—education . . . environmental protection . . . the attack on alcoholism and drug abuse—I am listing, also, the principal concerns of the massive conglomerate I have the honor to head.

I took on the job of HEW Secretary with deep commitment to the solution of urgent human problems. I took it on in a spirit of total dedication.

And tonight, Murph, I want to underscore the President's thanks to you. Your support of our efforts . . . our efforts to rationalize, reassess, revaluate, and ultimately to deliver effective human services . . . is of a value beyond words.

You understand the thrust of our initiatives—and that the impacts of the innovations we put in motion today will help define the parameters of the quality of our lives five and ten years down the road . . . indeed, for the final third of this century.

The team of young bucks who have joined me at HEW also are in this effort for the long pull. They're not all Californians, by the way—just most of them but it is not surprising that such a notion has become current. They share with the people of this State the frontier spirit . . . the willingness to experiment with new modes of action, and whole new templates of public-private partnership.

We entered our new jobs with no pat answers . . . but rather with an insistence that the old answers and old solutions be reexamined. We have been able to squeeze about $1.2 billion out of ongoing programs—to improve their effectiveness, and to retarget our investments into new experimental models.

We intend to find out what works, and what doesn't work—and to order our priorities accordingly. Our ultimate success will depend on a steady purpose during these first years . . . and I only hope eight years will be enough for lasting impacts in all the areas of our concern.

Our operating principle is—if efforts of reassessment and renewal succeed . . . in the upgrading of educational quality . . . in the delivery of abundant health-care, accessible to all—then the welfare of the American people will pretty much take care of itself.

In this longrange enterprise, Mr. Senator, we need your guiding hand and good counsel—we need your continued service to both State and Nation.

Politics really is a strange and wondrous profession. I almost said "game", but it is infinitely more than that. Politics is an elemental human process.

We pour into it our treasure . . . our partisanship . . . our devotion to party principle—and yet, by some incredible alchemy, there seems always to emerge a new sense of unity . . . a spirit of national purpose.

Perhaps the answer is to be found in the careers of men like our Senior Senator—and in the commitment of men and women like yourselves who have assembled tonight . . . in the thousands, all over this State . . . to pay tribute to him.

Woodrow Wilson might well have been speaking of George Murphy when he made this observation:

The man who sinks his own personal judgments and ambitions in the common good will in the long run ride the farthest and rise the highest. And then Wilson went on in the following words: We are an interesting people, we human folks. We are afraid of men who have power and use it wickedly, but we are never proud of them, and the only people we rear statues to are the men who forgot themselves and served others. And that statue will stand there as an example as long as the bronze will last, to fire young hearts forever.

You have indeed "fired the hearts" of your fellow Californians, Murph . . . and you have earned our affection forever.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7491) to clarify the liability of national banks for certain taxes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. PATMAN, Mr. BARRETT, Mrs. SULLIVAN, Mr. REUSS, Mr. WIDNALL, Mr. BROCK, Mr. DEL CLAWSON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 14159) making appropriations for public works for water, pollution control, and power development, including the Corps of Engineers—Civil, the Panama Canal, the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, the Bureau of Reclamation, power agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Atomic Energy Commission, and related independent agencies and commissions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1970, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. President, the first precept of fair taxation is equal taxation on all citizens in similar economic circumstances. For years, the tax treatment of cooperative corporations have violated this maxim.

Cooperatives, in fact, afford a striking example of the intrusion of the tax-exempt or tax-favored institution into the commercial marketplace in direct competition with other fully taxed organizations.

Today, cooperatives are big business in the United States. They do $20 billion of business annually and one-third of them fail to add a nickel to the Federal Treasury. Most of the rest pay absurdly small or token amounts of income tax. This tax immunity exists despite the fact that cooperatives engage in a multitude of manufacturing, producing and commercial ventures in direct competition with the average taxable businessman.

The tax advantage of cooperatives evolved many years ago when they were first organized as small, local associations to act as sales or marketing agents for farmers. This simple agency function is still important today, but it has become overshadowed by the encroachment of cooperatives into large-scale manufacturing operations. The cooperatives of today have little resemblance to their forebearers.

Today, cooperative corporations have become gigantic, permanent institutions, separate and independent from their patrons, with centralized and autonomous management.

More importantly, they have invaded the commercial marketplace with the aid of their special tax status to become aggressive and formidable competitors.

For all intents and purposes, most cooperative business income is tax free.

While some cooperatives are technically classified as exempt and others are not, all cooperatives are permitted to deduct "patronage dividends" from net income before paying taxes. Since these patronage dividends are oftentimes nothing more than pieces of paper giving an undetermined right of income to the patron in the future, the cooperative retains practically all its income in its coffers for further business expansion without paying any taxes.

Not only is the small businessman facing unbearable competition, the average taxpayer is subsidizing this activity.

THE TAX REFORM BILL

In recent years, this Nation has witnessed the rapid growth of unfair business competition by tax-free or tax-favored institutions. Not only is this unfair competition, but it deprives the Federal Treasury of its share of normal business income.

With marked frequency the tax-exempt groups are entering the marketplace and sheltering the income of everyday commercial activities with the umbrella of tax immunity.

These shelters must be removed.

The pending tax reform bill has taken several constructive steps to impose an unrelated business tax on these commercial functions. The bill now taxes the unrelated activities of churches, charitable groups, social clubs, and fraternal organizations.

It is hard to justify the continued immunity of cooperatives.

Regrettably, the Senate bill has deleted even those weak amendments dealing with cooperative taxes contained in the bill passed by the House of Representatives.

I ask that the Senate reconsider this issue and impose a corporate tax on the income from the activities of cooperative corporations which are unrelated to the basic agency activities of marketing and purchasing.

Mr. President, cooperative corporations have moved far beyond the original concept of a farmer's sales agent—a concept for which they obtained their favored tax status. Today, many cooperatives are gigantic conglomerates engaged in ordinary commercial activities but without the usual disadvantage of paying Federal taxes. These outside business activities do not deserve special tax treatment.

Today, the average cooperative is larger than the average corporation. We must put cooperatives back on an equal footing with the rest of the American business.

The Farmers Regional Cooperative, of Iowa, sometimes known as Felco owned assets of $8 million and had sales of over $34 million in 1965, the last year statistics are available. On a net income of $1.7 million Felco paid Federal taxes of $917. This was a big improvement over 1964 when a net income of $1.2 million produced $128 for Uncle Sam.

The reason for these absurdly low taxes on a business which owned over $8 million in assets including warehouses, four feed mills, and a nitrogen plant is that about 60 percent of net income was deducted for tax purposes because Felco made a paper allocation of this amount to its patrons although the money stayed right in the treasury and was used for business purposes.

Another cooperative, the Tennessee Farmers Cooperative, paid taxes amounting to less than one-half of 1 percent on a net income of almost $1.5 million derived from petroleum products, building supplies, chemicals, and tires. This operation consists of seven fertilizer and seed plants, 16 automotive equipment facilities, two feed mills, and a tire recapping plant.

Farmland Industries, of Missouri, had 1968 sales of $375 million. This cooperative engages in, among other things, manufacturing grease and paint, fabricating steel products, producing fuel and lubricating oils, and provides insurance and finance facilities. Since 1929, Farmland has paid taxes of less than 10 percent of net income.

Agway, Inc., headquartered in Syracuse, N.Y., and operating throughout the middle Atlantic States and New England, is the largest cooperative in the Nation. In 1968 its sales volume was $519 million. Along with four other cooperatives, it was ranked in the Fortune directory of the Nation's 500 largest corporations. Agway's operations include marketing of innumerable products, wholesaling of feed, fertilizer, petroleum products, auto supplies, farm equipment, building supplies, farm chemicals, lawn and garden equipment. In addition, wholly owned subsidiaries of Agway include a real estate holding company, a petroleum corporation which operates gas stations, and an insurance company. Since its inception Agway has had an effective tax rate of only 15 percent. This tax rate is much higher than the cooperative average.

The minimal tax bills for these large cooperative corporations are shocking. But they pale before the realization that many cooperatives of the same size and business interests pay absolutely no taxes at all. In fact, the most recent statistics show that 32 percent of the tax returns of cooperatives which show an annual net income reported no Federal tax payable.

Thus, in an industry which has gross receipts of over $20 billion a year and which covers almost every conceivable business and production item, almost one-third of the organizations escape taxation completely.

THE EFFECT OF TAX-EXEMPT COOPERATIVES ON COMPETITION

The intrusion of large combines with special tax status can wreak havoc with the normal competitive market.

In the fertilizer industry, for instance, 31 percent of the farm supply of fertilizer products is purchased through cooperatives. This compares with 21 percent in 1956. This by itself would not be harmful, but the fact is that most of this fertilizer is manufactured by the cooperatives themselves under the umbrella of a virtual tax exemption. Total fertilizer sales in the United States amount to about $1.5 billion annually. Seven percent of this total is manufactured by one cooperative alone.

Many cooperatives have recently switched from buying the raw materials for making fertilizer to the actual production of the ingredients. The Central Farms Cooperative owns a major phosphate mine in Canada, a phosphate conversion plant in Florida, and three large ammonia plants. Another, Agway, is now in the process of building a nitrogen production center.

Two basic chemicals used in the manufacturing of fertilized products are ammonia and wet process phosphoric acid. The penetration of the cooperatives into this field has been startling. In 5 years, since 1964, cooperatives have increased their production of ammonia from 11.5 percent of the market to 20 percent; in phosphoric acid the increase has been from less than 6 percent to 20 percent.

Cooperatives also did three-quarters of a billion dollars of business in petroleum products. In many cases the cooperatives have integrated backwards to include pipelines, refining plants and actual oil producing properties. Farmland Industries produced 79 percent of the petroleum it sold to farmers. Its facilities include three refineries, one natural gas plant, crude oil reserves and 875 miles of pipeline. Profits from all these activities are shielded from taxes under our present laws.

The commercial trucking industry has also been badly injured by the encroachment of untaxed cooperative organizations. The Pentagon recently announced the policy of using co-op trucking services where possible in munitions transport. These co-ops can afford to undercut regular firms and are not yet subject to ICC regulation.

An example of how a cooperative can affect normal competition is afforded by the history of an organization known as California Canners. California Canners began operations to provide farmers with a means to market their raw produce, in this case peaches. About 10 years ago the cooperative acquired a number of regularly taxed cannery companies and subsequently brought them under the tax exemption umbrella. Then California Canners constructed a new can-making facility. In addition, it bought a trucking company.

Virtually all of the profits of California Canners are theoretically distributed each year to its patrons. Actually only 20 percent of this allocation is made in cash—the rest remains in the business untaxed, presumably for use in further acquisitions or construction.

Needless to say, a great many of the industries which attempt to sell to millions of Americans are being threatened by cooperative expansion.

Many cooperatives are now expanding their activities to take over formerly taxpaying businesses. There is little likelihood that a business can withstand the threat of merger from a co-op willing and able to enter the same market on a taxfree basis.

Mr. President, the time has come to place these giant business combinations on an equal footing with the rest of American business.

There is no valid reason why the ordinary business activities of cooperatives should receive special treatment in our tax laws. There is no reason why the American taxpayer should subsidize unfair business competition.

No one questions the special circumstances of the American farmer. Subject to the vagaries of weather and crop season, there is justification for permitting the farmer to seek assistance in selling his commodities and purchasing his needs.

This was the concept under which the first cooperatives were organized. It is still valid today.

But cooperatives have extended their sphere of influence far beyond the mere selling and purchasing concept. They have become fully integrated business activities engaged in manufacturing and production. These activities do not justify a special tax deduction to the exclusion of similar activities by thousands of other American businesses.

Therefore, my amendment proposes to exact an unrelated tax on all income of cooperatives which is not directly related to the purchasing or selling agency function of cooperatives.

Briefly, the amendment would impose a regular corporate tax on this unrelated income.

Marketing activities which fall into the "related category" would include all those necessary for preserving, storing, or packing the patrons' products for sale. This would include processes such as making frozen concentrated fruit juice, baling cotton, and canning peaches. Canning or packaging the product would be a related activity, but the manufacture of the can or the box would be considered as "unrelated" activity and subject to tax.

Likewise, cooperatives could mix and package fertilizer which it bought in bulk without adverse tax consequences, but the production of fertilizer itself would give rise to an unrelated business tax.

The buying of petroleum products and the transportation of them to the patron would clearly be a related activity. However, the drilling for crude oil or the refining of oil or gas would be an unrelated business activity.

Under my amendment, patronage allocations would still be deductible before the imposition of Federal tax, but only to the extent of income from related business activities. Thus, if a cooperative had $100,000 of income from related activities and $200,000 from business judged to be unrelated, only $100,000 of patronage allocations could be deducted.

The $200,000 of unrelated income would be fully taxable at the normal corporate rates.

If a cooperative allocated $150,000 to patrons, $100,000 could be offset against related income. The remaining $50,000 could not, however, be deducted.

Under present law, patrons must pay income tax on patronage allocations which are deducted by the cooperative. This would be unchanged by my amendment. As to the remaining $50,000 of allocations which cannot be deducted under my amendment, the patron would only be taxed on those allocations if they meet the general rules of taxable corporate distributions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has talked about a farmer receiving patronage dividends which were not sufficient to enable him to pay taxes on the total amount of the allocation of the patronage by the cooperative.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is correct.

Mr. MILLER. It is quite correct that that frequently happens. But I hope the Senator from Connecticut realizes that this is with the agreement of the members of the cooperative.

Mr. RIBICOFF. It may be by agreement with the members of the cooperative, but that does not make it right, because, while he may pay taxes on the allocation of the 80 percent that is retained by the cooperative no taxes are paid by the cooperative, as they would be with the ordinary corporation.

Mr. MILLER. The point that I think the Senator is trying to make there is that perhaps there is a defect in the tax law. But I emphasize that this point the Senator was making about the farmer not receiving enough patronage dividends in cash to enable him to pay the tax on the total amount of the allocation is not a defect of the law at all; it is a matter of agreement by the cooperative, through a democratic process, with which I hope the Senator would agree.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I do not know how democratic it is. If it is like most organizations of that size, I would say the average farmer who is a member of one of these large conglomerate cooperatives has very little to say as to what takes place. In most co-ops, the minority has very few choices and very little that it can do to change co-op policy.

I think when these co-ops started out, the purpose was very salutary, and we have tried to protect that salutary impact. But when the cooperatives become conglomerates doing $500 million worth of business, and start drilling oil wells, manufacturing machinery, and going into the insurance business, we no longer have a cooperative designed to take care of the immediate needs of the farmers, but a competitive enterprise, competing with other enterprises in our free enterprise system.

Mr. MILLER. I yield myself an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. President, I shall not argue with my friend from Connecticut about this matter of getting into the drilling of oil wells. The only point I want to emphasize is that these activities such as he has referred to about the declaration of patronage dividends, and the amounts, are arrived at through a board of directors, and quite often through an annual meeting of the cooperative. If it is a very large undertaking, we can be quite sure that the members of that cooperative vote for their board of directors, and if they do not like what is going on, they do not have to be members of the cooperative. I do not know why the Senator should object to that.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The committee was most zealous to close the loopholes on nonrelated business, as it pertains to fraternal organizations, social organizations, churches, charities, and foundations; and I cannot for the life of me see why we should make an exemption for these co-ops, which are not entitled to have any more competitive advantage over ordinary business than are churches, colleges, or foundations.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator yield me a minute of his time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield the Senator 1 minute.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, the committee, as the Senator points out, recognizes some defects in the present law. But I thought it was decided nearly unanimously, if not unanimously, to have this matter studied by the Committee on Finance staff, with a view to enabling us to have the proper information so that we could take clear-cut, knowledgeable action on the matter in the next session of Congress. I think everyone on the committee recognized that the Senator from Connecticut had a valid point. Our concern was drawing up legislation that would cover the point in a knowledgeable way, without possibly doing great harm by acting prematurely.

I, for one, agree with the Senator from Connecticut that things have gone too far, and I want to take some action on it. I regret very much that I think the Senator is premature in his amendment, but the main point I wanted to bring out in this colloquy was that the action taken by these cooperatives is done with the knowledge and the concurrence, and generally the votes, of the members or of their board of directors; and I hope that the Senator would not object to that procedure.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I do not object to the statements the Senator makes; but I think the time has come to bring out in the open the situation as to the cooperatives and their favored position in the American economy. When five cooperatives are mentioned by Fortune magazine as among the 500 largest corporations in America, we must realize this is not a question of farmers getting together to market eggs or apples or oranges, and that the time has come to take a good, hard look at these giants.

The Senator may recall that in the committee I stated that I was going to bring this amendment up on the floor, to bring the matter out in the open; and I think the time has come to give it a thorough airing.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will someone yield me 3 minutes so that I may ask some questions?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have two questions in particular to ask. One relates to the fact that joint cooperative action is frequently taken in my State.

I am thinking particularly of citrus-marketing cooperatives coming together either to have a fertilizer-mixing establishment or a juice-canning or a juice-concentrating establishment. It belongs wholly to the cooperatives. It runs wholly for the benefit of their members.

What situation would these operations be left in under the amendment of the distinguished Senator?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, these activities would in no way be affected by my amendment, because these activities are related to the production and marketing of the items involved.

In the great State of Florida, which the Senator represents, citrus fruits are a most important part of the economic life of the community. And it is only natural that the small and large farmers work together to grow the crop, to gather the crop, to market the crop, and also to produce juices and concentrates.

Everything the distinguished Senator from Florida has mentioned is a related activity to the main purpose of the cooperative. And there would not be any tax at all involved under my amendment in the example given by the Senator.

If this cooperative, however, decided to buy a hotel on the Gold Coast in Miami Beach or an insurance company or a manufacturing company or a boatyard, then the income from those unrelated activities would be subject to the same tax as would a corporation engaged in the hotel business, the insurance business, the manufacturing business, the boatyard business, real estate business, or banking business.

It is not the fact that the farmers buy products together, buy fertilizers, gather crops, and sell the products themselves. That is a related business. However, many of the cooperatives have seen a good thing and taken in under their tax-free umbrella unrelated businesses and are in competition with other merchants in the same area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield an additional 3 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for an additional 3 minutes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator realizes, I am sure, that no one cooperative in Florida that is organized by citrus growers, for instance, can finance the operation and furnish the fruit for a concentrate plant. That investment is very large, and the supply of fruit has to come from quite a large area, larger than one cooperative could normally cover.

In our case, something like three-fourths or more of the orange juice is not marketed as fresh fruit but is marketed in the form of frozen concentrated orange juice.

I understand from the answer of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that under such a situation as I have outlined, his amendment would not remove the exemption.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Absolutely not, because that is a related business. A question was asked by another Senator in a private conversation as to what would happen in his State with regard to a dairy business. Basically, it is a matter of processing the milk and ice cream and cheese and then selling the milk and ice cream and cheese. That is related to their business as a cooperative, and in no way would the amendment affect a related business of that sort.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut offered his amendment in the Finance Committee. It was considered by the Finance Committee and was rejected overwhelmingly because its provisions are vague and indefinite.

The committee did not realize the scope of the activity. Neither did the author. We did authorize a study by the staff of the Finance Committee, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue and Taxation. and the Treasury Department to look into the unrelated activities of farm cooperatives.

Mr. President, I read from page 309 of our committee report:

> The committee, however, is concerned over the extent to which cooperatives are increasingly engaging in activities such as heavy marketing which are unrelated to the purpose for which the special tax treatment of cooperatives was originally granted. It has, therefore, asked the Treasury Department, the committee staff, and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to conduct a study of these activities and to formulate a proposal by which the special tax treatment of cooperatives can be withdrawn with respect to these unrelated activities.

I think that is as far as the Senate ought to go at this time, because we do not know what we are doing in this area.

I would like to point out one misstatement of fact that I know is absolutely unintentional on the part of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

We have his memorandum on our desks. The third paragraph from the bottom of the page reads:

> Many cooperatives are paying no taxes and are competing side by side with fully taxable organizations.

That is a misstatement. Farm cooperatives either pay taxes or the patron of those cooperatives pays taxes.

Unfortunately, that fact is not well known. I get a considerable number of letters, sometimes from my own State, asking, "Why don't you do something to tax cooperatives?"

They are already taxed. Either they or the patron pays the tax.

Mr. President, I want to read commencing on line 13 of page 3 of the Senator's amendment, it reads:

> For purposes of this subchapter, the term "related activities" means activities carried on by an organization to which part 1 applies, which consist of marketing products of patrons of the organization . . .

What is "marketing products of patrons"? I do not think we fully know.

In Georgia, we have a substantial poultry business. Many of those poultry farmers buy through the cooperative. The cooperatives buy the feed for them and furnish supervision of the poultry and help them with the birds and they take them to the market. It is a very integrated operation.

Would the Senator's provision tax that? No one knows. We have not gone into the area far enough or held hearings on the matter.

What is "preserving"? That is contained in the amendment. Does preserving mean drying, canning, cooking, or putting in a warehouse?

Those terms are ambiguous and not well understood.

What does "store" mean?

What does "packaging of such products" mean? Does that mean freezing, cooking, or canning? What does "purchasing of supplies for patrons of the organization" mean?

Many farmers belong to cooperatives that produce fertilizers. Some of those fertilizer cooperatives mine the minerals that they use in the fertilizers. They mix the fertilizers and they sell the fertilizer to the farmer. The farmer saves money when buying that product.

Does the Senator's amendment relate to that? No one knows.

What does "mixing" mean?

What does "packaging" mean?

What does "local delivery of such supplies" mean?

The Senator from Florida asked about the freezing and concentrating of orange juice. Is that a related activity?

Let me point out also that the amendment does not apply wholly to farm cooperatives. I am sure that the Senator meant it to apply to farm cooperatives.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I intended it to apply to cooperatives taxed under subchapter T of the Internal Revenue Code. It so happens that most of the argument for my amendments comes from agricultural cooperatives.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thought it was the Senator's intent to make it apply to farm cooperatives. Instead he tells me he intends it to apply to all cooperatives wherever taxed.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Concerning the question of taxes, the IRS publication, "Statistics of Income of 1965," indicates that 32 percent of all cooperatives reporting paid no taxes whatsoever.

Mr. TALMADGE. But their patrons did.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The patrons paid their taxes, that is true, but the cooperatives did not.

Mr. TALMADGE. Either the cooperative or the patron pays the tax.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The difference is that the patrons pay a tax. They receive 20 percent. They pay on the hundred percent of the paper allocation that they receive. But the large amount of money is accumulated and kept by the cooperative itself, and it uses this money to keep on building its competitive position, not necessarily for the benefit of the patron.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is the Senator speaking on his time? I have had several requests for time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. It can be taken from my time.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator.

I repeat that a cooperative's income is taxed either by the cooperative or by the patron. I would not want the Senate to think that they are tax-exempt organizations. They are not. All of the patrons are actually involved together. It is a partnership.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on my time?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Most cooperatives are corporations. What I am trying to do is to place the cooperative in the same position on unrelated business as the ordinary corporation.

Mr. TALMADGE. But under our tax laws they are not taxed as corporations. They are treated much like partnerships.

Mr. RIBICOFF. They are incorporated under State laws. Everything they do is in the nature of a corporation; and, basically, a corporation in America pays a tax on its income. Then, when it pays a dividend to a stockholder, the stockholder pays a tax on the dividends he receives. The cooperatives should be treated the same as a corporation.

This is what we are doing to foundations; this is what we are doing to churches; this is what we are doing to social organizations and fraternal organizations, and the time has come to make sure that these cooperatives, which have gotten out of hand and are no longer in the tradition which was intended, are treated on the basis we are treating all other organizations. This is a reform measure. If we are reforming so many institutions in this bill, the time has come to reform this particular type of activity, which is subject to great abuse.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I quote from the Internal Revenue Code, paragraph 1, under section 1382(b), "Income taxes, cooperatives":

(b) Patronage dividends.

In determining the taxable income of an organization to which this part applies, there shall not be taken into account amounts paid during the payment period for the taxable year—

(1) as patronage dividends (as defined in section 1388(a)), to the extent paid in money, qualified written notices of allocation (as defined in section 1388(c)), or other property (except nonqualified written notices of allocation (as defined in section 1388(d))) with respect to patronage occurring during such taxable year; or

(2) in money or other property (except written notices of allocation) in redemption of a nonqualified written notice of allocation which was paid as a patronage dividend during the payment period for the taxable year during which the patronage occurred.

For purposes of this title, any amount not taken into account under the preceding sentence shall be treated in the same manner as an item of gross income and as a deduction therefrom.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these provisions of the Internal Revenue Code be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(c) Deduction for nonpatronage distributions, etc.

In determining the taxable income of an organization described in section 1381(a)(1), there shall be allowed as a deduction (in addition to other deductions allowable under this chapter)—

(1) amounts paid during the taxable year as dividends on its capital stock; and

(2) amounts paid during the payment period for the taxable year—

(A) in money, qualified written notices of allocation, or other property (except nonqualified written notices of allocation) on a patronage basis to patrons with respect to its earnings during such taxable year which are derived from business done for the United States or any of its agencies or from sources other than patronage, or

(B) in money or other property (except written notices of allocation) in redemption of a nonqualified written notice of allocation which was paid, during the payment period for the taxable year during which the earnings were derived, on a patronage basis to a patron with respect to earnings derived from business or sources described in subparagraph (A).

(d) Payment period for each taxable year.

For purposes of subsections (b) and (c)(2), the payment period for any taxable year is the period beginning with the first day of such taxable year and ending with the fifteenth day of the ninth month following the close of such year. For purposes of subsections (b)(1) and (c)(2)(A), a qualified check issued during the payment period shall be treated as an amount paid in money during such period if endorsed and cashed on or before the 90th day after the close of such period.

(e) Products marketed under pooling arrangements.

For purposes of subsection (b), in the case of a pooling arrangement for the marketing of products, the patronage shall (to the extent provided in regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate) be treated as patronage occurring during the taxable year in which the pool closes.

(f) Treatment of earnings received after patronage occurred.

If any portion of the earnings from business done with or for patrons is includible in the organization's gross income for a taxable year after the taxable year during which the patronage occurred, then for purposes of applying subsection (b) to such portion the patronage shall, to the extent provided in regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, be considered to have occurred during the taxable year of the organization during which such earnings are includible in gross income. (Added Pub. L. 87–834, § 17(a), Oct. 16, 1962, 76 Stat. 1046.)

Mr. TALMADGE. As the Senator admits, this amendment applies not only to farm cooperatives but all others, also. I thought that perhaps the Senator's objective was farm cooperative only. But if it is to apply to all cooperatives it would reach rural electrification cooperatives, rural telephone cooperatives, every mutual insurance company in the United States, and every mutual savings bank in the United States. Something of that magnitude needs study by responsible authorities. The Committee on Finance has voted, by an overwhelming majority, that it be studied by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, by the staff of the Senate Finance Committee, and by the Treasury Department, to report their recommendations to the committee.

Mr. President, I am delighted to yield to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN). How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. AIKEN. I would like about an hour and a half to start telling what is wrong with this amendment.

Mr. TALMADGE. The time is limited. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. I am simply amazed, in view of the necessity to control inflation, that an amendment such as this is offered, which would increase costs to both producers and consumers.

What I want to ask the Senator from Georgia is this: Cooperatives do not deal in just milk and cheese and fertilizer and chickens; cooperatives also deal in money. Did the Senator from Georgia and his committee consider the effect of the credit unions on the small loan companies?

Mr. TALMADGE. Yes, indeed.

Mr. AIKEN. And the credit unions provide money for low-income people at less than one-third the cost of the small loan companies, and the small loan companies do not like cooperatives.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator has pointed out vividly the complexity of this bill and why it needs more study.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, and then I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. PROXMIRE. On the point the Senator from Vermont has just made, is it not true that one of the most burdensome costs for the farmer is high interest rates?

Mr. TALMADGE. It is.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not also true that lending money is not related to farming? Is it not true, therefore, that under this amendment the opportunity for farmers to borrow money from a cooperative set up for the purpose of providing funds to them at a reasonable interest rate would be subject to a corporation income tax, even though it was organized as a cooperative?

Mr. TALMADGE. I am sorry, I was busy, and I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The question is this: If the farmers set up a cooperative which is used to lend money to the farmers so that they can get relief from the very high interest rates, is it not true that under those circumstances this is not related to farming and, therefore, would come under the strictures of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TALMADGE. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut provides for exceptions from the corporate tax only when the cooperative is marketing the products of, or purchasing supplies for, its members, so I assume the corporate tax would apply under the Senator's amendment in the situation to which you refer.

Mr. PROXMIRE. With respect to these cooperatives, which are vital in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and many other States, is it not true that there is some question as to whether they would be considered to fall within the exceptions provided by the Senator from Connecticut, who excepts preserving, storing, and packaging? That may or may not be considered preserving, storing, packaging milk, because cheese is a different product.

Mr. TALMADGE. I agree with that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That might be in jeopardy.

Mr. TALMADGE. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not also true that every study has shown that farm income is far lower, on a per capita basis, than the income of people off the farms?

Mr. TALMADGE. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. They work longer hours and make a bigger investment, but their income is substantially lower.

Mr. TALMADGE. That is true.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is this not one of the very few instruments they have to give them an opportunity to begin to have a fair break compared with those off the farm?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct. As the Senator knows, we have authorized banking cooperatives and passed laws, and in some areas we are using our own tax money to try to encourage the formation of cooperatives.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The only instrument I can think of that is substantially and really significant that gives the farmer an opportunity to make a good living, except for Government programs, which many people deplore, and we recognize that they have many defects.

Mr. TALMADGE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If we weaken this in any significant way, it can seriously endanger farm income and the future of farmers.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. Does the Senator desire time to ask a question?

Mr. BAKER. I should like 2 minutes to ask some questions.

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose.

Mr. BAKER. I ask the Senator from Georgia whether or not, in his view and with his familiarity with this subject, in the case of electric and telephone cooperatives—and we have many of those in Tennessee—the endeavor of a cooperative to operate a community television antenna system might fall within the exception.

Mr. TALMADGE. I think that would be clearly unrelated business income, under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I ask, further, whether or not, in the case of one of the operations referred to in the speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, the Tennessee Farmers' Cooperative which engages in the manufacture of fertilizer which is manufactured from natural gas—whether or not the manufacturer of gasoline and lubricating oil as a byproduct of that process is not within the purview of the amendment.

Mr. TALMADGE. The only exception in the Senator's amendment is for marketing and purchasing, and I think that would be clearly unrelated.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator thinks, therefore, it would be taxable?

Mr. TALMADGE. I do.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one last question?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. In the case of an insurance company being operated by farmers as a cooperative nonprofit venture to insure farm equipment and automobiles, might that be unrelated activity?

Mr. TALMADGE. I think so. The Senator said it is limited to marketing and purchasing.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for 2 minutes?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I was impressed when John Gardner, Director of the Urban Coalition, testified before our committee a few months ago. The key emphasis of his testimony was his growing belief that the poverty of the cities could not be solved until we first try far harder to solve the problem of rural America. The problem of rural development and economic growth was increasingly to him a major share of the solution of the problem of poverty in our country, whether in the city or in the rural area.

I think it is fair to say that those of us who come from States which are rural or States which are both rural and urban cannot help but realize that one of the key reasons we have much economic vitality in rural America at all, and one of the key reasons we have hope for growth or revitalization of America, is the unique, dynamic, democratic responsiveness of our great system of cooperatives.

I think Minnesota has the highest ratio of co-op members of any State in the Union. I am told Vermont is slightly higher.

I wish to say to my friend from Connecticut, for whom I have the highest respect, that the adoption of the amendment would have a disastrous impact on the role of these cooperatives in performing the magnificent job they do perform and in the hope they offer to the citizens of my State.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for 2 minutes?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut. The Senator's proposed amendment is related to the taxes that farmers' marketing and purchasing cooperatives pay. I opposed a similar amendment when it was proposed in the Senate Finance Committee.

Although the technical language of the proposed amendment makes it very difficult, even for the experts in this area, to determine exactly what it will accomplish, it appears certain that the amendment would impose a penalty on farmers marketing and purchasing cooperatives by requiring them to pay a tax an refunds made to their member-owners as if these refunds had never been made. This, in fact, constitutes a penalty tax on farmer cooperatives simply because they are organized as cooperatives. Ordinary corporations make refunds in the form of coupons, trading stamps, cash refunds, and so forth, and deduct these customer refunds from their taxable incomes. If the proposed amendment were to be adopted, ordinary corporations would be allowed to continue to deduct these refunds from their taxable income, but cooperative corporations would be required to pay income taxes on the refunds they make to their member-owners.

I feel that this would be arbitrary and discriminatory, and we would be inhibiting the continued successful operation of a program which has enabled our farmers to avoid economic ruin through savings resulting from cooperative marketing and purchasing. Farmers cooperatives refund a half billion dollars each year to their farmer-members. This is 3 percent of net farm income, and without these refunds, farmers' net income would be even lower. A decline which I think we all agree would not be wise.

Mr. President, it should be pointed out that cooperatives are a legitimate and unique form of voluntary enterprise which makes it possible for millions of people, including even very poor ones, to participate as owners of their own business in our American economic life. Something like a quarter of our American families are owners of businesses today only because the cooperative form of business enterprise opens that door to them.

I feel certain that this is something that Congress does not want to destroy. As a matter of fact, agencies of the U.S. Government are right now urging the formation of cooperatives by low-income people as one of the most constructive ways of enabling them to work their way out of poverty. The critical problem is how to secure enough capital to make such cooperatives viable institutions. Every encouragement should be given to these cooperatives to accumulate capital. And it need hardly be pointed out that investors are not going to rush to provide it. It must be supplied basically by the members.

If the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut were to be adopted, a serious blow would be struck at the hope of cooperatives of low-income people to accumulate the modest capital which they must have. This would represent a contradiction within the Federal Government, because on the one hand we would be encouraging poor people to solve their problems through the formation of member-owned cooperatives, and on the other hand we would be threatening their success with the imposition of a discriminatory tax on refunds. The definition of "related activities" proposed in the amendment is unduly restrictive and burdensome. It could very well prohibit the cooperatives from performing services which are otherwise unavailable to its member-owners because they are not profitable, even though the cooperative providing the service returned all income above cost to its member-owners in the form of patronage refunds.

Mr. President, for the above reasons, and more, I am convinced that the proposed amendment now before the Senate would likely produce tax inequity rather than equity and, therefore, I urge its rejection.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I have found the provision of the code, in the case of cooperatives taxed under section 1381 and following provisions in the code, it is provided that cooperatives are taxed like regular corporations except for deductions for patronage dividends and per-unit retains. For patronage dividends to be deductible, in addition to other requirements, section 1388(a)(3) provides that they must be "determined by reference to the net earnings of the organization from business done with or for its patrons."

In other words, for the deductions to be available, the earnings must arise from business done with or for its patrons. This does not include earnings not related to this business.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this section of the code be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART III—DEFINITIONS; SPECIAL RULES

Sec. 1388. Definitions; special rules.

[Sec. 1388]

SEC. 1388. DEFINITIONS; SPECIAL RULES.

[Sec. 1388(a)]

(a) PATRONAGE DIVIDEND.—For purposes of this subchapter, the term "patronage dividend" means an amount paid to a patron by an organization to which part I of this subchapter applies—

(1) on the basis of quantity or value of business done with or for such patron,

(2) under an obligation of such organization to pay such amount, which obligation existed before the organization received the amount so paid, and

(3) which is determined by reference to the net earnings of the organization from business done with or for its patrons.

Such term does not include any amount paid to a patron to the extent that (A) such amount is out of earnings other than from business done with or for patrons, or (B) such amount is out of earnings from business done with or for other patrons to whom no amounts are paid, or to whom smaller amounts are paid, with respect to substantially identical transactions.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think the amendment, in its broad form, has some merit. I come from a farm State. This morning I addressed 10,000 members of cooperatives. They mentioned the Senator's statement on the farm industry. I read a statement or two by the Senator from Connecticut.

I think most of these people understand if we are going to have tax reform it must apply to most of us.

I believe enough questions have been raised on the floor of the Senate by Members from farm and nonfarm States to indicate the need for further study. Therefore, it appears that the committee has taken appropriate action. There has been clarification of the income from cooperatives since 1962. At that time Congress clarified the law.

I am convinced from the questions of the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Georgia that perhaps we need a thorough review. Therefore, I agree with the committee, as stated on page 309 of the report, that the Treasury Department, the committee staff, and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation conduct a study. If there are abuses I would be the first to admit it. Let us find out what they are and how we can curb them on a selective basis rather than by the meat-ax approach.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

I am a member of several cooperatives and I know firsthand of the vital service they render to farms and industry. In many cases, particularly in small towns, the co-op is the only defense against the monopoly and it is the farmer's defense for the products he has to sell or the prices he has to charge.

I feel that some of the tax treatment received by cooperatives is needed and vitally needed for their success. However, I also know that in these times the rights of co-ops have been seriously abused in certain cases. I know of one instance in my State where a so-called farm co-op is supplying a fleet of over 500 semitrailer trucks which operate over the highways hauling munitions from a naval munitions depot to the west coast for shipment to Vietnam. This has nothing to do with farm products or the marketing of farm products. This is the form of abuse that sooner or later could wreck the farm co-op program in this country.

I feel these abuses are sooner or later going to arouse such an opposition to co-ops that they will destroy the farm co-ops system and deny the farmers a tool that has been vitally important to rural development in this country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I intend to support the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut because I believe in the long run co-ops will be strengthened by this proposal.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. What would be the revenue gain to the Government if the Senator's amendment were agreed to?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I would have to estimate the figure because we have not been able to get figures from the Treasury. However, 3 years ago the Treasury estimated that a regular corporate tax on all cooperative net income would raise about $200 million. There has been certain growth of all businesses, including this and, therefore, it would now raise about $250 million. To be conservative I would say about one-third of the business of co-ops in America is unrelated, so it will be fair to say in my best judgment one-third of the $250 million, or about $85 million would come to the Treasury.

Mr. PELL. If the matter comes under the section of the Internal Revenue Code which the Senator from Georgia has just had placed in the RECORD saying that unrelated activities are subject to taxation, why would this amendment be necessary?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Because cooperatives are able to deduct their patronage payments and a corporation cannot deduct dividends. In other words, if it gives a patronage payment of $100, it gives a certificate of $80 and only pays out $20 in cash. The patron pays tax on $100. But the co-op does not pay any tax on the $100 it pays out or the $80 within its treasury. Thus, it is in a favored position to compete with corporations in competitive businesses because it keeps the money and pays no taxes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield on my time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia on my time.

Mr. TALMADGE. I want to point out that if they are engaged in earning income which is not related to the business done with the patron they cannot pay out patronage dividends on that. There is a tax as though it were an ordinary corporation. I refer the Senator to section 1388, paragraph 3, which has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RIBICOFF. In my opinion, the definition mentioned by the Senator from Georgia is not broad enough to give the impact of my definition. What is related or unrelated depends upon what business it does with its own members not with third persons. The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) mentioned a good example of co-ops carrying munitions for the Pentagon.

Mr. TALMADGE. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield further on my time?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia on my time.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Chief of Staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation called my attention to the section I have referred to. He assures me that it is applicable because the law says that amounts cannot be paid as patronage dividends unless it is for business done with or for the patron.

Mr. RIBICOFF. May I ask this question of the distinguished Senator from Georgia in regard to the Chief of Staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue: Then why has not the Internal Revenue been collecting this $85 million a year from unrelated businesses?

Mr. TALMADGE. Because we do not know how much is unrelated. That is the reason the committee has authorized the study, as the Senator so well knows.

Mr. RIBICOFF. One does not have to be a farmer or a tax expert to know that when a cooperative company like Agway or Felco is running the type of business it is running, it is not in the business related to the traditional activities of the co-ops.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator has pointed out a good illustration of why we need a study of this thing.

Mr. President, how much time remains to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH).

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I rise to support the position of the committee and of the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE). In the area west of the Mississippi River there are many electric co-ops. There has never been a time when their services were needed more than now, because of the wheat acreage cuts of 12 percent this year, together with a rise in the wheat acreage, and the threat to sell under the resale programs and the grain sovereignty which has been stocked for a number of years. The Secretary of Agriculture cut the price of cotton feed between $4 and $5 a bale, and the net result is, as a result of the actions of the Department of Agriculture, that agriculture has suffered and is in the worst state it has been for years, particularly in my State.

We have over 400,000 REA-connected co-ops in my State, because my State has more individual family farmers than any other State in the Union. It has had disastrous effects upon them in cutting the acreage and cutting the prices on crop supports, together with the added taxes on the electric co-ops. The effect is bad enough already. There are 254 counties in Texas. The population is constantly moving. About 60 percent of the farm population is dwindling, as we all know. It is difficult to get young men to go into the farming business these days. This places a much heavier burden on the farmers still there, making for higher prices for wages, and higher prices for machinery that is much needed, which is manufactured in the northern areas and sent in there. All of this is beginning to break the backs of the farmers. Their homes are being mortgaged and foreclosures are going on, especially in the highlands of Texas. I was there in August talking to bankers and to members of farm organizations, and the rate of foreclosures has gone up markedly this year. This is an extra burden that should not be placed upon the farmer, at a time when the farm economy is badly off. This is a blow they can hardly stand. I therefore believe that if the study can be made, it should be made first to see what can be done, without going to the grassroots of each individual electrical cooperative.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, this amendment nit-picks. It would hold as unrelated to the primary functions of rural electric cooperatives, for instance, certain functions performed by service organizations which have been set up to provide services which are needed and yet not readily available in many areas of the country.

By any reasonable standard we might impose, repair and modification of REA facilities would have to be considered related to those organizations' functions in the distribution of electrical energy to subscribers. Yet, those functions would be adversely affected by this amendment. I oppose the amendment on these grounds, Mr. President, and have confidence the Senate will concur in this judgment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the principle of the pending amendment. I believe some operations of some cooperatives would be subject to taxation.

Unfortunately, it appears that the language of the Senator's amendment is not completely appropriate for the purpose intended. Some of the questions raised indicate that careful study of this complex subject is necessary.

I am glad to note in the committee's report that it has made a commitment to turn its attention to this troublesome area, and that a study is now underway. Under the circumstances, I shall vote against the pending amendment only because of the committee's assurance that action will be taken.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I would like to take just a minute or two to emphasize some of the features of my amendment which ought to be clarified for the benefit of the Senate.

First, let me make it clear that this amendment would not affect the present tax treatment of cooperatives' income from their traditional marketing and purchasing activities. The income from these activities is largely exempt and would continue to be so under my amendment. My amendment would not affect rural electric cooperatives or telephone cooperatives.

This amendment would simply prevent Subchapter T cooperatives from deducting patronage allocations or dividends from income earned on activities outside the traditional purchasing and marketing function.

The point is that the tax code should not allow a cooperative to shelter from taxation the income of ordinary commercial ventures which have no relation to the traditional role of cooperatives.

Let me add at this point that one of the major areas of tax reform in the pending bill deals with exactly this problem: that is where the broad expansion of tax immunity of exempt organizations into fields where that immunity does not belong—and indeed is most unfair.

The problem with our tax code is that simply too many types of income have become immune from taxation.

Tax exemption has become a big business. And much of big business has become tax exempt.

Many cooperatives are paying no taxes and competing side by side with fully taxable organizations.

This immunity results not only in a tremendous loss of revenue but in considerable unfairness.

The pending tax reform bill takes several important steps to end this immunity in areas where it has no relation to the original tax exemption.

The unrelated businesses of foundations has long been taxed. In addition, this bill would further limit foundation activities in the business world by forcing them to cut down on the ownership of controlling stock.

In essence this bill says to foundations, "you can own stock for the purposes of investment and income, but not for the purpose of controlling a commercial enterprise."

The Finance Committee has also imposed a tax on the unrelated activities of social clubs, fraternal organizations, and even churches. Where these organizations have extended their activities into fields outside the scope of tax exemption the income from these activities will be taxed at regular corporate rates.

It is hard to justify a bill which taxes the unrelated functions of these groups yet has ignored the same type of activities of cooperatives.

One further point: A number of people have expressed their concern that this amendment would injure the average farmer. This is simply not true.

As I mentioned earlier, this amendment would not change the present status of cooperative activities involved with the marketing of farm cooperatives or purchasing of farm supplies. There are the activities which benefit the farmer.

The average farmer does not benefit because a cooperative owns an oil well or a machinery plant. The manufacture and production of auto supplies, chemicals, and natural gas is of no direct assistance.

On the other hand, the cooperative itself as a corporation is making a bonanza—often at the expense of the farmer himself.

Cooperatives are able to deduct all of their patronage allocations. But they only have to pay 20 percent of these allocations in cash to the farmer.

Furthermore, the law says that the farmer must pay a tax on the entire allocation—whether he received in cash or in the form of certificates which gives him an undefinable right to income at some future date.

The result is that often the farmer does not receive enough money from the cooperative to pay the taxes on the allocation he really never received at all.

Meanwhile, the cooperative has retained 80 percent of its income for corporate purposes tax free.

Mr. President, we have before us a tax reform bill. My amendment is a constructive reform in line with many similar provisions already contained in the bill.

It does not injure the farmer or alter the traditional tax exemption accorded to the marketing-purchasing activities of cooperatives.

It does, however, place the ordinary commercial and manufacturing activities of the giant cooperatives on an even footing with regular business.

I believe this amendment deserves favorable consideration by the Senate.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I am very strongly opposed to the pending amendment which would restore the effects of section 531 to the tax reform bill, and do great harm to the agricultural sector of the economy.

In September, I sponsored an amendment to delete that provision—a section which the House of Representatives had adopted without a word of testimony and without notice of any kind to the taxpayers affected.

It is, in my judgment, a punitive tax scheme that would greatly harm the farmers' ability to generate adequate capital investment in their cooperatives. At the very time when farmers need to strengthen their marketing, purchasing, and farm business service cooperatives as a means of increasing net farm income, this ill-advised tax provision would cripple the equity structure of cooperatives and force many to close. I do not think legislation which would further depress farm income in this country is a proper part of tax reform.

Since the Revenue Act of 1962, farmers through their cooperatives have undertaken longterm financial obligations and made large investments in physical plant in reliance on the 20-percent earnings retention rate. Millions of dollars in loans in credit extension to cooperatives have been let under terms with fixed obligations to pay sums certain on specific dates. To meet these obligations and to finance future retained capital needs under the new proposal, cooperatives would be forced to enter the commercial loan market where prime rates range from 8½ to 10 percent. In many instances, the small- and moderate-sized farm cooperatives will be unable to carry these additional costs and survive.

I think the Senate should find the amendment inconsistent with the intrinsic financial requirements of cooperative organization. I know they will find it contrary to the goal of strengthening the agricultural sector of our economy.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator from Connecticut is.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I have no more requests for time. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has now been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH) and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) would each vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) is absent on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) are necessarily absent.

If present and voting, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 81, as follows:

So Mr. RIBICOFF's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New York would like me to yield to him briefly. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 340, I send it to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered as read; and I ask unanimous consent that the amendments other than the amendment relating to the 40-year life of foundations be considered en bloc, and explain to the Senate the purpose of putting my amendment, to which the Senator from Minnesota will propose a substitute, of record.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I cannot agree to consider the amendments en bloc unless I know what they are. I would have to know what the amendments are before I could agree.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wonder if the Senator from Minnesota would consider withdrawing his amendment at this time, because it seems that if it is taken up, it would be difficult to obtain a time limitation, and the leadership would, almost perforce, be in a position where it would have to agree to vote at a time certain tomorrow.

I would hope we could get two or three more amendments disposed of tonight.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. In the interest of expediting the work of getting rid of some amendments, and keeping Senators here, I make that request of the Senator at this time, so that we can get on with the business at hand.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I am glad to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, will the Senator bear in mind, in deciding what to do, that I will be perfectly happy to step aside momentarily, if I am complicating it, and let the Senator from Minnesota go ahead?

Mr. MANSFIELD. No, the Senator is not. I had hoped it would be possible to vote, say, at a quarter to 6 on the pending amendment, but I do not know that we can obtain such an agreement at this time. If there were any assurance that that could be done, I would like to see it done, and then take care of another amendment; because, remember, the President has told us that if we do not finish the schedule, he will call us back between Christmas and New Year's Day.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I can hear the sound of jingle bells, but there is difficulty in getting a limitation of time. As far as I am concerned, I would hope we could vote on the amendment tomorrow at, say, 10:30, but it might be wiser to defer it, bring up another amendment, and then try for a limitation of time tomorrow.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would the Senator be willing to do that?

Mr. MONDALE. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. To take up other amendments, so that we can get one or two out of the way tonight, and then, sometime tomorrow morning, take up the Senator's amendment, following the Metcalf amendment?

Mr. MONDALE. I have no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. All right; it is withdrawn, then.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there are amendments still pending vote in the Senate this afternoon, and the hour has already grown too late for me to get back to Oklahoma in time for a dinner to be held in Oklahoma City in honor of my four Democratic colleagues from Oklahoma in the U.S. House of Representatives.

I had very much hoped to be present at the dinner tonight to join in the tribute to Congressmen CARL ALBERT, TOM STEED, ED EDMONDSON, and JOHN JARMAN, a group I believe is the most impressive power package in the House of Representatives. Congressman ALBERT has brought great distinction to himself and our State and has served the Nation well in his capacity as majority leader in the House of Representatives; Congressman STEED is a diligent worker for the people as a member of the House Appropriations Committee and chairman of one of its most important subcommittees; Congressman EDMONDSON serves as assistant majority whip and is one of the most knowledgeable and active members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the Committee on Public Works, and the Joint Atomic Energy Committee; Congressman JARMAN is a valued member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and a chairman of one of its subcommittees. As can be seen, Mr. President, the work and interests and influence of these men span almost the full gamut of important policy questions and issues. It has been my great pleasure to work with this team on many matters of vital importance to our State.

Mr. President, I am doubly sorry that the Senate's business today prevents me from being present at the dinner in Oklahoma City tonight because I had accepted an invitation from the cochairmen and my good friends, Robert S. Kerr, Jr., of Oklahoma City, and Houston Adams, of Tulsa, to introduce tonight's guest speaker at the dinner, the Honorable Robert Docking, Governor of Kansas, who also is a respected, personal friend of mine.

I know that the dinner will be a huge success because Oklahomans know well the importance of this great team. They are my friends. They are outstanding Oklahomans. They are distinguished Americans. I salute them in the Senate today because I cannot be present in Oklahoma City to salute them in person tonight.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order. How about the third reading of the bill?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is a distinct possibility.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 320

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment number 320 and ask that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURPHY'S amendment (No. 320) is as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 320

At the proper place insert the following:

SEC.—DEDUCTIONS FOR MEDICAL CARE, MEDICINE, AND DRUGS FOR INDIVIDUALS WHO HAVE ATTAINED THE AGE OF 65.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) Section 213(a) (relating to allowance of deduction for medical, dental, etc., expenses) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—There shall be allowed as a deduction the following amounts, not compensated for by insurance or otherwise:

"(1) If neither the taxpayer nor his spouse has attained the age of 65 before the close of the taxable year—

"(A) the amount of the expenses paid during the taxable year for medical care of any dependent (as defined in section 152) who—

"(i) is the mother or father of the taxpayer or of his spouse, and

"(ii) has attained the age of 65 before the close of the taxable year;

"(B) the amount by which the amount of expenses paid during the taxable year (reduced by any amount deductible under subparagraph (C)) for medical care of the taxpayer, his spouse, and dependents (other than any dependent described in subparagraph (A)) exceeds 3 per centum of the adjusted gross income; and

"(C) an amount (not in excess of $150) equal to one-half of the expenses paid during the taxable year for insurance which constitutes medical care for the taxpayer, his spouse, and dependents (other than any dependent described in subparagraph (A)).

"(2) If either the taxpayer or his spouse has attained the age of 65 before the close of the taxable year—

"(A) the amount of the expenses paid during the taxable year for medical care of the taxpayer, his spouse, and any dependent described in paragraph (1)(A);

"(B) the amount by which the amount of expenses paid during the taxable year (reduced by any amount deductible under subparagraph (C)) for medical care of dependents (other than any dependent described in paragraph (1)(A)) exceeds 3 percent of the adjusted gross income; and

"(C) an amount (not in excess of $150) equal to one-half of the expenses paid during the taxable year for insurance which constitutes medical care of dependents (other than any dependent described in paragraph (1)(A))."

(2) Section 213(b) (relating to limitation with respect to medicine and drugs) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The preceding sentence shall not apply to amounts paid for the care of—

"(1) the taxpayer and his spouse, if either of them has attained the age of 65 before the close of the taxable year, or

"(2) any dependent described in subsection (a)(1)(A)."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. May we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MURPHY. This amendment does two things. It would provide that the medical and drug expenses incurred by a person aged 65 or over, or his spouse, shall be a fully deductible income tax item; and that medical and drug expenses paid by persons under age 65 on behalf of dependent parents 65 or over shall be fully deductible.

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from California may proceed.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, this amendment would restore——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I am happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I ask unanimous consent that further debate on the pending amendment be limited to one-half hour, to be equally divided between the Senator from California and the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The Senator from California may proceed.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, this amendment would restore the Federal income tax treatment of medical care and drug expenses applicable for persons age 65 and over that existed prior to the changes made by the Social Security amendments of 1965. Before the 1965 change, an income tax deduction was allowed without application of the 3-percent floor for medical expenses or the 1-percent floor for drug expenses of a taxpayer and his spouse if either were 65 or over. The 1965 change limited the medical expense deduction to those in excess of 3 percent of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income and the cost of medicine and drugs could be deducted only to the extent that they exceeded 1 percent of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income. My amendment would restore the full medical expense and drug expense deductions for persons 65 and over without regard to the 3- and 1-percent floors.

The Senate in considering the Social Security Amendments of 1967 adopted provisions restoring the full deduction for a person 65 and over but the provision was subsequently deleted in a conference with the House.

The case for full income tax deductibility for medical expenses of persons age 65 and over is clear and compelling. Immediate restoration of medical deductions as permitted before 1965 amendments to the Internal Revenue Code is badly needed. It is a matter of equity for millions of older Americans, many of whom are helpless victims of rising costs.

Adoption of this proposal in no way should be regarded as an alternative to more effective help through medicare or medicaid provisions of the Social Security Act. Necessary improvements in these programs should be given careful consideration by the Senate when it acts on social security amendments.

Tax reform, however, is before the Senate now. I cannot urge too strongly the importance of compassionate and more equitable income tax treatment of persons past 65, especially on costs of illness and keeping well.

As a member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I invite your attention to a statement from a working paper on "Health Aspects of the Economics of Aging," prepared for the committee and published in July of this year. It says:

> Although Medicare and Medicaid have replaced a large segment of private spending for health care, 30 percent of the cost of personal health care for the aged remains as a private responsibility for the aged and their children.
> In addition to the 45 percent covered by Medicare, 25 percent of the fiscal 1968 expenditures of the aged were met by Medicaid and other public programs. Nevertheless, the amount paid privately by the aged remains higher per capita ($176) than for the nonaged ($153).

In my own State of California, I believe it fair to say that a better job has been done for older persons with lowest incomes than in most other States. Despite certain growing pains encountered in development of medi-cal, our version of medicaid, I think most agree that it is among the best of such programs.

Mr. President, the fact remains, however, that even under most favorable circumstances, these Federal and Federal-State programs now leave many gaps in the armamentarium designed to protect older persons against costs of illness. My proposal, offered as the Senate considers the whole question of taxation, aims to fill one of these gaps. No one needs to be reminded that medical costs have been rising sharply. Much of this falls on older people whose fixed incomes make it most difficult for them to protect themselves against such increases. At the same time, as additional persons attain the age of 65, inflationary pressures are increasing the number, already in the millions, who are subject to Federal income taxes. While the tax reform bill now before the Senate hopefully will provide some general relief taxwise to persons past 65, the benefits, particularly for those with health problems, could be short lived without adoption of my proposal to make medical expenses fully deductible for older people.

Those of us who have given special attention to the aging, and wishes of the aging about themselves, have been impressed repeatedly by the practically universal desire of older Americans to take care of themselves whenever possible. Unfortunately many, through circumstances beyond their control, have been unable to fulfill this wish for economic independence. Government has a responsibility to come to their aid.

Mr. President, government also has a responsibility, especially through its tax laws, to see that as many older persons as possible who are already independent shall remain independent and give consideration to younger persons willing to assume responsibility for their elders. Nowhere is this governmental responsibility more applicable than in relation to health care costs. Through our tax laws, we can help prevent the financial drain caused by medical costs to our senior citizens.

This is a needed tax change that has a very positive value. It helps people to help themselves. I urge favorable consideration of this amendment as an exercise in such responsibility and in responsiveness to needs of older Americans.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the Murphy amendment there be a time limitation of 30 minutes, to be equally divided between the Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY) and the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, do I correctly understand that the debate be limited to 30 minutes on each side?

Mr. LONG. An additional 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would like to be assured of having about 10 minutes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont can have 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, as I said this is a very simple amendment. It has been debated on the floor previously. The Senate has twice restored this needed tax deduction for medical expenses.

The amendment merely restores what was pre-1965 law. I believe the change in 1965 was a mistake, and has caused hardship to many senior citizens. My amendment corrects this mistake and allows older persons to take their actual deduction for their true medical costs in making out their income tax.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the amendment is the same or almost the same as the one I have offered in the past, I hope that my friend the distinguished Senator from California, will permit me to be listed as a cosponsor.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Vermont (Mr. PROUTY) be added as a cosponsor of my amendment. His leadership in this field is known by all Members of this body. His support and help has been great.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

How much time does the Senator yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I yield as much time as he requires to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY) will restore a much-needed mechanism of tax relief for older Americans, burdened by rising medical costs.

I commend Senator MURPHY for introducing this amendment; I am pleased to join him as a cosponsor and an advocate for its adoption.

I have offered this amendment before. It was adopted by the Senate in 1965, 1966, and 1967, but each time it was struck in conference.

I would like to review briefly the history of this tax provision.

Under a tax law first enacted in 1948, taxpayers 65 and older benefited from a provision which allowed them to deduct the cost of medical care up to certain specified maximums, for themselves and their spouses, who were also 65 and older. Other taxpayers were denied deductions for their medical expenses except to the extent that these expenses exceeded 3 percent of their adjusted gross income. These provisions stood for 17 years, reflecting congressional concern over the fact that our older citizens were caught in a vicious inflationary spiral of increasing medical bills and decreasing incomes. They needed help, and allowing a deduction of medical expenses was eminently proper.

However, Mr. President, with the consideration of the medicare bill in 1965, these tax deduction provisions were seriously challenged. At this time the House acted to repeal these provisions on the rationale that medicare would pay for virtually all medical needs of the aged, thus rendering the tax deduction superfluous, unnecessary, and overcomplicated. These deductions were not available to older citizens when they filed their 1967 income tax returns.

When the medicare bill came to the Senate, the Committee on Finance recognized the hardships and complexity that could occur if the medical expense deduction for the aged were cut back. The committee deleted the restricting amendments of the House bill. Members of the Finance Committee knew that medicare would pay no more than 40 to 50 percent of an aged individual's medical costs and that the remaining amounts would have to be paid for out of the aged person's own resources.

The Senate agreed to the committee amendments, but unfortunately the conferees on the medicare bill finally adopted the other body's provisions to cut back on the tax deduction, beginning in 1967.

Three years ago, the Committee on Finance again sought to retain the full deduction for the medical expenses of persons age 65 and over. The committee added an amendment to the Foreign Investors Tax Act designed to prevent the tax restrictions included in the 1965 medicare law from going into effect. The Senate passed the amendment, but once again the other body's conferees refused to accept it and it was stricken from the final form of the bill. In 1967, the Senate again adopted an amendment to restore this deduction. Since then, it has become apparent that many of our older citizens are worse off under medicare than they were previously when the tax deduction was allowed. This is so, Mr. President, because as it has developed, contrary to the view of the House of Representatives in 1965, medicare does not cover 100 percent of the medical expenses of the older Americans. In reality, only from 50 to 60 percent of costs are covered. Let us consider what costs must be met by the individual over 65.

Under hospital medicare insurance the first $40 must be paid by the individual.

After 60 days' care, the individual must pay $10 a day for the next 30 days of treatment.

Under medical insurance, the individual must pay $3 a month to receive benefits.

All drug costs except those provided in the hospital must be met by the individual.

None of these costs enumerated above can any longer be deducted unless they are in excess of 3 percent of the older taxpayer's adjusted gross income or in the case of drugs, exceed 1 percent of the adjusted gross income.

It is quite true that the poorest of our aged would not benefit from a reinstatement of the tax deduction. Those 8 million older Americans who do not file income tax returns would not be affected. However, Mr. President, there are some 14 million older Americans who do file income tax forms, and these people would be benefited.

Mr. President, this is an equitable amendment. The Senate has approved it on three previous occasions. Today, I urge my colleagues once again to respond to the obvious need to provide additional relief for those older Americans who are burdened by soaring medical costs.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I know it will be said that this amendment may benefit some people who do not need the help. However, I assure my distinguished friends in the Senate that my mail reflects that an awful lot is not being done by medicare and that a tremendous burden is being carried by older people.

I can think of nothing that deserves our attention more than the possibility of taking whatever action we can to alleviate the problem, as great as it may be.

I therefore urge the Senate to do what it has done three times in the past.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I feel very much as he does about this matter. However, I am worried about one thing.

Would the Senator consent to some limitation on the taxable income of people to be eligible for this benefit?

I have always worried about the fact that a large number of taxpayers with high incomes get a benefit which they do not need.

Could we put some limitation in this provision—$10,000 or $15,000—on income as the income limit for which this would be available?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I am aware of the Treasury Departments claims regarding this amendment. I just do not believe their estimates are accurate. They claim medicare covers most of the older citizens expenses; yet, at the same time they argue the bill will cost over $200 million. If medicare were covering most expenses, how can we have these cost estimates. They cannot argue both ways.

Based on the reflection of my mail, I would respectfully hope that my colleague would permit this amendment to go through as it is. If we find any inequities, I would be glad to join with him later in discussing a limitation.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not think we have to wait that long. Would the Senator be sympathetic, assuming that the amendment is adopted—and I hope it will be—to the consideration in conference of what if any equity restrictions ought to be placed on it? It may be quite a finite question.

For example, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS) just pointed out that in the case of catastrophic illness, the cost may be so great that a limitation based upon an income level may have to be adjusted to that kind of catastrophe. But if I could feel that the Senator is sympathetic to the idea of that kind of consideration, I think we could leave the rest to the conferees.

Mr. MURPHY. As I said to my distinguished colleague while he was talking with the Senator from Delaware, I have never been one to say that there should be a limit or whether it should be $10,000, or $15,000. I simply do not believe there has been great abuse. If there is, I will gladly not only join but lead efforts to correct it. I also would point out that catastrophic illness can strike those with higher incomes and wipe them out. That is why I fear limitations.

I serve on the Special Committee on Aging, and I know of the great need. My mail reflects that there are untold cases in which people of means, who have been very successful, have worked hard all their lives, suddenly, in a year or two, can have everything they have stored up for their old age wiped out completely. Medical costs can be unbelievable.

I understand, of course, that in conference these things will be considered. I hope we can let it go on the merits and on the basis on which I have put it, and if there is abuse, we can later correct it.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall vote for the amendment. I hope, however, that the conferees will consider this point, not for any ground of discrimination against rich people—I agree with the Senator that that is wrong—but I think that inasmuch as we are dealing with revenue—dollars—and it is a hard situation, only from that point of view, under present exigencies, would I, as one Senator, hope that they would give consideration to that question.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. MURPHY. I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this amendment would have cost approximately $210 million when the matter was considered by the Senate before and now would cost $225 million.

It is estimated that most of the benefits of this amendment would go to high-bracket taxpayers.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GORE. We hear a great deal about the poor and the crippled and the people on medicare, but this amendment is not designed for those people. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG. That is correct.

Let me explain this. Everyone can deduct extraordinary medical expenses that exceed 3 percent of his income. But he cannot deduct that if he is using the standard deduction of 10 percent, and most of the aged people take the standard deduction. So they cannot deduct medical expenses, because they are using the 10-percent standard deduction in which medical expenses are included.

If we look at how many people are in the zero to $3,000 earned income bracket, they would only get $2 million worth of benefits. Look at the small number involved in the $50,000 and over category. Those making $50,000 and over would get $93 million of benefits from this amendment.

I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Henry Fowler, in 1967, with respect to the same amendment. He said:

> Less than 4 percent, or 8 million dollars, of this $210 million is divided among all taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes up to $5,000. To put it another way, $93 million in revenue loss would be distributed among 60,000 persons with incomes over $50,000, for an average of $1500 each, whereas $8 million is distributed among 600,000 taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes up to $5,000, for an average benefit of $13 per taxpayer.

Imagine that! These taxpayers, the aged people in the $5,000 and less bracket, would get a $13 benefit, on the average, from this amendment, while the 60,000 people with incomes of over $50,000 would get an average of $1500 each under this amendment.

One of the facts of life about the Gore amendment of yesterday—and I ask the Senator from Tennessee to listen to this—is that the Gore amendment has the effect of doubling the personal exemption for aged people. In other words, the aged people are able to take the personal exemption twice. So that those over 65 who were taking $600 plus $600, or $1,200, would be able to take, if the Gore amendment prevails—and I shall support it in conference—an additional $400 deduction.

This amendment would add $225 million to the cost of this bill, and it would not particularly benefit those who really need it, because they have to pay for medicare and medicaid, and they take the standard deduction. This would only allow the deduction of the first 3 percent of medical expenses for a group who, for the most part, have little need of it.

Mr. President, I submit that the amendment is very much calculated to aid most those who need it the least, and to aid least those who might need it the most.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GORE. And will not this almost $225 million a year be an annual loss from the Treasury?

Mr. LONG. An annual loss.

May I say that if one wants to help those in the upper income tax brackets for this much money, he could put the top limit of taxes at 60 percent rather than 70 percent, and let all people above the $50,000 bracket have some benefit from it.

Mr. President, we did dispose of this amendment by voice vote previously, and the Senate agreed to it, and we took it to conference. The House would not agree to it. If the Senator insists on a rollcall vote, we will accommodate him. It would be all right with me to dispose of it by a voice vote, if the Senator would be so inclined. But if the Senator insists on the yeas and nays, we will have a rollcall vote.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I insist on the yeas and nays.

Mr. MURPHY. I think we should have the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter the Secretary of the Treasury sent me about this amendment in 1967, as well as the Treasury letter and the statement I made at that time be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, December 4, 1967.

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There are a series of amendments to the Social Security Bill added in the Senate Finance Committee dealing with various income tax matters. While these are generally minor provisions which members of my staff will be prepared to discuss at the forthcoming conference, there is one of considerable fiscal importance to which the Treasury Department is strongly opposed. That is the amendment which removes the 3 percent and 1 percent floors on medical expense deductions for taxpayers over age 65. These floors were applied to taxpayers over 65 as part of the Social Security Amendments of 1965, applicable to 1967 and subsequent years. The proposed amendment would repeal that change effective for 1967 so as to prevent it from taking effect.

The only justification for the previous absence of these floors for those over 65 was to give additional aid to the elderly with their medical expenses. However, aid extended in this fashion is extremely inefficient and costly. When Medicare was adopted much of the problem of medical expenses of the aged was solved in a uniform and equitable way and therefore the inequitable partial relief under the tax system was unjustified.

The inequity of this provision is demonstrated by the revenue loss involved in eliminating the floors and the distribution of that revenue loss. Elimination of these floors will result in an annual revenue loss of approximately $210 million. (This estimate is concurred in by the Staff of the Joint Committee and apparently also by the analysts in the Library of Congress; Congressman Brown of Michigan stated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 113, pt. 25, p. 34083, that the Legislative Reference Service in a study made for him estimated a revenue loss of $192 million for the tax year 1967.) Of this total, approximately 45 percent or $93 million goes to taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of $50,000 and over. Less than 4 percent, or $8 million, is divided among all taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of up to $5,000. To put it another way, $93 million in revenue loss is distributed among 60,000 people with incomes of over $50,000, for an average tax benefit of $1500 each whereas $8 million is distributed among 600,000 taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes up to $5,000 for an average benefit of $13 per taxpayer. Little can be said in defense of a provision aimed at aiding the financial problems of elderly people caused by medical expenses which gives over one hundred times more benefit to the elderly taxpayer with the least need than to the lower income elderly with the most need.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY H. FOWLER.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1967.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Several bills have recently been introduced to allow persons age 65 or over an unlimited deduction for medical expenses. These bills would reverse the legislative change made by the Social Security Amendments of 1965 (Medicare) which removed the special exceptions permitting persons age 65 or over to deduct their medical expenses without regard to the 3 percent and 1 percent of adjusted gross income limitations which are applicable to taxpayers generally. It is also possible that similar amendments may be proposed in connection with the Social Security legislation currently being considered by your Committee. For these reasons we consider it appropriate to inform you of the Treasury Department's views on this matter.

The attached memorandum sets forth the background of this problem and explains the reasons for the Treasury Department's opposition to the proposal.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised the Treasury Department that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of our views.

Sincerely yours,

STANLEY S. SURREY.

PROPOSALS FOR RESTORING THE UNLIMITED MEDICAL EXPENSE DEDUCTION FOR PERSONS 65 OR OVER

It has been proposed that the action taken in 1965 be reversed and that the special exception to Section 213 of the Internal Revenue Code which allowed taxpayers age 65 or over an unlimited medical expense deduction be restored. Adoption of this proposal would be extremely costly to the Federal government; yet, it would provide very little benefit to those individuals most in need of financial assistance. For example, as the attached table indicates, for the taxable year 1967 the proposal would result in a revenue loss of approximately $210 million. Of this amount, nearly 70 percent would go to the limited class of persons age 65 or over with adjusted gross incomes of $20,000 or more. Indeed, 45 percent or $93 million would benefit those with over $50,000 adjusted gross income.

BACKGROUND OF THE PROPOSAL

Prior to the Social Security Amendments of 1965 (Medicare) persons 65 or over were excepted from the general rule that medical expenses are deductible during a given year only to the extent that they exceed 3 percent of a taxpayer's adjusted gross income and drug expenses are taken into account in computing medical expenses for purposes of the 3 percent limit only to the extent that they exceed 1 percent of a taxpayer's adjusted gross income. The Medicare Amendments eliminated the unlimited deduction accorded persons 65 or over effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1966. Thus, for tax year 1967 persons 65 or over are subject to the same 3 and 1 percent floors accorded all other taxpayers. The proposal would reverse the change made by the Medicare Amendments.

THE PROPOSAL SHOULD NOT BE ADOPTED

The considerations which prompted the elimination of the special exceptions for persons over 65 were sound. Those exceptions were an extremely costly and inefficient method of providing Federal aid to older citizens. They were introduced into the tax law at a time when the federal government had no general health insurance program designed to alleviate the burdens which medical costs impose upon older people. Recognizing the hardships generated for those 65 and over by increasing medical needs, Congress sought to mitigate the difficulty indirectly—through the tax law—by granting larger medical expense deductions to the members of this group than were available to taxpayers in general. However, since the tax benefit which was conferred decreased as the level of adjusted gross income diminished and the tax rate declined, the provision inevitably afforded greatest assistance to those who needed it least and, conversely, least assistance to those who needed it most.

The Social Security Amendments of 1965 attacked the fundamental problem in this area directly; it established programs carefully fashioned to enable all income groups of the aged to meet a substantial part of their medical costs. Since our elder citizens were accorded far more meaningful help in meeting their medical expenses under Medicare than under the special tax provisions, it was determined that there was no longer a need for the special tax provisions and they were eliminated. The attached example illustrates the extent to which an elderly couple is better off under the present medicare and income tax laws than would be the case if the arrangements prior to medicare were still in effect. The example shows that an elderly married couple with adjusted gross income of $10,000 and medical expenses of $770 for the year (medicine and drugs $100, hospitalization $520,[1] and surgery $150[2]) would have out-of-pocket costs of $275 under present law as compared with $624 if total medical expenses were tax deductible and there was no medicare program.

The reason our elder citizens are so much better off today is a reflection of the fact that the maximum benefit from the unlimited deduction could never exceed 3 percent of adjusted gross income for medical expenses and 1 percent for drug expenses reduced by multiplying that amount by the applicable marginal tax rate. Thus, for the couple in the above example, the maximum possible benefit they could derive under any circumstances from the fact that the deduction was unlimited was only $76 (3 percent and 1 percent of $10,000 x 19 percent=$76).

Those who argue that the special exceptions to the uniform percentage floors previously extended to persons 65 or over should be restored point out that the Medicare provisions do not cover all the medical expenses of older people. However, this argument misses the point. Neither the unlimited deduction provision nor the Medicare program made any pretense of paying 100 percent of the medical expenses of persons 65 or over. The unlimited deduction was repealed because it was replaced by a more equitable and meaningful program for defraying a portion of the medical expenses of older persons. To the extent that proponents of the present measure feel that the Medicare program does not go far enough, the answer is to expand that program, not perpetuate the costly and inefficient form of federal aid that the unlimited deduction represented.

It should also be noted that the increase in revenue resulting from the elimination of the special exceptions to the percentage floor was intended to help defray the cost of the general fund of the voluntary insurance provisions of the Medicare Act. In addition, the Medicare Amendments also added a provision permitting all taxpayers to deduct one-half of their medical insurance premiums up to a maximum of $150 without regard to the 3 percent floor. Thus, removing the floor for persons 65 or over at this time would result in the medical expense deduction becoming even more costly than it had been prior to the enactment of the Medicare Amendments.

There are no considerations that have arisen since 1965 which would make it advisable to reverse the action taken at that time to apply the medical expense deduction floor to elderly persons. Indeed, the contrary would appear true. Not only has Medicare proved to be an unqualified success, but pursuant to the President's request, H.E.W. has undertaken a comprehensive study of the feasibility of expanding Medicare to include payments for the cost of prescription drugs.

The following is a comparison showing how an elderly couple (both age 65 or over) would fare in 1967 under (1) the existing medicare and income tax laws and (2) a full tax deduction allowance for medical expenses and no medicare law. It is assumed that the couple has adjusted gross income of $10,000 and that a tax rate of 19 percent applies to the amounts in question. It is assumed further that the couple has medical expenses for the year as follows:

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. President, when this amendment was voted by the Senate a year ago, as I recall, I favored it. May I say that the more I study it, however, the less enthusiasm I have for it and the less merit I find in it. I say this because the studies indicate that the people who would benefit from the amendment most are the elderly with the very largest incomes. It also would cost the Government a great deal of money as the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] acknowledged—$110 million more than the Finance Committee amendment and $210 million more than present law.

As I have said, the benefits would be concentrated among those who are in the upper income brackets, who do not really need it. Most aged people do not pay any income tax at all, because they have the double exemptions and also either an exclusion for their social security benefits or the retirement income credit. Therefore, they either do not pay an income tax at all or, if they do, many of them take the standard deduction, with the result that the pending amendment would not help them. It would help only someone who pays taxes and then only if he itemizes his deductions.

Mr. President, if one looks at how the $210 million of revenue loss resulting from the restoration of pre-1967 law would be distributed the 60,000 people who are in income brackets over $50,000 a year would get nearly one-half of the total benefits under this provision. That would mean an average tax benefit of about $1,500 apiece for those people who are already in the high-income brackets and need this help the least. Out of the slightly over half of the benefits which are left, nearly a half of these benefits—or about a quarter of the total—would go to people making between $20,000 a year and $50,000 a year—people who have large amounts of real estate, stocks, and other large investments. Those are the people who are to be given the special right to deduct all of their medical expenses, even though they do not exceed 3 percent of their adjusted gross incomes. They are to be given unlimited deductions insofar as medical expenses are concerned. Between those two categories—that is, those with adjusted gross incomes of $20,000 and over—we have accounted for more than two-thirds of the total benefits involved.

Persons in the bracket of $10,000 to $20,000 who are retired would get almost one-half of the benefits remaining. Those in the income brackets of $5,000 to $10,000—and that is the largest group in terms of the number of people involved since there are about 860,000 of them—who could claim some need would get only about one-eighth of the total benefits which the bill provides.

With regard to 600,000 people in income brackets of 0–$5,000, they would get only a pittance of the benefits provided by this amendment, or about $8 million of the benefits involved.

As a practical matter the committee felt, in view of the fact that the Senate voted on an identical proposal before, that we might try to hold the costs of this proposal down by saying the elderly could deduct their entire medical expenses, including the first 3 percent; but if anyone found it to be to his advantage to do so, then he should waive advantages under the medicare program. The latter was felt to be a proper restraint to hold the cost down to $100 million. Those who waive their rights to medicare certainly are the only ones who can claim that they have not been helped—and helped very substantially—by the adoption of the medicare program.

Mr. President, I shall not insist on a roll-call vote. But I find less and less appeal in this proposal when I see who gets the benefits. It seems to me that it provides very liberally for those whose need is little and practically nothing for those who need it the most. I have no enthusiasm for the amendment and I shall not vote for it.

I recognize that there are not many Senators in the Chamber to hear the debate. If I insisted on the yeas and nays they would all come in and vote, perhaps as they did a year ago. Therefore, I shall let the matter go on a voice vote.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I have read the letter from the Treasury. I know it is very simple to make averages, to write formulas, to take a slide rule and show what the effect is going to be. But my approach to this amendment is based on the mail I have received; it is based on actual cases; and it does not come down to a matter of how much each family gets. Catastrophe spares no income levels.

For that matter, as far as I am concerned, this measure would alleviate the suffering of many families. It would cost about $1 apiece for everyone in the United States; $200 million is not a great amount of money when we talk about such large amounts of money compared to the hardship it can alleviate.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, first, it should be pointed out that the figure of $210 million is an educated guess. A determination for this year has not been reached. The figure to which I referred was based on the figures for calendar year 1966. I understand they arrived at those figures in even numbered years and as of yesterday, the Treasury indicated that medical expense deductions for calender year 1968 have not yet been analyzed.

However, I wish to point out that if one visits with members of these organizations of retired people, not the officers but the rank and file members, it will be found they are desperately in need of this help.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I saw a cartoon in the Senate gym this afternoon which showed a picture of Santa Claus passing out tax benefits to everyone and saying, "Please do not forget old Santa who is responsible for all this—a tax cut the Nation can ill afford."

If the Senator is agreeable I will take the amendment to conference. The conference turned it down before. The cost now is estimated even higher than the amendment we debated before. It is now estimated at $225 million.

There is no other amendment that would do so much for so few nor so little for so many.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I support the chairman of the committee. I express the hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I realize a good argument can be made for the amendment, but under existing law the persons referred to as needing this relief so much will use the standard deduction anyway. The amendment will not in any way affect those who are retired and over 65 in the lower income brackets. Even under existing law, doctor expenses and other medical expenses of those over 65, which exceed 3 percent of adjusted gross income, are deductible anyway. Thus, it will only help those persons in the higher tax brackets and I think there are other areas where we could use this money to greater advantage.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator.

I am ready to vote, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MURPHY. I am ready to vote, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON in the chair). All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY). On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INOUYE (after having voted in the negative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan (Mr. HART). If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina

$150. This was derived from a preliminary report based on bills representing part of a 5 percent sample of claims.

(Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON), and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) are absent on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) are necessarily absent.

If present and voting, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 41, as follows:

DEPRECIATION PROVISIONS OF TAX REFORM BILL, H.R. 13270

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have followed the progress of the pending Tax Reform Act with great interest and with a complete appreciation of the hard work which the members of our Committee on Finance have put into this legislation during the past weeks and months. I congratulate them for their diligence and perseverance in the face of the great pressures of time and daily schedules which I know they labored under in developing and refining this most difficult piece of legislation. I believe the chairman and members of the committee deserve a vote of thanks from the American people and an expression of gratitude from all Members of this body for a tough job well done.

I am concerned, as you might expect, with the impact which the provisions of this bill will have upon our housing supply and, in particular, upon our future housing production in the United States. Production of more housing is one of the most pressing problems before us this year and during the coming decade.

The facts are that our current and prospective levels of housing production are now falling far below our national needs and expectations. For example, in 1969 the total demand for new dwelling units—of all kinds, including mobile homes, for this decade already exceeds supply by nearly 1.5 million units. It is estimated by the National Association of Home Builders that this deficit will increase by a quarter of a million units by the end of 1970. Table I illustrates this deficit.

I believe this situation holds the makings of disaster and tragedy for our expanding population. For this reason, I am anxious that nothing in this tax-reform bill counteract our efforts to remedy this situation.

Unfortunately, I believe that in its present form, with respect to depreciation on residential housing, the committee bill will do just this. It will do so by creating substantial deterrents to investments into and, therefore, to the building of apartment houses—depreciable residential rental housing. Furthermore, I believe just two amendments to the committee bill are sufficient to avoid this result.

The first of the amendments which I believe should be offered with respect to residential rental housing is to provide a limited degree of accelerated depreciation for existing projects. I recognize, of course, that the reasons which underlie the provisions in the committee bill have to do with abuses to which the existing law as been subject, through a continuous trading in used properties. I hold no brief for this and my interests are directed completely to the flow of investment funds for the construction and purchase of newly produced apartment houses.

The committee bill, like the bill passed in the other body, eliminates completely the availability of accelerated depreciation upon a rental project which is purchased by a second or subsequent buyer. I think this goes too far. With respect to "Residential Rental Housing," under subchapter C, section 521(a) of the committee bill, pages 384 to 386, I therefore feel a degree of modification is necessary.

The key issue involves the net yield or rate of return to an investor who decides to place money into the purchase of an apartment project. Today the experience of the building and real estate industry generally shows that the rate of return on such an investment is very poor indeed without the availability of some form of accelerated depreciation. Compared with the risks involved and the rates of return which are now available on many other forms of investment, rental housing—without accelerated depreciation—is simply not a very desirable investment in many cases.

I therefore will offer for myself and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MCCARTHY) at the appropriate time an amendment to the committee bill to provide that, for residential rental housing, a second or subsequent purchaser would have available a limited choice of accelerated as well as straight line depreciation. For a project with a useful life of 30 years or more, my amendment would authorize use of the 150 percent declining balance method of depreciation. For a project with a useful life between 20 and 30 years my amendment would authorize use of a 125 percent declining balance depreciation. And for a project having a useful life of 20 years or less, I believe that the straight line depreciation permitted by the committee bill is quite sufficient.

My amendment will allow new rental projects to be sold in an investment market broad enough and sufficiently rewarding to warrant entrepreneur builders and sponsors proceeding with construction of new apartments. At the same time, by cutting down on and eliminating the use of accelerated depreciation on older structures, this formula precludes the continuous use of accelerated depreciation with respect to existing rental projects as they get older.

It is important to understand the relationship between the availability of accelerated depreciation on existing projects and the production rate of new projects. The key to much of the new production is basically the investment market which exists for rental housing structures once they are built and become filled with tenants. Builders are not investors; they sell their projects to investors and necessarily, they must carefully assess the market for rental projects before undertaking their construction. Elimination of accelerated depreciation on existing projects curtails substantially the investment yield and thus greatly restricts and narrows the secondary market for newly built projects. Unless changed, the result will be far fewer rental projects initiated and undertaken by builders.

This country has an absolute need for a continued high and increasing rate of apartment house construction. Today in America we have the lowest housing vacancy rate on record and, as we all knew, we have a drastic fall-off in housing starts—at a time when national housing needs are increasing rapidly. The statistics on our housing situation are in fact genuinely threatening to the future stability and progress of our society in the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that table I be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, table I was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Note: For the years 1954-58, these are estimates of the single-multiple mix developed by the Economics Department, National Association of Home Builders, based on Bureau of the Census totals. For the years 1959-69, these are Bureau of the Census figures. The starts figures are for private housing construction only. Single-family starts are defined as 1-unit per structure; multiple starts cover 2 or more units per structure where there are no connecting areas between units.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that the present tax law and treatment of depreciation on residential rental housing is responsible in large measure for the flow of investment funds into multifamily housing. Since the Internal Revenue Code was first changed in 1954 to authorize accelerated depreciation for residential rental housing there has been a progressive escalation in the construction of apartment housing. I, for one, do not believe we can as a country afford to withdraw this incentive toward more rental housing construction.

I believe the Committee on Finance shares my concern in this regard. I note that the committee approved and concurred in the action of the other body in keeping intact the provisions of current law as to the allowance of accelerated depreciation—200 percent, double-declining balance or sum-of-the-years digits methods—on new construction for initial owners, builders, or investors. Also, for rental projects built for low- and moderate-income families under sections 221(d)(3) and 236 of the National Housing Act, the present recapture rules of existing law are to be retained.

In addition, I recognize that the committee has adopted a general approach to the recapture of depreciation which would permit a full capital gains treatment of excess depreciation after a holding period of 18 years, 4 months. This is to be contrasted with the present law, which requires a holding period of 10 years. The House-passed bill would permit no capital gains on excess depreciation no matter how long the holding period.

In good conscience I must nevertheless now advise the Senate and the committee that, without further change, these provisions are seriously inadequate to forestall a wholesale turning away of private investment funds from rental housing. To distinguish a speculator from a true investor, I cannot agree that we must impose a holding period of over 18 years, starting with an initial period of 10 years in which, upon a sale, all excess depreciation over straight-line is recaptured as ordinary income.

Such a holding period must be contrasted with the committee's rejection of the House-passed proposal for a new 12-month holding period in order to provide "a better line of demarcation between gains for investment and speculative gains" as to other types of capital assets. The Senate Committee "was concerned—as also was the Treasury Department—as to the impact this might have on the willingness of investors to take risks and, thus, on capital investments and on revenues." See Senate report, page 200.

I can assure this body that with an 18-year holding period there is every reason to anticipate the same kind of impact upon investments in residential rental housing, upon revenues to be derived for the Treasury from rental housing construction and upon the willingness of investors to take risks on apartment housing. A shorter holding period is warranted. I will at the appropriate time offer an amendment for this purpose—to reduce the proposed 18 years and 4 months to 13 years and 4 months by cutting 5 years from the initial 10 years of the total holding period proposed under subchapter C, section 521 (b) of the bill—pages 391–394.

By adopting my two amendments with respect to residential rental housing, I think the Senate will go a long way toward removing the very real impediments to investors which otherwise would be created by this bill. I believe also that these amendments will place the chairman and members of the committee in the broadest and best possible negotiating position as this bill goes to what I feel sure will be a difficult and complex conference with representatives of the other body.

The growth rate of real estate as contrasted with other segments of the economy is evidence enough, I believe, to show that the rate of return on housing is simply not as attractive as other forms of investment. Real estate construction, for example, has lagged behind the 5.2 percent growth rate of the gross national product for the past 8 years. And in that period, housing has had a growth of only 0.5 percent.

Accordingly I think the revenue estimates set forth in the committee report—page 215—are woefully in error in anticipating dollar returns to the Treasury based upon a continuation of the presently projected rates of construction despite the obstacles to investors posed by this bill. Even so, however, I point out that my amendments—greatly needed by housing—would affect adversely only a portion of the amounts calculated to be gained in revenue by the bill's provisions on a revised treatment of used property and on recapture. The bulk of the anticipated revenues are to be gained from these and other changes which affect all real property, i.e., commercial, industrial, offices, warehouses, plants, shopping centers, and others.

I should like to emphasize, incidentally, that the committee report stresses there will be little or no effect on revenue in 1970 by the depreciation and recapture provisions in the bill, and the revenue anticipated—mistakenly I think—will be of substantial size in 1979. Yet these provisions, unless changed in accord with my amendments, will unquestionably have a severe and depressing effect on the housing investment markets in 1970—as their threat of passage already has had in 1969. I am of the strong opinion, as I have already stated that we as a nation cannot afford these further downward pressures upon real estate, especially housing, whatever revenues the Treasury statisticians think they can or cannot wring out of the construction industry.

It is clear to me from the committee report—page 212—that the value of the existing tax laws on depreciation as an incentive for rental housing production are fully understood by the committee and the Treasury. Expressly for this reason, the existing recapture rule is being maintained for low- and moderate-income housing. But the total production of such housing, under the section 221 (d)(3) and 236 programs, is only a small fraction of the total rental housing this country needs to build, this year, next year, and every year during the next decade.

I think it is appropriate at this point to note that in the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969 the Congress set specifically as a National Housing Goal "the construction or rehabilitation of 26 million housing units, 6 million of these for low and moderate income." (42 U.S.C. 1441, 63 Stat. 413) We are falling far short of this goal. We need every resource at our command in order to achieve it, or even to come close to the levels of housing production we need—an annual average of 2.6 million housing units. The tax laws should help, not hinder this process.

Our congressional estimates of housing and our goals fall short, as a matter of fact, of the total housing needs projected in the report of the President's Committee on Urban Housing, December 11, 1968, headed by Mr. Edgar F. Kaiser. In the Kaiser committee report, at page 40, our total construction needs for housing are set at 26.7 million units. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the pertinent table from that report, table IV.

There being no objection, table IV was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RELATED EXCERPT FROM COMMITTEE REPORT

To meet this projected total need for the coming decade there must be a vast increase of the Nation's housing production. The average of 2.6 million new and rehabilitated units required for each of the 10 years, in order to meet this objective, compares with the current annual rate of 1.5 million new housing units per year. Recently the Nation has produced only about 50,000 subsidized units a year—in 10 years at that rate, only half a million. Production of both subsidized and unsubsidized housing must clearly be expanded to rid the cities of substandard housing by 1978.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the vast bulk of residential rental housing, as I have already indicated, must depend upon a high and sustained flow of private equity investment funds. This housing is for the great middle-income classes who are neither rich enough to afford luxury apartment dwellings nor poor enough to qualify for federally financed and subsidized rental projects. These are the families who will be hurt, and hurt badly, if this tax reform bill substantially eliminates, as it now does, the opportunity for builders to market new rental projects at a sufficiently attractive yield and the opportunity for investors to reach a capital gains position after a more than reasonably long holding period.

The purpose of both of my amendments is to remedy, at least to some degree, the thrust of the pending bill in taking out of existing law the incentives which have largely been responsible for the greatly needed rental housing production we have witnessed in recent years. This production is needed in even greater quantity during coming years.

At a time when housing starts have fallen rapidly and drastically, when we are building not housing but a housing shortage in the United States, I do not believe we can afford to remove the tax incentives to investment in housing which this bill would do. I, therefore, urge favorable action by this body and approval of my amendments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the pertinent tables of housing needs and production estimates taken from the First Annual Report on National Housing Goals filed with the Congress on January 23, 1969, table V, VI, and VII.

There being no objection, tables V, VI, and VII were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE V

The following table summarizes a projected need for 28.2 million new and rehabilitated housing units between July 1, 1967, and June 30, 1977:

The annual production targets to achieve the goals have been revised to reflect the impacts of the events since last April. The revised annual production targets are shown in table 1. Since these are long-range projections, the figures are rounded to the nearest 25,000. The exact budget estimates for assisted housing are 233,000 units for fiscal 1969 and 503,000 units for fiscal 1970.

UNASSISTED PRIVATE HOUSING ANNUAL PRODUCTION TARGETS

The 1968 report represented a series of estimated requirements of the number of new housing units that would have to be started privately without any public assistance to meet overall housing needs. Based upon the additional data now available on actual performance of the industry since the date of the 1968 report, the following revised estimates are presented of current and future production in the unassisted housing market. These estimates, as set forth in table 2, and comparisons with annual estimates set forth in the earlier report for fiscal years 1968 and 1969 are shown, as well as the unrevised figures for all subsequent years.

THE PERSONAL EXEMPTION PROVISION

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senate adopted an $800 personal exemption coupled with a $1,000 low-income allowance. It concentrates tax reduction in the low- and middle-income brackets and provides tax relief for those who need it most—the average wage earner with children to feed, clothe, and educate.

I have submitted tables for the RECORD over the past week that demonstrate that my amendment provides greater relief for the average taxpayer than did the tax reduction measures in the House bill.

Tables prepared by the Treasury Department, appearing in the public press today, purport to compare the tax reduction that would be made available under the amendment adopted by the Senate with the reduction provided by the House bill.

I was surprised to see that these tables purport to show that my amendment provides less tax relief for the middle-income taxpayer than provided by the House bill. These published tables are based upon unrealistic assumptions.

My amendment, in fact, provides more relief, not less, for the middle-income taxpayer than does the House bill. These were the taxpayers for whom we so successfully fought over the past weeks.

The Treasury tables are incorrect because they proceed on a completely fallacious and arbitrary assumption. The assumption is that every taxpayer in the whole country uses a 10 percent standard deduction. The assumption is incorrect. Almost one-half of the taxpayers in this country, in fact, itemize their deductions, and these deductions average 18 percent of these taxpayers' income—not 10 percent.

Now what does the Treasury's false assumption do? It shows a much larger benefit from the House bill than taxpayers would, in fact, receive. A statement based upon an incorrect assumption will, of course, produce an incorrect result. The tables, therefore, understate the relative benefits of my proposal. For example, the Treasury tables assume that a man with deductions of more than $2,000 of his income will receive a benefit from the increase in the standard deduction. This is patently absurd—it is a mathematical impossibility for the standard deduction increase in the House bill to benefit such a taxpayer.

The whole point I have made through these past weeks is that the average middle-income taxpayer who is paying interest on his mortgage, real estate taxes on his house, medical bills for his children, and State and local income taxes is not getting a fair shake out of the House bill. My amendment remedied that very bad effect.

But the Treasury tables assume the House bill helps the average taxpayer with these deductible expenses. And it does not in any way to the degree required.

The battle to scuttle my amendment has already started. These tables represent just one more attempt by the Treasury to undermine my proposal and to deny the benefits of meaningful tax reduction to the hard-pressed middle-income taxpayers of our country.

In order to set the record straight and to try to correct the erroneous impression these Treasury tables may have given the American public, I am submitting for the RECORD tables prepared by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, which show the tax relief under my bill compared to that under the House bill. These tables are based on a more nearly correct factual assumption—that nonbusiness deductions equal 18 percent of the taxpayer's income. The 18-percent figure is an average—some taxpayers would have larger deductions, some lower. But an average is a more realistic assumption than the arbitrary low assumption used by the Treasury.

I hope the public press will carry these tables tomorrow so that the American public can have a more accurate picture of what the Senate has done in raising the personal exemption to $800 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. In any event, I wanted all Senators to have correct figures for their information and that of their constituents who are so vitally affected by my amendment.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Individual income tax liability under present law, under relief provisions of H.R.

13270 as passed by the House of Representatives, under relief provisions of H.R. 13270 as approved by the Senate, and with single person treatment as approved by the Senate Committee on Finance (assumes nonbusiness deductions of 18 percent of income).

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I also wish to clarify a point raised by the senior Senator from Delaware this morning with respect to the effect on capital gains rates of my amendment to increase the personal exemption to $800.

My amendment did not change the capital gains provisions of the Finance Committee bill. My amendment dealt only with individual tax rates and personal exemptions.

The Finance Committee voted, prior to any action on individual income tax rates, to repeal the alternative 25-percent rate on capital gains for most high bracket taxpayers. At that point in the committee deliberations, therefore, the maximum rate on capital gains was 35 percent—or one-half of the top rate of 70 percent. My amendment did not change these provisions.

The committee then imposed a 5-percent minimum tax on preference income in excess of $30,000. The excluded one-half of capital gains is a tax preference. For high bracket taxpayers with large amounts of capital gains, then, the committee action could have produced a maximum tax rate at 37½ percent. My amendment did not change this either.

When the Finance Committee took the unwise step of reducing the top rate from 70 to 65 percent, the maximum rate on capital gains was then reduced to 35 percent—if the minimum tax is included. My amendment changed the general rates, leaving them as in present law.

My amendment did not affect the committee action with respect to the repeal of the alternative capital gains rates in any way. That is in another section of the bill. My amendment struck out the rate reduction provisions from the committee bill, and substituted an increase in personal exemption. As a result of any change in maximum rates up or down, the capital gains provisions will relate and be affected accordingly. High-bracket taxpayers could pay a higher maximum capital gains rate. In case the maximum rate is 70 percent instead of 65 percent, then a higher—2½ percent—capital gains rate would result; if, in the future, the rate should be fixed at 60 percent instead of 70 percent, the maximum capital gain rate would be reduced—5 percent. So the maximum capital gain rate is a function of the general rates under the committee bill not by terms of my amendment.

I should emphasize that the 25-percent alternative rate is retained for taxpayers with relatively small amounts of capital gain. My amendment does not change this rule.

The persons affected by the repeal of the alternative 25-percent rate constitute only one-one hundredth of all taxpayers in the country. They are all in tax brackets above 50 percent per year and they all have income of more than $50,000 per year. They are affected, rightly or wrongly, rightly I accept, by a provision on page 352 of the bill which my amendment did not affect or change.

SMALL BUSINESS FRANCHISE PROVISION

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, many of the provisions of the bill have been much debated and are fully understood. However, it is noteworthy that the bill contains numerous additional provisions which effect basic and important reforms. I would like to take this opportunity to point out an example of such a significant, but little discussed, provision which will benefit the important and fast-growing small business phenomenon of franchising. As we all know, probably the most significant factor contributing to the growth of small business in this country today has been the development of the concept of franchising.

The impact of income taxes is as important in franchising operations as in other forms of business—perhaps even more so because of the relative lack of capital owned by many franchisees. This bill plays an important role in clearing up a problem which was causing franchisees much concern.

Uncertainty had arisen as to whether franchisees could take a tax deduction for the annual payments they made to the franchisor based upon the receipts and revenues derived by them under their franchises. This troublesome problem has been resolved by making it clear that such payments are deductible as business expenses by the franchisees.

The bill also properly takes the position that franchisors who retain significant strings on the business franchised will, in the future, be denied capital gains. Since these new rules represent a basic change in the law as regards franchisors, the tax treatment of franchisors on past transfers is not affected by the bill. However, the bill provides that franchisees will henceforth be allowed deductions for contingent annual payments made with respect to existing as well as future franchise agreements. Since these payments are essentially like royalty payments and certainly represent ordinary and necessary business expense, I submit that the bill is correct in this treatment. To have done otherwise would have been to penalize the small business person in the franchising scene simply because his franchisor is entitled to a tax treatment now thought to be too liberal—but which was perfectly acceptable at the time the franchise agreement was consummated.

PROGRAM

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I take this time to ask the distinguished majority leader if he can give us any information as to the schedule for the rest of the day and tomorrow.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in response to the question raised by the distinguished acting Republican leader, it is not anticipated that there will be any further rollcall votes this evening, but there will be a rollcall vote at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow on the Mondale amendment, which will be pending when the Senate concludes its business today.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator Yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator mentioned 10:30 as the time for voting on the Mondale amendment. At what time will the Senate convene?

Mr. MANSFIELD. 9:30.

Mr. CURTIS. Will there be any business before that?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. a bill having to do with revising the criminal law and procedure of the District of Columbia, on which there will be a debate by the Senators from Nebraska, Arkansas, and Maryland, which will take about 20 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. Then that will allow only about 30 minutes for debate on the Mondale amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, but there will be an explanation given tonight, before the Senate adjourns.

Mr. CURTIS. I would not agree to a 30-minute limitation on a matter as far-reaching as this. I will agree to a reasonable time, but not 30 minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There will be some discussion of it tonight. I am trying to take care of some Senators—who are not on my side of the aisle, incidentally—who could not be here this evening, and I am trying to reach an accommodation. How about 11 o'clock? There will be some debate on it tonight. It is going to be discussed tonight and tomorrow. I assume only about 20 minutes will be taken up on the District of Columbia matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the Senator from Minnesota present?

Mr. MANSFIELD. He was here, but he assured me he was going to talk on his amendment tonight. As a matter of fact, he already spoke on it for about 5 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I very much favor the amendment, but I do not want to get boxed in on something so vital——

Mr. MANSFIELD. How much time would the Senator himself need?

Mr. CURTIS. That is rather unimportant. It is a matter of how long the Senate is going to consider something that would kill off about 30,000 institutions after they get to be 40 years old.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Perhaps I made a mistake in bringing this up. The Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) is now present in the Chamber.

I may say to the Senator from Minnesota that I had told the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Minnesota was going to explain the proposal this evening at some length. It was after some travail and trouble that we reached an agreement, including agreement of the Senator from Tennessee, who I understand had the most responsibility for putting this particular section in the bill now before us. It was agreed to all around. I thought all the handicaps had been overcome, but if they have not been, that is it.

Mr. CURTIS. I will agree to a reasonable time, but not 30 minutes for both sides.

Mr. MANSFIELD. How about tonight?

Mr. CURTIS. If we talk tonight, we may as well talk in the cloak rooms or at home to ourselves.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I hope we read the RECORD. If we do not, I think we had better stop publishing it. I get my information not so much from listening to statements on the floor, which are tiring sometimes, but from reading the RECORD as a matter of duty.

Mr. CURTIS. We read it when we convene at 12 o'clock.

Mr. MANSFIELD. A copy of the RECORD gets to my home at 5:30 a.m., and I have read it before I leave for work at about 6:30.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, the Senator should get to work earlier. [Laughter.] I think 30 minutes is too short a time, but I will agree to an hour's debate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is fair enough. Would the Senator want the hour continuous, or should we come in at 9 o'clock and have 40 minutes before the District of Columbia bill is taken up, and then 40 minutes after the District of Columbia bill?

Mr. CURTIS. If the final 20 minutes may be reserved for the proponents of the amendment, I will agree to that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would have to object to that.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the discussion on S. 2869, a bill to revise the criminal law and procedure of the District of Columbia, there be an hour's limitation on the Mondale amendment, the time to be equally divided between the distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) and the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG).

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is that before or after the District of Columbia bill?

Mr. MANSFIELD. We will keep it together, in sequence.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, would the Senator be prepared to follow this unanimous consent with my amendment, which goes to the same subject, so we will have no complication on a substitute?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would hope to, but that is up to the Senate's decision. I would hope to follow it with the Javits amendment and then the Metcalf amendment, having to do with hobby farming.

Mr. JAVITS. I would accept a 1-hour's limitation, if the Senator could get consent now.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It has to be cleared.

Mr. JAVITS. Could it be understood that it would be considered after the Mondale amendment?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, incidentally, I should like to remind my colleagues that there will be a Saturday session, that there is work to be performed, that amendments will be voted on, and there are appropriation bills to pass.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if I may, and if it is within my province, that following the vote on the Mondale amendment, the amendment of the distinguished senior Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) be laid before the Senate. I refer to the amendment on foundations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business tonight, it stand in adjournment until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. MANSFIELD. At that time, Mr. President, there will be a colloquy by the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. MCCLELLAN), and the Senator from Maryland (Mr. TYDINGS), covering S. 2869, and at the conclusion of that we will go back to the Mondale amendment, which will be laid down tonight as the pending business. There will be no morning hour tomorrow.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 265.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Will the Senator send a copy of the amendment to the desk?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, would the Senator be willing to agree to a limitation of debate on the amendment? How much time does he require?

Mr. CANNON. I would agree to a 20-minute limitation, 10 minutes to a side.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on the amendment be limited to 20 minutes, 10 minutes to each side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk still needs a copy of the amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has the floor. The clerk will now state the pending amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read the amendment (No. 265), as follows:

On page 413, line 3 after the period, insert the following: "This section shall not apply to transportation equipment operated by persons subject to regulation by the Civil Aeronautics Board, Federal Maritime Commission, or the Interstate Commerce Commission."

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the Javits amendment occur at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, provided, of course, there is an hour allowed in the meantime for the debate on the Mondale amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1017) making further continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1970, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, repeal of the investment tax credit is proposed as a curb on inflation. I question whether it will have any such effect. The point that worries me is that removal of the tax credit may have an impact directly opposite the results intended.

I am concerned that repeal of the investment tax credit may very well contribute to inflation.

Inflationary trends of the past few years have been caused primarily by a soaring demand for goods and services. Newer, more productive capacity is the best means of meeting this demand and, thereby, easing inflationary pressures.

The 7-percent tax credit on investment in capital goods is one of the best tools we have for stimulating the replacement of less efficient productive capacity with the more efficient.

The need to expand and upgrade the country's productive capacity is a continuing one that has existed throughout our economic history. The investment tax credit is a longterm approach to meeting this need. It is not something that should be on today and off tomorrow.

If the Congress decides, nevertheless, upon repeal, I urge most strongly that the credit be continued for the Nation's beleaguered transportation industry. The need to retain the investment credit for transportation is so compelling that I am offering an amendment to the tax reform bill to provide for continuation of the credit for regulated transportation.

Continuous improvement in transportation services is essential to our economic well-being. There is no question that, if the tax credit is repealed for transportation, some gain in productivity will be lost, contributing to inefficiency in our transportation system and in the economy at large. This is the only large nation in the world with a privately owned and run transportation system and we want to keep it that way. But transportation is in trouble.

Airways and airports are congested and require a minimum expenditure of $20 billion in the next 10 years. At the same time, the airlines are having the most severe financial problems in years amid growing demand for air services. They must spend billions of dollars in the next few years for air and ground equipment to accommodate millions of new passengers. Repeal of the 7-percent investment tax credit will virtually wipe out one of the few viable financing mechanisms available to that industry—the tax credit lease. What will happen if the airlines are unable to finance the acquisition of badly needed new, more productive equipment? Certainly fares will have to be increased to meet the cost of inflation. Passengers and shippers will not be accommodated, and the economy will suffer. The only question is how much it will suffer .

As for the railroads, all of us are aware of the constant shortage of boxcars that plagues this industry year after year. The American consumer and our economy are the losers, as well as the railroads.

I might point out, Mr. President, that we have been concerned for several years with the problem of boxcar shortages. Only today, the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee has appointed a special subcommittee, or reactivated a subcommittee, on the boxcar shortage, to try to find some way of solving the problem, so that boxcars will become available. Certainly the railroads are not going to be able to continue to reinvest in boxcars if they are not given some type of incentive.

Our Nation's maritime industry is in perpetual crisis. Not enough U.S. ships are being built. Loss of the investment tax credit can only worsen this very serious situation.

The investment credit has been extremely helpful in enabling the Nation's motor carriers of freight to keep abreast of the ever increasing demands for their service by America's shippers.

New industries are increasingly becoming highway oriented and the tens of thousands of communities served only by trucks are increasing in number. Railroads no longer or rarely handle shipments under 6,000 pounds and this also has thrown an additional burden on the highway carriers.

All of this calls for increased capacity, more rolling stock and the modernization of truck fleets. The more than 15,000 regulated motor carriers are hard pressed to meet these demands in the face of increased cost of all kinds.

It is apparent that our transportation industries, upon which we all depend so heavily, are not in the best of financial health. Repeal of the investment tax credit for these industries could create economic problems for this Nation which would be difficult to overcome.

Therefore, Mr. President, I propose an amendment to the investment tax credit repeal provision which will provide the Government and the Nation with far greater benefits than will be lost through diminished tax revenues. It would exempt from repeal the transportation services of all companies regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Maritime Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Board.

I hope my colleagues agree that such an amendment is profoundly in the national interest, and that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in considering this matter of the investment tax credit on earlier occasions, we had many requests for exemptions. It was the feeling of the committee that as soon as we started making exceptions for groups and industries, step by step the whole effort to repeal the investment tax credit would unravel; that, having done it for one industry, another would ask for it, and another and another, and by the time we got through making exceptions, we would have no excuse not to exempt everybody. It was sort of like pulling first one thread and then another from a piece of fabric, until the whole thing falls apart.

The Senate had better decide whether it wants to repeal the investment tax credit or not. We had, at one time, agreed to a single exception because of the very critical need for railroad rolling stock; and subsequently the Treasury, realizing what could happen to this measure if there were exemptions, felt every effort should be made to accommodate the railroad industry otherwise. Therefore, it was agreed that the railroad industry would have a 5-year amortization provision, which is one of the most expensive provisions in this measure, so that they could amortize railroad rolling stock very rapidly; and they were accommodated to the greatest extent possible, so much so that they themselves asked that the provision for an exemption for the railroads be deleted.

So it was deleted, at their request. We have provided as liberally as we thought could be justified on any basis for contracts that have long lead times, and that is particularly advantageous to the aircraft industry. Insofar as we could accommodate various industries that had existing commitments, we sought to do so, and it seemed to me that we had just about satisfied them, insofar as there was any way to do it. To go beyond that point, I believe, would mean that we would have a series of exemptions, one behind the other, to the extent that we simply would not be able to repeal the investment tax credit.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes. I believe the Senator from Delaware would like to say a few words about this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yes. I agree completely with what the Senator from Louisiana has said; we have already rescinded close to one-third of the additional revenue gained by repeal of the investment tax credit, as a result of the vote on the Hartke amendment. I understand this amendment involves $720 million more. There is no question that there would be many others following it, and we might just as well say we are going to cancel all of it, and reinstate the investment tax credit.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this revenue is needed to offset the reductions voted by amendments to this bill. The President has said that if the bill becomes too badly overbalanced fiscally, he will veto the bill. We see amendment by amendment making the bill more and more of a burden on Government revenues, to the extent that if all this continues, and the House of Representatives agrees to accept a large part of it, that will undoubtedly mean that the bill is headed for a big Presidential veto. And I, for one, would probably vote to sustain such a veto, if the President felt he had to do it as a matter of fiscal responsibility, and I believe a number of other Senators would.

So, as much as I would like to accommodate these industries, it is my judgment that the budget simply cannot afford it.

I, for one, of course, feel that this has encouraged a lot of industries. And I am not placing the blame on the transportation industry. I think they need capital items very much and should be encouraged to order them. However, as this investment tax credit has encouraged a construction boom which has added fuel to a large extent to the inflationary fire during this period, it would be my hope that the Senate would reject the amendment both with respect to what it would do to the revenue impact of the bill and with respect to the precedent it would be set with respect to further amendments. I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. President, it was not my understanding that the yeas and nays would be requested on the amendment. However, I have been informed since that time that they are desired.

I ask unanimous consent at this point that the vote on the pending amendment be held at a time tomorrow to be agreed upon between the manager of the bill and the sponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we plan to complete the debate this evening and vote on the amendment tomorrow.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I understand that the driving of foundation pilings is the commencement of construction for purposes of the investment credit plant facility rule. Is this also true if what might have been test pilings originally are later actually used as foundation pilings?

Mr. LONG. The Senator is correct when he states that the driving of foundation pilings is the commencement of construction for purposes of the plant facility rule. If, therefore, in connection with the construction of a plant facility, test pilings are driven and these test pilings are later actually used as foundation pilings, then the date on which the testing indicates the pilings will be used as foundation pilings is the construction commencement date. The test pilings in that case become foundation pilings at that time.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, what percentage of the benefit would accrue to the passenger side of the railroad industry as opposed to the freight side?

Mr. LONG. It would be only a very small amount. I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. PELL. Would it be 5 percent or something in that order?

Mr. LONG. That would be my estimate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be temporarily laid aside under the previous agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will we be advised ahead of time as to the time of the vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. That is correct. It is my understanding that we will vote on the amendment after one of the rollcall votes tomorrow, so that everyone will have an opportunity to be present.

DOMESTIC BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to state the amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment ordered to be printed in the RECORD reads as follows:

On page 312, line 19, substitute "(B)" for "(C)".

On page 313, line 13, substitute "(B)" for "(C)".

On page 314, line 2, substitute "(B)" for "(C)".

On page 317, strike lines 3 through 6 and substitute the following: "such associations; and".

On page 317, line 7, substitute "(B)" for "(C)".

On page 319, strike lines 16 and 17 and substitute the following: "the conduct of its business.".

On page 320, in lines 20 and 21, substitute "subparagraph (B)" for "subparagraphs (B) and (C)".

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, my amendment does not in any way affect the revenue to the Treasury. It deals with the definition of a domestic building and loan association. It merely removes an obsolete provision which could be subject to misunderstanding.

The definition of a building and loan association outlines in specific detail the investments in which savings and loan associations are required to make investments if they are to qualify as a savings and loan association. My amendment would not change this. It simply removes obsolete language stating:

Substantially all of the business of which consists of acquiring the savings of the public and investing in loans.

This language was put in the original Internal Revenue Code before the investment standards were written into the law. Today, savings and loan associations are authorized to deal with the Federal National Mortgage Association, sell participation loans, sell debentures, accept public funds, accept commercial or business accounts, and borrow from the Home Loan Bank System and others. Technically, obtaining funds from such activities as those enumerated are not "acquiring the savings of the public."

I have discussed this amendment with the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and the professional staff and they have agreed to accept it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have been apprised of the Senator's amendment. I see no objection to it. I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Delaware and with other Senators. I know of no objection to the amendment.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I am willing to agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES OF HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. MILLER), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Florida (Mr. GURNEY), and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk proceeded to state the amendment.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment ordered to be printed in the RECORD, reads as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

"SEC. ——. TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES OF HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUALS.

"(a) Part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by redesignating section 218 as section 219 and by inserting after section 217 the following new section:

"'(a) General Rule.—In the case of a disabled individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction expenses paid during the taxable year for transportation to and from work (while he is a disabled individual) to the extent that such expenses do not exceed $600.

"'(b) Disabled Individual Defined.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term "disabled individual" means an individual who is disabled to such an extent that he is unable during a period of long-continued and indefinite duration to use, without undue hardship or danger, a streetcar, bus, subway, or train, or similar form of public transportation, as a means of traveling to and from work. A taxpayer claiming a deduction under this section shall submit such proof that he is a disabled individual as the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate may by regulations prescribe. The regulations so prescribed shall provide that a certification from a State Vocational Rehabilitation Agency, including the District of Columbia, indicating that the taxpayer is a disabled individual within the meaning of this section shall be deemed conclusive proof that he is a disabled individual for purposes of this section.'

"(b) The table of sections for such part is amended by striking out 'Sec. 218. Cross references.' and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'Sec. 218. Transportation of disabled individual to and from work.

"'Sec. 219. Cross references.'

"(c) Section 62 (relating to definition of adjusted gross income) is amended by inserting after paragraph (9) (added by section 531(b) of this Act) the following new paragraph:

"'(10) Transportation expenses of disabled individuals.—The deduction allowed by section 218.'

"(d) The amendments made by this section shall apply to expenses paid after December 31, 1969."

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, this amendment is a compromise version worked out among Senators MILLER, JAVITS, and myself and is a limited version of a broader proposal offered in finance committee. This amendment will provide justified relief to the working handicapped who incur substantial expense in getting to work because they are unable to use public transportation. The amendment provides a tax deduction for transportation expenses to and from work, up to $600 a year, for certain handicapped persons. The deduction is to be a deduction in determining adjusted gross income, not an itemized deduction, so that it will be available to taxpayers using the standard deduction.

A handicapped person, to be eligible for this deduction, may prove his disability by presenting a certificate from a State vocational rehabilitation agency. The certificate must indicate he has a disability that is expected to last for a continuous period of long and indefinite duration that prevents him from using public transportation without undue hardship or danger. He may also present other proof as prescribed in Treasury regulations.

Thus, under this amendment, a person who is handicapped, from whatever cause, to the extent that he cannot reasonably use public transportation will be permitted a tax deduction for the amounts he spends on cabs or other means of private transportation up to a total of $600 a year.

This amendment will provide a tax reduction of $90 million to about 1 million handicapped persons who work, but this would be a very low cost for what would be involved.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, as a cosponsor, I rise in support of this amendment and congratulate Senator FANNIN for his initiative in this important area.

As a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, I have supported many measures designed to enable handicapped citizens move into productive employment.

This amendment gives a tax deduction for commuting expenses of certain disabled persons. It grants a tax deduction for transportation expenses up to $600 a year. To be eligible an individual must receive a certificate proving his disability from his State vocational rehabilitation agency. The certificate must indicate that the disability will last for a continuous period of long and indefinite duration which prevents the handicapped individual from using public transportation.

This amendment then grants relief to working handicapped taxpayers who are not able to use public transportation without undue hardship or danger. In these cases, handicapped individuals obviously have inordinately high transportation expenses. This amendment helps to recognize this fact and provides needed relief and is another important step in helping 1 million handicapped individuals remain independent and self-sufficient. I urge its adoption.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) a member of the Finance Committee, in the sponsorship of this amendment to provide a tax deduction for transportation expenses to and from work for the handicapped. As the Senator noted, the amendment before us is a compromise provision worked out by the committee. For me, it is the culmination of an effort begun when, as a Member of the House, I introduced a similar proposal in the 81st Congress in 1950.

Our handicapped citizens are capable of being productive workers, contributing to the Nation's economy instead of being dependent upon it. But their disabilities impose upon them additional expenses in pursuit of their livelihoods which are not fully tax deductible such as extra travel costs because they are unable to utilize routine methods of transportation.

I am heartened by the support for this amendment. Hundreds of thousands of Americans have endeavored valiantly to transform their physical handicaps from stumbling blocks to building blocks. They wish to use their crutches to move on, not to lean on. This amendment will help them do just that. It is as practical in economic terms as it is humanitarian. It is, in effect, a practical provision to benefit those who have no alternative but to be practical.

I am very hopeful not only that the amendment will be agreed to, but also, since it is critically important, that it actually survive the conference and become at long last part of our basic tax law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, the Fannin amendment is offered as an aid to the disabled by providing a tax deduction to those who incur extraordinary expenses for transportation to and from work as a result of their inability to use public transportation. Now this is certainly a meritorious objective. However, the use of a tax deduction to accomplish this fails in large part to fulfill this objective. It fails because it does not provide any relief to nontaxable disabled persons who constitute a large proportion of the disabled group. Obviously, the extra transportation costs of low-income disabled persons will be a high proportion of the wages or salaries they earn or could earn. To provide a tax deduction for other disabled persons and not for those at the lowest income strata would be a serious injustice.

Even for those who would obtain the benefits of this tax deduction the value of the deduction would be only infinitesimal. For example, assuming a marginal tax rate of 15 percent, the $600 deduction would provide tax savings of only 35 cents per day on transportation costs of $2.40 per day. The $2.40 per day totals to $600 a year, the maximum deduction allowed under this amendment. As you can readily see, as a relief measure this tax deduction certainly does not fulfill its objective because it does not help those who need it most, and for those who take the deduction the amounts involved have little value.

A corollary objective of the tax deduction is to encourage the disabled who are now unemployed to seek employment. But here again the amounts described above certainly would not represent the deciding factor in the willingness or ability of the handicapped to seek or obtain employment.

I am informed that the operating Federal agencies in the area of aid to the handicapped have reviewed this proposal and question its desirability because the large majority of individuals who have most need would not receive assistance. It is my understanding that these agencies recognize this transportation cost problem and are actively developing appropriate and effective means of providing relief and employment incentives through the direct expenditure approach.

In view of these facts, I urge my colleagues to vote against this amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Earlier today, I called up an amendment to the social security law and, having called it up for consideration, I then asked unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside. It was my impression that when an amendment is temporarily laid aside, it becomes the pending business after the consideration of any other measure that is then called up.

I ask the Chair if my understanding is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it was temporarily laid aside for the purpose of offering another amendment, that is correct.

Mr. LONG. That was my understanding at the time.

Mr. President, I would like to make it clear for the RECORD that my purpose in offering the amendment at that time was that I thought we should not vote on amendments to the social security bill prior to the time the House had occasion to indicate to the Senate its judgment with regard to social security. I would hope that we would not be voting on social security amendments prior to that time. I have not objected to other Senators bringing up their amendments, but I ask whether it is necessary for a Senator to have unanimous consent to displace the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal indicates that it was not laid aside for the purpose of taking up another amendment.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask, then, that the Journal be corrected to indicate that the amendment was laid aside in order that the succeeding amendments be offered, and that it has been laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that the Journal be so corrected?

Mr. GORE. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I had introduced at the same time an amendment to provide a 15-percent increase in social security benefits in each category for which benefits presently are paid. I do not know why I should give consent to the prejudice of my own amendment. I would do this: I would give consent to an amendment reported by the Finance Committee. Really, if I may respectfully make a suggestion to the distinguished chairman, if he would modify his request to preserve in some way the priority of an amendment with respect to social security benefits that has been recommended by the Committee on Finance, by majority approval, by a poll of the majority of the members or otherwise—I do not wish to supplant any action of my committee, but if it is left to each Member to offer his amendment, then I have one at the desk.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it is my impression that when I withdrew the amendment, it was for the purpose of considering the amendment of the Senator from Texas. That was my intention when I did it. If the Parliamentarian wishes to tell me that that is not what I did, then I will do it again on the appropriate occasion. It will not require unanimous consent.

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, with regard to the Senator's amendment, I find considerable appeal to it. I am advised that it would cost approximately $90 million. Personally, I favor it. It was discussed in the committee, but it was not perfected in the committee at that time. I would have voted for it in the committee. Personally, I favor the amendment, but there is some revenue impact, and I think the Senate should know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FANNIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 367

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I call up my social security amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment wil be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Add at the end of the bill the following new title:

TITLE X—INCREASE IN SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

That this title may be cited as the "Social Security Amendments of 1969".

INCREASE IN OLD-AGE, SURVIVORS, AND DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 215(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out the table and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Section 203(a) of such Act is amended by striking out paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) when two or more persons were entitled (without the application of section 202(j)(1) and section 223(b)) to monthly benefits under section 202 or 223 for January 1970 on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such insured individual and at least one such person was so entitled for December 1969 on the basis of such wages and self-employment income, such total of benefits for January 1970 or any subsequent month shall not be reduced to less than the larger of—

"(A) the amount determined under this subsection without regard to this paragraph, or

"(B) an amount equal to the sum of the amounts derived by multiplying the benefit amount determined under this title (including this subsection, but without the application of section 222(b), section 202(q), and subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section), as in effect prior to January 1970, for each such person for such month, by 115 percent and raising each such increased amount, if it is not a multiple of $0.10, to the next higher multiple of $0.10;

but in any such case (i) paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applied to such total of benefits after the application of subparagraph (B), and (ii) if section 202(k)(2)(A) as applicable in the case of any such benefits for January 1970, and ceases to apply after such month, the provisions of subparagraph (B) shall be applied, for and after the month in which section 202(k)(2)(A) ceases to apply, as though paragraph (1) had not been applicable to such total of benefits for January 1970, or".

(c) Section 215(b)(4) of such Act is amended by striking out "January 1968" each time it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "December 1969".

(d) Section 215(e) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"Primary Insurance Amount Under 1967 Act

"(c)(1) For the purposes of column II of the table appearing in subsection (a) of this section, an individual's primary insurance amount shall be computed on the basis of the law in effect prior to the enactment of the Social Security Amendments of 1969.

"(2) The provisions of this subsection shall be applicable only in the case of an individual who became entitled to benefits under section 202(a) or section 223 before January 1970, or who died before such month."

(e) The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969 and with respect to lump-sum death payments under such title in the case of deaths occurring after December 1969.

(f) If an individual was entitled to a disability insurance benefit under section 223 of the Social Security Act for December 1969 and became entitled to old-age insurance benefits under section 202(a) of such Act for January 1970, or he died in such month, then, for purposes of section 215(a)(4) of the Social Security Act (if applicable), the amount in column IV of the table appearing in such section 215(a) for such individual shall be the amount in such column on the line on which in column II appears his primary insurance amount (as determined under section 215(c) of such Act) instead of the amount in column IV equal to the primary insurance amount on which his ability insurance benefit is based.

INCREASE IN BENEFITS FOR CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS AGE 27 AND OVER

SEC. 3. (a)(1) Section 227(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46," and by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(2) Section 227(b) of such Act is amended by striking out in the second sentence "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(b)(1) Section 228(b)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(2) Section 228(b)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46", and by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(3) Section 228(c)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(4) Section 228(c)(3)(A) of such Act is amended by striking out "$40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$46".

(5) Section 228(c)(3)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "$20" and inserting in lieu thereof "$23".

(c) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969.

MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF A WIFE'S OR HUSBAND'S INSURANCE BENEFITS

SEC. 4. (a) Section 202(b)(2) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Except as provided in subsection (q), such wife's insurance benefit for each month shall be equal to one-half of the primary insurance amount of her husband (or, in the case of a divorced wife, her former husband) for such month."

(b) Section 202(c)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (q), such husband's insurance benefit for each month shall be equal to one-half of the primary insurance amount of his wife for such month."

(c) Sections 202(c)(4) and 202(f)(5) of such Act are each amended by striking out "whichever of the following is the smaller: (A) one-half of the primary insurance amount of the deceased individual on whose wages and self-employment income such benefit is based, or (B) $105" and inserting in lieu thereof one-half of the primary insurance amount of the deceased individual on whose wages and self-employment income such benefit is based".

(d) The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall apply with respect to monthly benefits under title II of the Social Security Act for months after December 1969.

ALLOCATION TO DISABILITY INSURANCE TRUST FUND

SEC. 5. (a) Section 201(b)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of clause (B);

(2) striking out "1967, and so reported," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "1967, and before January 1, 1970, and so reported, and (D) 1.10 per centum of the wages (as so defined) paid after December 31, 1969, and so reported,".

(b) Section 201(b)(2) of such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of clause (B);

(2) striking out "1967," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "1967, and before January 1, 1970, and (D) 0.825 of 1 per centum of the amount of self-employment income (as so defined) so reported for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969,".

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Michigan may offer his amendment.

Mr. GORE. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would require unanimous consent at this point, unless it is an amendment to the pending amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to speak on the social security amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I hope this matter will not get out of hand. I understand the position in which the distinguished chairman of the commitee finds himself, and I sympathize with him thoroughly; but a commitment has been made to the Senate as a whole that the Mondale amendment would be called up as the stated order of business tonight, and if we get involved in the social security amendment now, all the agreements made to the Members and the good faith of the leadership will be in question. I would hope that this matter would be kept under control and that the Senate would do what it could to maintain its record for integrity, and that if this matter is to come up, it come up after the consideration of the Mondale, the Javits, and the Metcalf amendments, and the disposal of the Cannon amendment, on which all time has been used.

So I appeal to my colleagues to let us operate under the procedure agreed to; and once that part is out of the way, then whatever the Senate does is another ballgame.

AMENDMENT NO. 323

Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. CURTIS. I call up amendment No. 323 and ask that it be immediately considered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, could the amendment be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would still like to have it read. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment, as follows:

On page 199, commencing with line 19, strike out all through line 6 on page 200 (relating to recapture of certain deductions on sale of farmland at a gain) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) ORDINARY INCOME.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, if farmland which the taxpayer has held for less than 10 years is disposed of during a taxable year beginning after December 31——"

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I have heard enough.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska withhold the amendment, so that the leadership can keep its word as to what will be brought up tonight and tomorrow?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the distinguished manager of the bill allow me to ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be laid aside temporarily or otherwise and that I may ask that the Mondale amendment, under an agreement of the Senate, be laid before the Senate for consideration tonight and tomorrow?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am willing that it be laid aside for the purpose of offering another amendment. That does not bother me at all. That is what I did, to begin with. I want the RECORD to show that is the reason why I asked that it be laid aside.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would like to make an observation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment I have offered, I was of the opinion it could be disposed of within the purview of the agreement. I did not anticipate asking for a rollcall vote. It is very much in the nature of a corrective amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That would be perfectly all right. That is what the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, the acting Republican leader, would do. I understand there is no difficulty connected with it. But I want to get the Mondale amendment laid before the Senate and keep my agreement.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no desire whatever to interfere with the majority leader keeping his word or with the Senate proceeding. If the Long amendment should be the pending business before the Senate after the Mondale amendment it is entirely agreeable with me.

My point is I do not entirely agree that the House of Representatives has any priority over social security; the Senate has equal authority, equal jurisdiction on any revenue measure and with respect to any part of a revenue measure, if that revenue measure itself has originated in the House. For entirely too long the assumption has been that because the revenue measure may originate in the House that somehow the Senate did not have an equal right to amend, alter, or add to any measure, the piece of paper of which originated in the House.

Unless we add the social security increase to this bill it is not likely to become effective until March, and there is a cold winter ahead. People simply cannot adequately live upon the small amounts they now receive.

I have no desire whatever to run ahead of the distinguished chairman of the committee. In fact, it seems to me the committee should have preference. If it is agreed that after the Mondale amendment is voted upon the Long amendment is still the pending business I would have no disagreement.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, would it be possible, instead of confining that suggestion to just the Mondale amendment that it also be considered in relation to the Griffin amendment, the Javits amendment, and the Metcalf amendment, because commitments have been made; and then it could become the pending business.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that would meet my objection. I want to see social security increased in this bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And by at least 15 percent.

Mr. GORE. Without waiting for the other side to act.

Mr. JAVITS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent with respect to the amendments to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the amendment to be offered by the acting Republican leader, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the amendment to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE), the amendment to be offered by the distinguished senior Senate from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the amendment to be offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Montana (Mr. METCALF), and the amendment to be offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN), that during the period of their consideration, the pending amendment, having to do with social security sponsored by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), be laid aside and once again become the pending business thereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of amendment No. 323.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

On page 199, commencing with line 19, strike out all through line 6 on page 200 (relating to recapture of certain deductions on sale of farmland at a gain) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) ORDINARY INCOME.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, if farmland which the taxpayer has held for less than 10 years is disposed of during a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969, the lower of—

"(A) the applicable percentage of the aggregate of the deductions allowed to the taxpayer under sections 175 (relating to soil and water conservation expenditures) and 182 (relating to expenditures by farmers for clearing land) for expenditures made by the taxpayer after December 31, 1969, or"

On page 201, strike out all before line 3 and insert the following:

"(3) APPLICABLE PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this section,

	"The applicable percentage is—
"If the farmland is disposed of—
Within 5 years after the date it was acquired	100 percent.
Within the sixth year after it was acquired	80 percent.
Within the seventh year after it was acquired	60 percent.
Within the eighth year after it was acquired	40 percent.
Within the ninth year after it was acquired	20 percent.
Ten years or more after it was acquired	0 percent.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of Senators, I think we can dispose of this matter very quickly.

This is somewhat in the nature of a correcting amendment. It is an amendment that was agreed upon by the Committee on Finance. The amendment was offered in committee by the Senator from Nebraska. The purpose of the amendment was to plug a loophole and to bring in more revenue.

The version I have offered now, I believe, more nearly corresponds to the action taken than the language that was drafted and placed in the bill. I say that with no criticism at all. There was a massive bill, and we had to move very fast.

Mr. President, here is the problem. Many years ago Congress provided that when a farmer, a landowner, spent his own money on soil conservation practices, that that was a business expense and therefore deductible. That was a sound policy; it worked well. It meant lesser appropriations. It avoided the necessity of appropriating money for that purpose. What happened? Certain wealthy people would buy rundown land, spend money on it as a chargeoff against other income, and sell it for a capital gain. It was to close that loophole we provided that if the landowner held the land less than 10 years he would not get the benefit of these provisions.

When the bill was drafted it was drawn to provide 10 years beginning from the last expenditure on soil conservation. It was my intention in offering the measure in committee to provide for 10 years of ownership, from the time the landowner acquired it. My amendment would make that correction.

Mr. GORE. Make what correction? I did not quite understand the correction.

Mr. CURTIS. If the landowner owned the land for 10 years he would get the benefit of the present law in regard to a writeoff for soil conservation purposes. The present law is without any length of time and because of that a practice sprung up where it became a loophole. We passed on this in the Committee on Finance, and the 10 years commenced to run from the last expenditure—it was my intention it run from the acquisition of the land. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the language in the bill is somewhat different from the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, but it was the Senator from Nebraska who was most interested in this matter. It was the thought of most of us we were following his suggestion when we agreed to that language which now appears in the bill.

In view of the fact that I and others were of the impression that we were following the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska in this matter, if this is what he had in mind, I personally would be willing to agree to it feeling that it was the thought we agreed to at that time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I concur with the chairman. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska referred to the amendment. He had the worthy purpose of lessening favoritism and as he proposed the amendment, as I understood it then, it would direct recapture unless the property was held for 10 years. As I understand the explanation as actually drafted, the 10 years would have to run from the time of the improvements rather than from the time of acquisition of the property.

Mr. CURTIS. That is right, to get the complete benefits.

Mr. GORE. Therefore, the Senator says, it is his intention to have the 10 years run from the time of acquisition of the property. I think we should agree to his modification.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator from Tennessee and the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee very much and ask for a vote at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware and Mr. LONG moved to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

FOSTER CHILDREN

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN is as follows:

At the proper place, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. TO INCLUDE CERTAIN FOSTER CHILDREN WITHIN THE DEFINITION OF DEPENDENTS FOR PURPOSES OF THE DEPENDENCY EXEMPTION.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 152(b)(2) (relating to rules relating to definition of dependent) is amended by inserting immediately before 'shall be treated' the following: ', or a foster child of an individual (if such child satisfies the requirements of subsection (a)(9) with respect to such individual),'.

"(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, this is an amendment very similar to amendment No. 322 which has been printed. The changes were made by the committee staff to avoid any possibility of ambiguity which it detected.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 now before the Senate contains a number of measures designed to bring greater equity to our tax system.

Obviously, however, the act does not close all tax loopholes or cure all tax inequities.

One basic tax inequity which goes unnoticed in both the House-passed and Senate Finance Committee bill is the fact that our tax laws do not permit foster parents to claim an exemption for a foster child on the same basis afforded a natural or adopted child.

Under present law, a taxpayer may claim a personal exemption if he furnishes more than one-half of the support of a natural or adopted child who is a full-time student—regardless of the amount of income earned by the child.

However, if a taxpayer's child is a foster child, he may not claim a personal exemption.

As Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Edward Cohen recently observed:

Ordinarily foster parents obtain a dependency exemption for foster children by reason of section 152(a)(9). That section provides that the term "dependent" includes an individual who, for the taxable year of the taxpayer, has as his principal place of abode the home of the taxpayer. Since the Committee reports indicate that section 152(a)(9) was inserted into the Code for the specific purpose of affording to foster parents a dependency deduction to which they were not otherwise entitled, it cannot be argued that Congress intended to include foster children within the definition of "child" contained in section 152(a)(1) and (2). The net result of this omission is to prevent foster parents from claiming a dependency exemption under section 151(e)(1)(B) even though they are providing their foster child with the same support which they provide to their natural children.

Mr. President, I believe Congress should correct this omission. Good foster parents willing and able to support foster children are in very short supply and certainly should not be penalized.

Unfortunately, many foster children are not legally available for adoption despite the great desire to adopt them on the part of their foster parents. Surely such technical disabilities should not cause different tax treatment of foster children who for all other purposes are treated alike by the family.

A recent tax case illustrated and underscores this present unwise and discriminatory policy. In Reed v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 50 T.C. 630 (1968), the U.S. Tax Court allowed an exemption for the Reed's natural son, but not for their foster sons. Each son had earned $800 and was attending college. But although the Reeds had been supporting the foster sons equally along with their natural son, the court disallowed the exemption for the foster sons under section 151(e)(1)(B).

Mr. President, the facts of the Reed case demonstrate the unsoundness of the current tax law with respect to foster children. The number of such cases is not large, and the added cost to the Government is certainly insignificant in contrast to the benefits rendered to children who need good homes and educations so that they may become productive members of society—and contribute even more to the country's future productivity.

On May 8 of this year, I introduced legislation to correct this basic inequity, S. 2112. This legislation simply includes within the definition of child, for purposes of the dependency exemption, a child placed by an authorized placement agency for foster care.

I have offered an amendment which is very similar to my earlier bill and ask that it be considered.

Mr. President, I believe the need for this legislation is clear. I am hopeful that the Senate will see fit to act now in correcting this minor but basic inequity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two letters concerning this proposal.

There being no objection, the two letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHILD WELFARE LEAGUE OF AMERICA, INC.,
New York, N.Y., February 7, 1969.

Hon. ROBERT GRIFFIN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRIFFIN: Mr. Edward Reed, foster father of two boys placed in his home by an accredited member agency of the Child Welfare League of America, has brought his recent tax case to our attention. We are deeply concerned about the unsound public policy which underlies the decisions made in this case, and the interpretation of the tax statute which denies certain tax exemptions for foster children in circumstances similar to Mr. Reed's. We believe an amendment to the tax law is essential to prevent further discrimination against foster children and foster parents in similar circumstances. The League has had a long time interest in the field of adoption and foster care, and we write to you in the hope that you may be helpful in effecting changes in the present tax law, as interpreted by the IRS and the U.S. Tax Court.

Mr. and Mrs. Reed had one natural son and two foster sons. All three were over 18, and attending college. Each one had earned $800. The Tax Court allowed an exemption for the Reeds' natural son, but not for the foster sons, although the Reeds had been supporting the foster sons, as well as their natural son, for many years.

As you know, parents of a full-time student can claim an exemption for him even though he is over 18 and earns $600 or more, provided that the parents furnish more than over half of his support. However, the Tax Court held that the waiver of the $600 income limit applies only for a natural child, stepchild, adopted child or foster child placed for adoption. It does not apply to a foster child who has not been adopted or placed for adoption.

This is an unwise and discriminatory policy which may discourage foster parents from encouraging and helping foster children to achieve a college education. It is a totally irrational discrimination against foster children and foster parents.

Unfortunately many foster children are not legally available for adoption despite the greatest desire to adopt them on the part of the foster parents. This was, in fact, the case with the Reeds. Surely such technical disabilities should not cause differential tax treatment of foster children, who for all other purposes are treated alike by the family. Nor should such technical disabilities further discriminate against a foster child's opportunity to win a college education.

Good foster parents, willing and able to help support foster children (who are unlucky enough to lack good homes with their own parents) are in very short supply. Surely such generous citizens should be encouraged in every way possible, so that more children in need of good foster homes will find them, and more foster children will be able to achieve as much education as their potential will permit.

The facts in the Reed case demonstrate the invalidity and unsoundness of the current tax law with respect to foster children. As a matter of sound policy we hope that Congress will see fit to amend the pertinent sections of the tax law as soon as possible. The number of such cases is not large, and the added cost to the government is likely to be insignificant in contrast to the services rendered to children who need good homes and education so that they may become productive members of society—and contribute even more to the country's future productivity and income.

We hope you will be in touch with us if we can be of assistance on this matter. We will appreciate whatever influence you can bring to bear in making legislative changes necessary to promote the welfare of children.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH H. REID,
Executive Director.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D.C., April 4, 1969.

Hon. ROBERT P. GRIFFIN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRIFFIN: This is in further reply to your request for the Treasury Department's comments concerning the letter from Mr. Joseph H. Reid, Child Welfare League of America, New York City. Mr. Reid is concerned about the denial of the dependency exemption to foster parents in cases where they are providing support to a child who is aged 19 or more and has income in excess of $600 but is a student. He cites the Reed case where parents of one natural son and two foster sons were denied dependency exemptions for the foster sons, but allowed one for the natural son even though all three were over 18, attending college and each had earned $800.

Section 151(e) of the Internal Revenue Code allows an exemption of $600 for each dependent, as defined in section 152, whose gross income is less than $600 per year. An exception to the $600 rule is provided for in section 151(e)(1)(B) for a "child" of the taxpayer who has not attained the age of 19, or, if he has, is a student, regardless of the amount of income earned by him. A "child" is defined as "an individual who (within the meaning of section 152) is a son, stepson, daughter, or stepdaughter of the taxpayer."

Ordinarily foster parents obtain a dependency exemption for foster children by reason of section 152(a)(9). That section provides that the term "dependent" includes an individual who, for the taxable year of the taxpayer, has as his principal place of abode the home of the taxpayer. Since the Committee reports indicate that section 152(a)(9) was inserted into the Code for the specific purpose of affording to foster parents a dependency deduction to which they were not otherwise entitled, it cannot be argued that Congress intended to include foster children within the definition of "child" contained in section 152(a) (1) and (2). The net result of this omission is to prevent foster parents from claiming a dependency exemption under section 151(e)(1)(B) even though they are providing their foster child with the same support which they provide to their natural children.

In light of the clear Congressional intent as reflected in the Committee reports relating to sections 151 and 152, any change in the tax treatment accorded to parents of foster children would require enactment of new legislation. This administration is undertaking a review of proposals to make our tax system more equitable. We will give the problem raised by Mr. Reid careful consideration in connection with this study.

We appreciate having this problem brought to our attention. I hope these comments provide adequate information for your consideration of the question raised by Mr. Reid. His communication to you is returned herewith.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN S. COHEN,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment. I have favored its provisions in years gone by and I am still in favor of them now. It will be all right with me to take this amendment to conference and see if we can persuade the House to agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 331

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 331 and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The text of the amendment is as follows:

Strike lines 18 through 25 on page 8, line 1 through 3 on page 9, and lines 3 through 5 on page 17.

In line 4, page 9, strike the number "(3)" and substitute the number "(2)".

In lines 10 through 13, page 9, strike the phrase beginning ", and for purposes . . ." and ending ". . . nearest to completion".

In line 6, page 17, strike the letter "(B)" and substitute the letter "(A)".

In line 11, page 17, strike the letter "(C)" and substitute the letter "(B)".

In line 22, page 21, strike the number "(3)" and substitute the number "(2)".

In line 4, page 70, strike the phrase "(without regard to section 507(b)(2)".

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I wish to speak in support of the work of private foundations on behalf of this amendment which was originally offered by me and Senators CURTIS, HOLLINGS, PERCY, and now has several additional cosponsors—Senators BAYH, BROOKE, CASE, COTTON, GOODELL, HARRIS, HATFIELD, HUGHES, INOUYE, JACKSON, JAVITS, MCCARTHY, MCGOVERN, MCINTYRE, MOSS, NELSON, PROXMIRE, RANDOLPH, SPARKMAN, and TYDINGS.

Mr. President, in addition to that, I inadvertently omitted the name of the Presiding Officer now in the chair, the distinguished Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON).

The amendment would eliminate that provision of H.R. 13270 which would lift the privilege of tax exemption from privately endowed, nonoperating philanthropic foundations at the end of 40 years.

Section 507(b)(2) was added to the bill passed by the House by the Finance Committee after the defeat of two proposals providing for a shorter life span for foundations. It was neither debated nor considered in the House. It has not as yet had the benefit of extensive comment or criticism by the public or by the Senate.

To single out a particular class of institutions and levy against it an effective sentence of death when it reaches age 40 is not a minor action. In my view the proposal merits the utmost scrutiny precisely because it is selective and inevitably discriminatory. At the same time, it breaches the honored and historic principle of tax exemption for charitable work.

As I understand it, those who urge the Congress to limit the life of foundations have rested their case on four interrelated arguments.

First, existing tax law, by conveying the privilege of tax exemption to private charitable trusts without term, inflicts positive harm on present and future generations. It does so because it sustains the charitable interests, objectives, and priorities of earlier eras, whether or not they are currently relevant or productive. There is, in brief, cause for alarm and opposition to "dead hand" rule.

Second, since these historic private trusts exist only at the sufferance of society for the exclusive purpose of carrying out public objectives, their resources should, in due course, be publicly taxed or disposed of pursuant to legislative mandate, which is inherently more accountable and responsive to the will of the general public. Abuses of the public trust by some foundations demonstrate the need for eventual control by the public, itself.

Third, since tax benefits are granted for contributions to foundations on the condition that they will be used for specified purposes, the funds themselves should actually be so used, rather than merely the income earned on them.

Fourth, the tax laws have fostered the creation of large, permanent concentrations of power which wield increasing influence on the economic and political life of the Nation.

These charges are serious and merit careful and critical examination at greater length in the interest of broader knowledge and understanding, before this matter is decided. I will devote the remainder of my remarks to that necessary task.

I. IS THE "DEAD HAND" OF THE PAST GUIDING THE CONTEMPORARY OPERATIONS OF FOUNDATIONS?

My esteemed friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) eloquently stated his personal concern and the dangers of "dead hand" rule in his floor speech of October 9, as follows:

> The private foundation . . . freezes the notion of the donor as to charitable interests into society forever. If the charter is specific, however obtuse, the trustees of the foundation are bound by it. More importantly, since the income of the foundation is tax-exempt, the entire Nation is bound to follow and to contribute to the wishes of its donor. Thus a dead donor's wishes will be carried out at the expense of each succeeding generation, even though a new order of public priorities and changed conditions would have rendered the specific charitable purpose obsolete.
> Should the dead control the living for all time to come through the selection of charitable purposes that may, or even may not, have served the public weal at the time the foundation is created?

Clearly, this question is most appropriate. But is the suggestion that the dead control the living a proven claim? Answers to at least two additional questions are needed to inform our judgment about its validity.

First. Does American law reinforce both the spirit and the very letter of the intent of original donors if its current vitality is challenged?

Second. How relevant and contemporary are the actions of the older foundations?

FOUNDATION CHARTERS AND THE LAW

Despite the anxiety of the foundations' critics, the weight of available evidence suggests, overwhelmingly in my view, that the vast majority of foundations—just like universities, hospitals, and other perpetual, nonprofit institutions—are run by vital, modern, responsive, living, continuously changing trustees, who reflect the guiding interests of the founding donors only to the extent that they were truly visionary or wise enough to foster evolution in the foundations' activities and purposes.

Of the 6,800 foundations which controlled 98.5 percent of total foundation assets in 1967, 5,300, with 91 percent of the assets, were operating under broad general charters. In the larger foundations especially, the charitable purposes outlined in the charter or deed of gift are so broad as to give the trustees in succeeding years almost complete discretion over how the funds should be employed in the public interest. And virtually all charters for new foundations are drawn to conform, word for word, with the broad charitable purposes qualifying a corporation for tax-exemption status which are contained in the Internal Revenue Code.

Moreover, it is not true that wealth accumulated in the past can be preserved intact for specified purposes which become obsolete or inconsistent with public policy. This is because, first, the group of objectives and purposes qualifying as charity—and for tax exemption—has continuously evolved, and was restated in tax regulations as recently as June 1959. Second, American common law, which is uncommonly stable with respect to charitable trusts and corporations, has historically provided ample legal recourse for modification of the intent of the original donor to changing conditions and policies, and evolving definitions of activity qualifying as charity.

Everyday observation corroborates this view. A mere listing of the largest private foundations which have been in existence for 40 years makes immediately clear how many distinguished, patently modern institutions would be eliminated had the pending legislation been traditional American law. I ask unanimous consent that such a list be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RECORD OF PERFORMANCE OF OLDER FOUNDATIONS

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, more specifically, there is readily available evidence to suggest that the grantmaking decisions of these older foundations in their later years are at least as fruitful, contemporary, progressive, and important as those of younger philanthropies. Let me offer some vivid illustrations of the argument that vital life for foundations, no less than for people, continues at or after 40:

If the Rockefeller Foundation had been forced out of business in 1952 after 40 years of life, it would never have carried out the great work in the fantastic improvement of wheat and rice yields, which developed out of its pre-1952 experience. Without this "green revolution," as it has come to be called, many millions of people would now be suffering from malnutrition or dying of starvation.

If Carnegie Corp. had shut its doors in 1951, on turning 40, its accumulated experience in the field of education would not have been brought to bear on the vast expansion of educational needs of the past two decades. Notable among its activities has been the extensive investment in preschool education, and its current support of the widely acclaimed children's television workshop.

If Commonwealth Fund had ceased activity at 40 in 1958, its endeavors of the past decade in the strengthening of medical education, which grew out of its pre-1958 experience, would never have taken place. And so we would have been denied its pioneering work in new careers in medicine, and in encouraging related revisions in educational curriculum and professional requirements.

It was only after the Danforth Foundation reached 40 in 1967, that it made the largest single grant in its history, in the amount of $5,000,000, to strengthen the faculties of predominantly Negro colleges in the South.

Thus, I would argue that available information and American legal tradition offer insufficient basis for alarm that the "dead hand" of earlier times is influencing the response of private philanthropy to current times. Therefore, it seems to me that "dead hand" is not a persuasive rationale for the proposed "40 year" death sentence.

II. DOES THE EVIDENCE OF ABUSE BY SOME FOUNDATIONS JUSTIFY THE ASSUMPTION BY GOVERNMENT OF COMPLETE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE PUBLIC WELFARE BY ULTIMATELY TAXING OR FORCING THE COMPLETE DISTRIBUTION OF THE ASSETS OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS?

Sponsors of a curb on the life of foundations believe that the endowed resources which enable philanthropies to make grants are really public, not private resources, since, in the absence of a special concession of tax exemption, they would originally have been commanded as governmental taxes upon the death of the donor. The distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) also stated this view succinctly in his October 9 speech:

> When a wealthy donor reduces his tax liability through his gift, he is, in practical effect, being allowed to prescribe the use of public funds that would otherwise be paid in taxes.

Two arguments have been advanced to buttress this contention:

First, that the record discloses that some foundations have frequently offered substantial and private, essentially selfish, benefits as well as fulfilling public purposes. And, occasionally, no significant public purposes have been served at all.

Second, however good the performance of private foundations has been on balance, there is insufficient public accountability and the Government, with all its frailties, should ultimately make the decision concerning the allocation of these assets.

I, for one, do not find either of these arguments compelling. Even if one concedes them for the purposes of debate, however, neither provides justification for a 40-year death sentence. If foundations provide merely, or largely, a mechanism for private benefit, or if we truly prefer a unitary society with government responsible for all our public decisions, then philanthropy should be ended now rather than given a 40-year-delayed sentence of death. If the record suggests, as I believe it does, that there are responsible and irresponsible, genuine and fraudulent, fruitful and vacuous philanthropies, then the proper approach is surely not to kill them all off indiscriminately, but to tailor the law to end abuses without sacrificing benefits.

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF AMERICAN PHILANTHROPY

I believe that the historic record of American private philanthropy is clearly affirmative. We may be only dimly aware now of the good which philanthropy has done, but I am sure we would feel a sharp, extensive loss if it were no longer at work in our society, addressing our hardest problems, or helping, in part, to foster our highest aspirations.

It is worth recalling the highlights and the range of the impressive contribution made by foundations to the quality of contemporary life:

They have helped establish modern public health institutions and practices and have played a major part in the prevention of hookworm, malaria, yellow fever, and other endemic diseases, not only in the United States but throughout the world.

They called initial attention to the need for reform in medical education and have followed through by assisting in the development of the finest medical schools and medical research centers in the world. Foundation funds aided in the discovery of insulin, penicillin, and polio vaccines, and are providing continuing support for work on such diseases as cancer, heart disease, and arthritis.

They helped advance scientific agriculture. Beginning with demonstration farms to introduce better farming practices, they have subsequently financed work in plant genetics, plant pathology, and other sciences that have vastly increased crop yields. Foundations are also supporting agricultural research and extension in many of the world's less-developed countries, where farming is the main source of income.

Long before governments took official notice of the world population crisis, foundations began laying the groundwork for scientific and policy efforts toward birth control and are now a major source of support for domestic and worldwide biological and demographic research and for action programs aimed at regulating population growth.

In education, they have contributed broadly at all levels, from prekindergarten to postdoctoral study. In the early part of the century, they encouraged the establishment and expansion of elementary schools for children of all races, particularly in the rural South, and helped the Nation achieve a system of universal secondary education.

They have strengthened the professional education of teachers, the development of educational testing, and research in child development and educational psychology.

In higher education, foundations have helped develop centers of excellence in all regions of the country. And to strengthen college teaching as a career, they began a system of faculty pensions, have assisted in the raising of salaries, and are financing thousands of graduate fellowships for prospective teachers.

In the post-World War II readjustment of the educational system to a period of exploding knowledge and soaring enrollments, foundations have helped carry out improvements in the recruitment and education of school and college faculty. They have helped improve the use of teachers' time and talent, particularly through the adoption of such modern techniques as instructional television and team teaching.

Individual student opportunity has long been a foundation goal. Foundations have expanded opportunities for the intellectually gifted to make the most of their talents and for those from deprived families to surmount motivational and cultural handicaps that limit their ability.

Besides their efforts to improve the quality of the educational system, foundations have devoted large funds to fellowships and the advancement of knowledge. Individual scholars, university departments, and research agencies have received grants and fellowships for research and training in all branches of learning—not only in the medical and biological sciences, but also in the physical and mathematical sciences, the social and behavioral sciences, the humanities, and such professional fields as law, business management, and engineering.

In addition to providing funds to strengthen university departments and schools, foundations support the work of such national organizations as the Social Science Research Council, the National Merit Scholarship Corp., the Population Council, the Center for Advanced Study in the Behaviorial Sciences, the American Council of Learned Societies, the National Bureau of Economic Research, Resources for the Future, and the Brookings Institution.

In the cultural field, foundations have contributed vastly to the growth of libraries and library science. Artistic institutions and groups—fine arts, museums, symphony orchestras, theater, and opera companies—have also benefited from foundation support, as have many individual artists. Education in the arts has been aided, both at the professional level and as an aspect of general education.

Foundations have long been engaged in furthering adult education and in supporting programs to enable citizens to extend their knowledge of public affairs, including international relations.

Noncommercial television has developed as a new cultural resource, largely through foundation support.

In social welfare, foundations have made a special impact by stressing ways to prevent social breakdown rather than merely alleviating its consequences. Through social research, social work education, and experiments to test out new ideas and approaches, they have helped public and private agencies to deal more effectively with the acute human problems of deprived urban and rural areas. Much recent State and National legislation concerned with delinquency, job training and counseling, and the attack of poverty at its source has taken account of foundation-supported experiments. Another area of social action spurred by foundation funds is the search for better ways to meet the needs of the Nation's growing number of older citizens.

Foundations have pioneered in the advancement of legal rights for both the indigent and the consumer.

They have assisted major national and local civil-rights organizations and sympathetic religious, business, labor, and community groups in the effort to enable racial minorities to acquire social and economic opportunity and dignity in the mainstream of American life.

Finally, foundations have extended the American philanthropic tradition to other countries by helping their peoples develop the knowledge and skills to combat sickness, hunger and ignorance. They are assisting the world's poorer countries in agriculture, medicine, health, public administration, technical training, family planning, and training in economics, business, and law. At the same time, particularly through grants to American colleges and universities for area studies of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, foundations are helping the United States obtain the knowledge of world affairs essential to its own international responsibilities.

During the year 1968 alone, private foundations contributed about $1.5 billion for support of the Nation's educational institutions, hospitals, poverty programs, cultural activities, and medical and agricultural research.

But, if the overall historic achievement of foundations is clearly fruitful and public spirited, it remains true that the world of philanthropy is not a monolith. Flagrant abuses of the privilege of tax exemption, largely financial but occasionally also nepotistic in character, have been ascribed to a small group of foundations. These abuses have been amply documented by investigations by the Treasury over the last several years, in hearings carried out earlier by the House Banking and Currency Committee, and in the current inquiries of the Finance and Ways and Means Committee.

THE REFORM PROVISIONS OF THE PRESENT LEGISLATION

The legislation before us contains several desirable measures, carefully designed to eliminate the possibility that charitable trusts will, in the future, serve merely as tax shelters, and to reduce further the possibility that the public benefits of institutional giving will be offset by selfish, personal, or essentially private gains.

The bill requires private foundations to promptly distribute for charitable purposes all current income. To cover cases where yield is modest, the bill requires that the minimum annual distribution amount to at least 5 percent of assets. Under current law, foundations are merely required to distribute income, and since investments need not yield income, some private foundations enjoying the privilege of tax exemption make no annual contribution for public charitable purposes.

In addition, the bill flatly prohibits financial "self-dealing" between charitable trusts and donors, managers, or government officials. This provision covers such matters as loans, payment of compensation, preferential availability of services, substantial purchases or sales, and substantial diversions of income or corpus to—or from—creators and substantial donors and their families and controlled corporations. In contrast, present law against financial self-dealing has relied upon subjective tests for abuse, and has proven difficult to enforce and ineffectual in sanction.

The pending legislation also limits to 20 percent the amount of voting stock in a private corporation which may be owned in combination by a foundation, its financial donors or sponsors, and its management. Corresponding limitations apply to partnerships and other entities. A private foundation is not permitted to own a sole proprietorship. Present law does not deal directly with the subject of foundation ownership of business interests. Perhaps because of this, the use of foundations to maintain control of businesses, particularly small family corporations, appears to be increasing.

I have already contended that available information on the character of the charters of foundations; on the safeguards afforded by legal tradition and practice against sustaining outdated purposes; and on the impressive record of fruitful public action by the Nation's oldest foundations in their maturity; all tend to refute the view that "dead hand" rule distorts philanthropy's response to contemporary public needs.

But at least as important, the legislation before us contains provisions to narrow further and hopefully eliminate completely any prospect that tangible private benefits will continue to flow from tax privileges afforded by commitments of wealth to public trust.

Unlike the 40-year provision, these provisions are targeted against abuse.

Unlike the 40-year provision, they result from extended factfinding, inquiry and opportunity for public scrutiny, criticism and comment.

Unlike the 40-year provision, they do not disturb or damage the work of responsible, fruitful foundations, operating for the public benefit and in its interest.

In short, Mr. President, both the spirit and the letter of the 40-year "death sentence" are wholly inconsistent with the reform features of the bill. Genuine abuses should be promptly corrected, and this legislation has the provisions I have just described to achieve that objective. But the "40-year" rule does nothing to correct abuses; worse, it destroys the institution long after the new law should have produced reform and enhanced performance.

Even though the new law should root out foundation abuses that do exist, some would, apparently, still add the 40-year "death sentence" provision on the ground that privately endowed and managed foundations are inherently less accountable and responsive to the public will than is government itself.

This view overlooks the increased accountability to the general public which the present legislation will require, both through enhanced Internal Revenue oversight of foundations and stronger requirements for full public disclosure of their activities by philanthropies. When it is stripped to its bare essentials, however, this argument amounts to a deep philosophical and ideological preference for a system exclusively governmental, and public. It rejects the competition, and the checks, balances and freedom of our pluralistic system of private and governmental initiatives to realize the general welfare.

It also asserts for government an omniscience, clairvoyance, responsiveness, and reputation for steady, just and effective performance that is not supportable by the record of government in this or any other society, and especially in those societies which have relied exclusively or predominantly upon government. Moreover, in principle and potential, if not in current application, this argument is infinitely extendable against all other private or voluntaristic institutions which stand independent of government but which depend, in some measure, on government encouragement of their existence. I refer here, of course, to the potential threat to all educational, medical, and social welfare institutions, unions, trade associations, and other organizations encouraged, at least in part, by exemption from public taxation.

Along with others moved by the amount of public work to be done in this country, I have consistently fought for a stronger, better financed public sector, especially in domestic affairs. But I have never seen this goal as a substitute for the energy and concerned interest of individuals, acting alone or through private organizations, in contributing to the general welfare. Our whole history warns against exclusive reliance on either government or the private sector, and affirms the wisdom of maintaining diversity, pluralism, and coexisting, mixed forms of organization to accomplish the Nation's public work.

By immediately demoralizing and eventually killing off the private nonoperating foundations that now exist, and by chilling—through stiffer tax treatment of gifts of appreciated property—the formation of new foundations, the proposed "40 year" rule, perhaps unintentionally, encourages bigger, more pervasive, and inevitably less balanced government. I cannot believe that such a development is either wanted by, or in the interest of the American people in this era of rapid change and wide diversity of opinion and perspective throughout the Nation.

III. SHOULD THE CORPUS OF A FOUNDATION EVENTUALLY BE USED FOR ITS TAX-DEDUCTIBLE PURPOSES, RATHER THAN ONLY THE INCOME ON THE FUNDS CONTRIBUTED?

The affirmative case for ultimately disbursing all foundation assets was set forth as follows in the Finance Committee report on the pending legislation:

> Since the income is itself exempt from taxation in the hands of the foundation, the expenditure of the income only satisfies the obligations associated with the income tax exemption of the foundation and not the obligations associated with the charitable contribution deduction for what is the capital, or corpus, of the foundation.

I find this argument somewhat shortsighted. I see no reason to separate investment assets from the income they yield. The income flows to charity only so long as the assets remain in existence. Distribution of the assets will immediately reduce and ultimately eliminate the flow of income to charity. This would have the same practical effect as levying a tax on income. Both come at the expense of the charitable purposes for which the funds were originally contributed.

It is, in addition, worth emphasizing that the common historic practice of the large general purpose foundations has been that at least 5 percent of assets be annually distributed to charity. This is to become a statutory requirement under the pending legislation. In effect, this guarantees that society will receive the full value of the tax exemption, over time, if the assets are not drawn down through forced distribution or annual invasion by taxation.

IV. DO FOUNDATIONS COMPRISE LARGE AND GROWING CONCENTRATIONS OF POWER, WITH UNDESIRABLE INFLUENCE IN THE POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC LIFE OF THE COUNTRY?

The report of the Senate Finance Committee stated the problem as follows:

> If foundations have a permanent tax-exempt life, their economic power may increase to such an extent that they have an undue influence both on the private economy and on governmental decisions.

Available information, however, does not in my judgment support this concern. Foundations command assets valued most recently at $21 billion, or about seven-tenths of 1 percent of the Nation's total wealth. While these assets have slowly increased in absolute terms in recent years, they have decreased in relation to the Nation's wealth. and are proportionately smaller in relation to GNP today than they were 10 years ago. Moreover, the bill's requirement that foundations spend all of their income will inhibit the further accumulation of wealth by any foundation.

In contrast to public welfare expenditures by all levels of American government amounting to nearly $300 billion annually, foundations expended a mere $1.5 billion in 1968. This effort is placed in further perspective by individual charitable contributions amounting to $12.1 billion during the same year.

Finally, while it is true that about 370 of the estimated 22,000 private foundations hold about two-thirds of the assets of all foundations, and account for more than half of the total amount of grants, their relative predominance within the world of organized philanthropy has declined steadily in the face of formation of numerous, new, smaller foundations. Objective observers have also confirmed that these larger, general purpose philanthropies are highly autonomous and independent of each other in their individual decisions and judgments. Further, they are rarely associated closely with a particular family, company or community. As noted previously, even where such close association exists, the bill's prohibitions against self-dealing should allay any fears.

Available information tends to suggest, in short, that the economic influence of foundations is very modest and growing steadily smaller in relative terms, and that the world of foundation philanthropy is growing steadily more diverse and pluralistic. To me, the information suggests that if the private foundation is, overall, a desirable and beneficial form of organization, then it should be encouraged in our society. If so, we should probably turn our attention away from its destruction and toward ways of helping it to maintain and, perhaps, even increase its modest, but vital contribution. In any case, there is no evidence to support the allegation that growing wealth or centralized bigness of foundations imperils either our economic or political life.

I hope I have demonstrated that the arguments in support of the bill's provision are either contradicted by the factual information that is available, or rest upon philosophical predilections which are at variance with the mainstream lessons of American experience and history:

As a matter of fact, foundations are not controlled by the "dead hand" of the past, and as a matter of law, need never be bound by outdated trust instruments.

There is widespread agreement that foundations do important public work, and there is no evidence that existing, mature foundations are less fruitful than recent additions to the field, or become strikingly unfruitful as they approach or pass the age of 40.

Foundations are growing less, not more significant in economic terms, and less concentrated and more diverse in numbers.

While an apparently small number of foundations are guilty of seeking selfish, private gain under the protective shield of public trust, the legislation before us contains promising reform provisions tailored to end these abuses.

Adding a death sentence is totally inconsistent with the reformist character of the rest of the legislation. It is aimed at no describable abuse, and will curb valuable foundation work no less than it impinges upon less vital or even improver activity. For these reasons, it has been steadily opposed as an appropriate corrective approach by the Treasury, by the House Ways and Means Committee, and by the independent, nongovernmental Peterson "Commission on Foundations."

As Assistant Treasury Secretary Cohen has recently testified, the 40-year provision would saddle foundations with growing difficulties in recruiting and retaining staff, as well as increasing problems of discipline and control when the hard problems of repsonsible institutional dissolution are tackled in later years.

It will have the effect not merely of killing off existing philanthropy and its contribution to the diversity and variety of public-spirited initiatives in American life, but in addition, together with other provisions of the bill, will combine to chill or choke off the creation of new foundations. It also will have the effect, perhaps not foreseen, of accentuating the influence of government, and society's dependence on public institutions for all public energy and initiative. It thus runs against the currents of voluntarism, of pluralism and private initiative which most of us have seen as indispensable and beneficial aspects of the American experience.

Mr. President, I believe I have shown that the "40 year" death sentence for foundations is an arbitrary, discriminatory, and harmful proposal, supported neither by the careful objective study which the subject merits, nor justified by a focused, documented abuse which it seeks to eliminate or prevent.

This proposal attacks a class of institutions simply because they have served long enough to register actuarially as middle-aged. I doubt that very many of us would want to see this rationale extended very widely.

It would be premature and thus ill advised to approve this far-reaching provision now, before the corrective, reformist remedies in this bill are enacted and applied. Certainly we should wait until current, complete, and more penetrating information about the activity and performance of foundations, which is required by the bill's disclosure requirements, is available to us.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support amendment No. 331 and eliminate section 507(b)(2) from the legislation now before us.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, how long is forever?

Under present law, a private foundation created for purposes chosen by its creator is given tax exemption forever.

There has been such a proliferation of private, so-called charitable foundations, that the Government itself cannot estimate within thousands the number that exist today.

The Finance Committee has therefore set a limit upon tax exemption in terms of time.

Shall we say that there shall be no limit?

That is what the amendment proposes.

I shall discuss this amendment at greater length on tomorrow, but suffice it to say tonight that the central question is not whether foundations accomplish good, because many of them do, but a great many more, as we have seen, are created for the sole and only purpose of avoiding taxes or perpetuating family ownership of property, or both.

The Govenrment should provide a reasonable limit to the period in which tax exemption should be extended to purely private foundations.

The provision in the committee bill does not apply to public foundations or to operating foundations. It applies to the private foundation.

I trust, upon consideration, that the Senate will support the Finance Committee.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I do not intend nor, as I understand it, does the Senator from Tennessee, to engage in debate on this issue tonight.

In the remarks I have submitted for the RECORD, I commented on the response to points raised by the Senator from Tennessee. I would ask that those reading the RECORD would refer to them with respect thereto.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, when John D. Rockefeller III, appeared before the Finance Committee, I asked him this question:

> Mr. Rockefeller, would you agree with me that if one is to have immortality he must earn immortality?

The answer of Mr. Rockefeller to that question was, "Yes."

He agreed with that.

I do not know whether he had in mind what I had in mind, but what I was thinking of was that there are, I am happy to say, many foundations—perhaps an overwhelming majority—which were created for a worthy purpose and have served a worthy purpose. But I think that an investigation will show, and it is my belief that it is our duty that we have enough investigation to show, that there are a great number of foundations—I do not say a great percentage, but there are many foundations—that have been set up for the sole purpose of tax avoidance which have done little good.

The thought of the Senator from Louisiana is that if a foundation is doing good, if it has justified its existence, if it has justified the tax-exempt status that we have given it under the law, as far as I am concerned, if the Senator from Louisiana were to be around here 50 or 40 years from now—and I will not be; it would be a merciful Lord that would permit the Senator from Louisiana to live that long, but if the Senator from Louisiana should still be alive on this planet in the year 2009—he would anticipate that, if the Senate in its judgment prevails, by that time laws would have been passed to extend the life of those foundations which did the kind of things of which society could approve and that justified the tax advantage we had given them. Also the provision would have denied that right to those foundations which had not well served the public.

It would seem to the Senator from Louisiana that if someone had been taking advantage of something Congress had done for him in the way of charity or education for the purpose of doing good work, and that advantage had been used for his own selfish advantage, as a mere means of tax avoidance, we would know after 40 years time whether it had done good work. So if it had done good work, if its existence had been worthy, then we would continue to permit it to continue its good work. But if we found it had done nothing more than to avoid taxes, put relatives on the payroll, run up high overhead costs—and while stating a noble purpose, spent nothing to achieve it—then it seems to the Senator from Louisiana that its assets should be disposed of, or that it should be taxed just as manufacturing companies and others are taxed on their investments and activities for private gain, even though in many instances they benefit society in doing so.

That was the philosophy of the committee in voting for the 40-year life. I do not expect to be here to vote either for or against a continuation of that life, but I think people who have these foundations should know that it is not their money, that it is there for the benefit of society, that it is no longer theirs to dip into, to trade off, to obtain directorships on boards, to put Uncle John on somebody's corporate payroll, and things of that sort. They should know that the money is to be used for the benefit of society, and if they want to have immortality, they are going to have to do some good with their money sometime during the next 40 years.

I think the Senate committee was most considerate of these foundations. In general terms, I was fully expecting that by the time we voted the bill, we would be fully condemned because, whereas the House had imposed a 7½ percent tax on the income of foundations, we put no more than a tax of one-fifth of 1 percent on the assets, to be used merely for auditing their reports as to what they were doing. I understand an amendment will be offered to cut it down to one-tenth of 1 percent.

It is fine to reduce taxes on those doing good work with their money, but I am constrained to believe that they ought to be made to do good work if they want these advantages and that they ought to be accountable.

If they cannot, after 40 years, show that they have done something that ought to be continued, then it seems to me they should turn that money over to public charitable organizations or, if they do not see fit to keep the money then they ought to pay taxes as an ordinary corporation does.

It seems to me something more than what we have done should be done, aside from this, to be sure that those foundations do good work. We ought to take a look at them from time to time. That we are going to do, anyway.

Whether this amendment to put a 40-year life on foundations prevails in this Congress or not, I have no doubt that the thought envisaged—that when one goes into the charity business he ought to be required to be in the charity business, and not be in the self-aggrandizement business—will prevail eventually. If not in this Congress, it will eventually prevail.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to call the Senate's attention to a questionable use of tax-exempt funds presently underway. According to press reports, two or three private foundations are picking up the tab for the White House Conference on Hunger at this time.

I am not saying that the White House Conference on Hunger is not a worthy one. Indeed, I think it has a very worthy purpose. But if it be a very worthy purpose, why should it not be financed with the contingency funds provided by the Congress for the White House for such purposes?

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. In just a moment.

I raise a point as to the relative value of the use of public funds for a public purpose, or private foundation funds for a public purpose. And there is the further question of the relationship between the Government and a private foundation.

What real alternative did the private foundations have when the President asked the private foundations that put up the money for the White House conference on hunger?

It raises questions. I do not raise them to be critical of the conference or of the foundations for supplying the funds. I call attention to the questionable relationship between the Government and private foundations that arises out of this situation. I am not trying to be critical of the President in this respect in any way whatsoever. I am trying to make my point, however. Suppose the U.S. Senate passed a resolution calling upon three or four, or a half a dozen, private foundations to provide a recreation area for the Senate. What would be the difference? I dare say they might do it.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. In one moment.

The Government is not perfect, but the Government is the agent of society; and there are many good and worthy things that the Government itself could accomplish with the vast funds available to private foundations. Indeed, if the Government had had the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation, it might just have found a cure for cancer.

So I recognize, and am willing to recognize, that foundations do many good things.

But I daresay if there were a fair and full investigation, we would find that for every good and worthy foundation, there are many, many devoted to tax avoidance, to conferring benefits upon family members, or to perpetuating family control of property.

The Ford Foundation is cited as a wonderful example. Was it created for an eleemosynary purpose? The Ford Foundation has vast stockholdings in Ford Motor Co., but it does not have any votes in the operation of the Ford Motor Co. The placing of the stock of the Ford Motor Co. in the Ford Foundation was for the purpose of preserving control of one of this country's vast industrial empires in the descendants of the Ford family, forever.

Mr. President, there ought to be a limit to the time that the dead hand can rule the living. Who can foresee, with his finite mind, conditions of 40 years from now, 100 years from now, or forever? I say that the Senate ought to do something. Maybe this 40-year time limit is not the proper one. Shall we make it 140? or 25? or maybe 200? Just what should it be? Oh, no; now it is perpetuity, and that is a right indefinite period.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has raised the issue of the hunger conference. I just came from there, and I was struck by the number of corporation presidents, processors, business representatives, trade association executive secretaries, and corporate representatives who served as delegates at that convention, and, on the other hand, the small number of poor people who might have some knowledge of hunger.

It occurred to me that the representatives of these great food corporations, processors, chains, and the rest of them will deduct every penny of that expense on their corporate tax returns because, without any interference, this is permitted them as a business operation. If it was possible for a few poor people to be present at that conference, in order to speak up for those who are hungry, and it was made possible because of a modest contribution by charitable foundations, at the request of the President, I commend the President for making it possible for them to be there. My only objection is, I wish there were more of them.

As to the question of perpetuity, this is a common legal fact in most jurisdictions.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONDALE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. I know the Senator did not understand me to say that the White House Conference on Hunger was an unworthy purpose, or that poor people should not be there.

Mr. MONDALE. Oh, by no means.

Mr. GORE. But if it is a worthy purpose, if the public good is to be served, why should we depend upon private foundations to finance it?

Mr. MONDALE. It does not seem to me to be quite fair to say to the great private financial and commercial interests of this country, "You make whatever decisions you want in the private market of this kind, and deduct their cost from your income taxes without any review," but to say to the poor, "You come to the U.S. Congress and get yourself an authorization and an appropriation in order to provide funds for this purpose."

This is not, however, in my opinion, the controlling issue that bears on the matter. No one is here arguing that reforms are not needed. Indeed, the Senate bill does include several reforms dealing with some of the issues that have already been raised. The point that I make and my cosponsors make here is that this amendment is a death sentence amendment that applies to all the foundations, good and bad, whatever the details, and will have the effect of destroying one of the most creative independent, and unique sources of community change, research, and reform existent in any society in the world.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONDALE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. The bill provides no death sentence for anybody or anything, except tax exemption.

Mr. MONDALE. Which is the death sentence.

Mr. GORE. Well, it might not be. Some of the foundations have so much corporate stock that they could operate a very long time and pay taxes.

It seems to me that instead of being viewed as a death sentence, this 40-year limit on tax exemption should be considered as a sufficient period during which a foundation could justify its existence as truly a public operating foundation, with a public service purpose. I think we could safely rely upon our successors to provide a formula through which the good could then emerge.

As of now, foundations are proliferating at a rapid rate. Almost every time a man becomes a millionaire, he starts looking for a good lawyer to set himself up, to create "my foundation" to avoid taxes and confer benefits on his family.

There ought to be a limit to this; or else pretty soon the man or woman working for a wage or salary will bear practically all the tax burden in this country.

Mr. MONDALE. Once again, it is the objective of this amendment, proposed by myself and several others, not to pass judgment on some of the reforms that might be needed, but to eliminate from the tax bill an indiscriminate measure that would destroy all nonoperating foundations and would single out private charitable foundations from practically every other kind of legal institution for this death sentence.

If we are concerned about perpetuity let us pass a 40-year law applying to everything, to the hospitals, the colleges the learned societies, the museums, the orphanages, and the many other such tax-exempt institutions that exist in perpetuity. Let us do the same for the private corporations. Forty-three of the 50 States of the Union grant corporate charters which are, by their nature and bylaws, perpetual; and forever, as the Senator from Tennessee states, is a long time.

If it is bad for the private foundations, if it is bad for the Ford Foundation, it ought to be bad for every other kind of institution, because in each of these areas we have difficulties, problems, complaints, and abuses, and if we do not deal with those complaints and abuses about one group of institutions specifically, but simply take a gun and shoot them through the head because there are some problems with reference to those legal institutions, then——

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONDALE. Just one moment. Perhaps we will have established a new approach to social reform.

Permit me to say one thing further about the 40-year rule.

Mr. GORE. I wish the Senator would permit me to make a comment.

Mr. MONDALE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator used the term "shoot them through the head." I hope the Senator will not persist in using prejudicial language such as that. He has also called it a "death sentence."

Mr. MONDALE. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Let us look at the practical effect. Suppose the Ford Foundation should choose to operate as a taxable corporation instead of as a tax-exempt foundation. Here is what the tax consequence would be: On a $100 dividend from Ford Motor Co. to Ford Foundation, the foundation, as a corporation, would first have an 85 percent dividends received deduction which applies to all intercorporate distributions of dividends. That would leave $15 of the $100 on which the Ford Foundation, as a corporation, would have to pay taxes; and at the present corporate rate of 48 percent, they would owe the great sum of $7.20 out of $100. That is not even as high as the interest rates, under this administrtaion. So this rule is not a death sentence. This is not shooting any worthy foundation through the head. This is trying to put some reasonable limit upon tax exemption. If 40 years is not reasonable, what is?

I thank the Senator for yielding. I had better leave the floor or else we will be debating all night.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for this brief colloquy. Let me give a few examples before we retire for the evening. I have a committee meeting at 8 o'clock. Let us suppose that the 40-year death sentence had been invoked——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I object again. If we are to continue this debate in terms of death sentences and shooting through the head, I will put in a quorum call and we will have it all night. This is not a death sentence, and it is not shooting anyone through the head.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, the Senator can do whatever he wants. That would effectively end nonoperating foundations within 40 years. The Senator can use whatever appelation he pleases. Suppose this provision had passed many years ago and become the law of the land. The Rockefeller Foundation would have been forced out of business in 1952 after 40 years of life. It would never have carried out its great work in the fantastic improvement of wheat and rice yields, which developed out of its pre-1952 experience. Without this "green revolution," as it has come to be called, many millions of people would now be suffering from malnutrition or dying of starvation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONDALE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand this matter, the so-called death sentence the Senator is talking about, does not require the foundation to go out of existence, but rather taxes the foundation like any other corporation.

As the Senator was pointing out, assuming that most of the assets of the Ford Foundation consisted of stock in the Ford Motor Co., the income to the foundation would be dividends from the Ford Motor Co., and they would get the 85-percent dividends received deduction. So there would only be 15 cents on the dollar remaining that would be taxable. And at a 50-percent tax rate, that is 7.5 cents. That is the way the House of Representatives arrived at its rate of 7.5 percent on foundations.

So it is really far from a death sentence.

All we said was that in 40 years they would get what the House of Representatives voted in the first place.

However, I am not necessarily in favor of requiring that it work in that way.

If one can show that he is doing all the kind of good work that some foundations are doing, I would be in favor of continuing it beyond 40 years. However, I think we ought to take a look at them some of these days to see whether they are doing good work.

It would be better, it seems to me, to have it that way than the way it is now. And certainly it would be better than the way it has been where people have put this money aside for their personal benefit with the idea that the gift to charity was to be deductible. When a person owed an inheritance tax, he owed the Government 77 percent. So, he gave the money—instead of to charity—to the foundation.

Assuming that the foundation is giving some of the earnings to charity—and we would make them give some of the earnings to charity—eventually charity ought to get the gift itself and not just what the gift earns.

Even that is not required by the bill. It is only required that they lose their tax-exempt status after 40 years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD what the committee report says about this matter.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A. TAX TREATMENT OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

(Sec. 101 of the bill and secs. 507 through 509, 4940 through 4948, 6033, 6034, 6104, 6213, 6501, 6511, 6652, 6685, 7422, and 7454 of the code)

1. Limitation on Tax-exempt Life of Foundations (secs. 101(a) and (b) of the bill and secs. 507(b), 508(d)(2), and 4490(b) of the code)

Present law.—The Internal Revenue Code does not at present limit the period of time for which a private foundation or any other exempt organization may continue to be exempt from income tax.

General reasons for change.—Questions have been raised as to whether private foundations should in perpetuity be exempt from income tax, and forever eligible to receive deductible charitable contributions. In part, the problem is that if foundations have a permanent tax-exempt life, their economic power may increase to such an extent that they have an undue influence both on the private economy and on governmental decisions. Also, since income, estate, or gift tax deductions were granted for amounts given to these foundations and the basis for these deductions is that these funds would be used for educational, charitable, religious, etc., purposes, questions have been raised as to why, after some period of time, the donated funds themselves should not actually be so used, rather than merely the income from these funds. (Since the income is itself exempt from taxation in the hands of the foundation, the expenditure of the income only satisfies the obligations associated with the income tax exemption of the foundation and not the obligations associated with the charitable contribution deduction for what is the capital, or corpus, of the foundation.)

The committee concluded that, by the end of 40 years, a private foundation if it is to continue to be tax exempt should have been able to derive sufficient public support to become a public charity, or should have created an appropriate operating foundation function for itself, or should have used its assets directly for the charitable purposes for which it was created.

Explanation of provisions.—To deal with the problems described above, the committee adopted an amendment limiting the period of income tax exemption to 40 years in the case of any private foundation (other than an operating foundation). By the end of the 40-year period unless it is to become taxable, the private foundation either must have distributed all its assets to public charities or must itself have become a public charity.

If the foundation neither makes such a distribution nor so converts itself, it is to be subject to regular income taxation, and still is to remain subject to all the limitations and requirements applicable to private foundations.[1] In such a case the foundation would then be taxed as a corporation or as a trust depending on its status under the general tax laws. No new contributions or bequests to the foundation would be eligible for charitable contribution deductions and gift tax deductions would not be allowed.

For existing foundations, the 40-year period is to begin on January 1, 1970. An organization created in the future or becoming a private foundation in the future is to have 40 years from the time it becomes a private foundation. If a private foundation becomes a public charity or an operating foundation at any time in the future, it is not required to cease operating as an exempt organization at the end of 40 years. However, the 40 years need not be consecutive, but will include all periods after December 31, 1969, during which the organization is a private foundation, other than an operating foundation.

[1] If the sum of the audit-fee tax and any taxes on unrelated business income exceed the regular income tax in any year, then the total tax will be the sum of the former taxes instead of the regular income for that year.

If an existing private foundation becomes a public charity in 1970, as described below in Change of Status, this provision is not to apply. In this case if the organization later reverts to private foundation status the 40-year period would begin to run from the time the organization again becomes a private foundation.

In order to prevent avoidance of this limit on the tax-exempt life of nonoperating private foundations the amendment provides that a transfer of assets to another private foundation under a liquidation, merger, etc., as distinguished from a bona fide charitable grant, causes the transferee foundation to be charged with that part of the 40-year period already used by the transferor. Where there is a transfer of the sort that would cause a "tacking on" of part of a 40-year life, the transferee foundation will be treated as acquiring generally the characteristics of the transferor foundation. For example, anyone who was a substantial contributor to the transferor will be treated as a substantial contributor to the transferee. Also, the total tax benefits of the transferor (described below, in Change of Status) is to be treated as tax benefits of the transferee. (Where there are several transferees, the amount of the benefits will be apportioned.)

Effective date.—This provision takes effect on January 1, 1970.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, this has now gone long beyond what we had planned.

Permit me to cite just a few more examples. I have already mentioned what the effect the 40-year horizon would have been on the Rockefeller Foundation.

If Carnegie Corp. had shut down its doors in 1951, on turning 40, its accumulated experience in the field of education should not have been brought to bear on the vast expansion of educational needs of the past two decades. Notable among its activities has been the extensive investment in preschool education, and its current support of the widely acclaimed Children's Television Workshop.

If Commonwealth Fund had ceased activity at 40 in 1958, its endeavors of the past decade in the strengthening of medical education, which grew out of its pre-1958 experience, would never have taken place. And so we would have been denied its pioneering work in "new careers" in medicine, and in encouraging related revisions in educational curriculum and professional requirements.

It was only after the Danforth Foundation reached "40" in 1967, that it made the largest single grant in its history, in the amount of $5 million, to strengthen the facilities of predominantly Negro colleges in the South.

Therefore, I think the record is clear that the Nation would be the poorer if we had no private, nonoperative foundations which were more than 40 years old.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I am glad to support the amendment offered by Senator MONDALE, Senator CURTIS and others, to delete the section of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 placing a 40-year limit on the life of private foundations.

There are sound reasons why such a limitation should not be adopted.

Foundations occupy a unique place in American society. In areas where the Government cannot or should not act, they have the skills and resources to initiate new ideas and to experiment with new and untried ventures. With their ability to act quickly and flexibly, they constitute a powerful instrument for developing and testing solutions to problems important in our society.

Not to be overlooked, too, is their contribution in sustaining and supplementing the educational and civic infrastructure, as it were, of our society. The direct involvement and support by foundations, for example, has played a vital role in the advancement of medical science and the strengthening of public education in this century.

Admittedly, the occasional abuses and mistakes of judgment by some foundations, as well as their innovative activities in the areas of social experimentation have raised questions over whether private philanthropy should continue to be encouraged by granting tax exemption privileges.

The Finance Committee has recommended that these questions be resolved by limiting the life of foundations to 40 years. This rule would, without question, discourage, if not destroy, private philanthropy as it exists today.

The effect on charitable work of limiting the life of all foundations, regardless of size or contribution to society, would be irreparable. Such an arbitrary step is not consistent with the broader effort being made to bring about meaningful reform. Furthermore, it runs counter to the findings of a number of groups, including the Department of the Treasury, who have studied the question and rejected the idea of fixing a time for foundations to go out of business.

By any measure, it is clear that foundations have made substantial contributions to the quality of American life.

In my own State of New Jersey, some 200 national and local foundations are currently helping to meet local and statewide needs, particularly in urban areas. While public attention is often focused on grants made by the large well-known foundations, it is noteworthy that much significant work is being done by small local foundations.

For example, the bulk of grants being made by one New Jersey foundation are directed toward needs in the city of Newark where support is provided for such groups as the Newark Family Service Bureau, the Community Information and Referral Center, the city's YM/YWCA and the Newark Board of Education.

Another New Jersey foundation has specialized in nursing education and has pioneered a number of innovations in providing improved health care. It has established four tuition-free nursing schools, two of them in New Jersey, and has contributed more than $10 million since 1934 to meeting health needs.

Still another New Jersey foundation has expended some $12 million since 1935 in providing specialized services for underprivileged children. The scholarship assistance provided to over 500 children through juvenile court judges throughout the State and the foundation's grants to State institutions are strong arguments for continuing this type of philanthropy and for support of the Mondale-Curtis amendment.

I do not believe it is sound public policy to legislate away private philanthropy in the guise of reform and destroy the vast reservoir of private initiative and skill, perhaps more needed than at any time in recent history. The abuses which have occurred must be corrected, but the institution of foundations should not be destroyed in the process.

I urge the Senate to delete the 40-year provision by supporting this amendment.

PROGRAM

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, at the request of the distinguished majority leader, I wish to remind Senators that immediately following the prayer on tomorrow morning and the disposition of the reading of the Journal, there will be a colloquy on the District of Columbia crime bill, to extend not beyond 30 minutes. That colloquy will be among the following Senators, and perhaps others: Senators MCCLELLAN, TYDINGS, and HRUSKA, and the Chair should recognize one of the three Senators named to lead with the discussion.

Following the colloquy, there is to be a 1-hour debate beginning at 10 o'clock a.m. on the pending Mondale amendment which will automatically become the unfinished business before the Senate at that time. The 1 hour is to be equally divided between the sponsor of the amendment and the manager of the bill, with the vote to occur at 11 a.m.

Following the action on the Mondale amendment, there will be action on the Javits amendment, amendment No. 340.

Following action on the Javits amendment, the Senate will consider the Metcalf amendment, amendment No. 315.

Following action on the Metcalf amendment, the amendment offered by the able chairman of the Finance Committee (Mr. LONG) dealing with the social security increase—which has been temporarily laid aside to accommodate action on the other amendments I have enumerated—will then become the pending business before the Senate.

Moreover, it has been agreed that a rollcall vote will occur at some point, yet to be decided, during the day tomorrow on the amendment offered by the able junior Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) and on which the debate has already occurred.

Finally, I should remind Senators that the majority leader has stated that a Saturday session will be held, with votes to occur on appropriation bills and with further action to be transacted on the tax reform bill.

ADJOURNMENT TO 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 9:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 58 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, December 5, 1969, at 9:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FIGHTING INFLATION: MASS BRIEFINGS ARE NOT ENOUGH; IT IS TIME TO GET TOUGH ON PRICES AND WAGES

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, a look ahead to 1970 indicates that it will be a painful year for the American economy. The battle against inflation is far from won. The administration has limited its attack to tight monetary policy coupled with continuation of the income tax surcharge. This approach is now undergoing its sternest test. The prospects for success are not bright.

The only clear effect of the tight money policy so far has been the most extraordinary rise in interest rates in our Nation's history. These high rates have proven a severe blow to specific segments of the economy—housing and the timber industry, small business, farming.

The darkest predictions made earlier this year for a slump in the housing industry are transpiring. The rate of new starts is down by more than 20 percent from last spring, and still declining.

Beyond high interest rates, we still have rising prices, moving upward at the rate of 5 percent a year. The administration points to a number of economic indicators that it says show that the rate of inflation is slowing down. But the price of food or a new car continues to rise too rapidly. Until this trend reverses, we are experiencing unacceptable inflation. Many economists expect that prices will increase next year at only a slightly reduced rate.

Wages—the companion to prices on the inflationary spiral—are also on the increase. The cost per unit of work in American industry is up more than 7 percent this year compared to 1968. Labor contracts in such major industries as autos and construction expire next year and must be renegotiated. It is safe to assume that the unions involved will press for substantial wage increases.

The only other visible change in the economic picture, in fact, is the growth of unemployment. Now pushing toward a 4-percent level, unemployment will almost certainly go higher next year.

On top of all this, the administration is persistently demanding that the tax surcharge be renewed, calling it a necessary weapon if we are to beat inflation. It wants the surcharge continued at a 5-percent level for the first 6 months of next year. Already there is talk within the administration about the possible need to extend the surcharge even longer.

I have been skeptical about the worth of the surcharge as an anti-inflationary device. I voted against the 10-percent surcharge extension last summer, and I am opposed to the inclusion of the 5-percent surcharge in the tax reform bill.

I was therefore surprised only by the source the other day to read that my skepticism is shared by a top administration economist, Herbert Stein, of the Council of Economic Advisers. At the close of these remarks, I am including a copy of Mr. Stein's comments on the surcharge.

For the reasons I have mentioned, I am concerned that we are headed for deeper economic trouble. Instead of an end to inflation, we may see it continue unabated. Or unemployment may skyrocket and we will drop into a recession. Or worst of all, we may get both at once.

There is not much time left to avoid these very real possibilities. I am urging that the administration introduce a new flexibility into its present inflation policy, relying less completely on tight money. In addition, the administration must get tough with business and labor about price and wage increases. Mass briefings encouraging restraint are not adequate. The situation is urgent enough to give serious consideration to wage and price guidelines.

The economy is at the crossroads. We face rough going in any case. It would be tragic, however, to discover next year that all the months of restriction and sacrifice were in vain.

The following is Herbert Stein's address, mentioned above, given before the Tax Institute of America Symposium at Princeton, N.J.:

TAXES, STABILITY AND GROWTH

(By Herbert Stein)

There is in the government an interagency committee called the Troika, comprising the Treasury, the Bureau of the Budget and the Council of Economic Advisers. A short-hand description of the division of labor among the three agencies is that the Treasury has the taxes, the Budget Bureau has the expenditures and the Council of Economic Advisers has the deficit or, rarely as at present, the surplus. Recognizing this role I am going to talk about the relation between taxes and expenditures, rather than about the specific form of the tax system. That is, I am going to talk about how high taxes should be, especially from the standpoint of the stability and growth of the economy.

About twenty-three years ago I gave a talk on approximately the same subject I am discussing today, at a meeting of the National Tax Association. Probably no one in this audience was present then, and surely no one remembers. So it would be convenient for me to give the speech again. However, I unfortunately cannot. That is not because I have learned so much since then but because I have unlearned so much. I started, I think, with relatively modest ambition for the contribution of tax policy to economic stability and growth, especially to stability. But after two decades it seems to me that even these modest ambitions were excessive and we shall have to settle for an even lower level of folly-avoidance.

At an earlier date we could believe that a policy like the following would put little strain on our political or economic competence. We would set tax rates so that they would yield a constant moderate budget surplus when the economy was operating at high employment. In the event of a serious, confidently-forecast departure from the high-employment condition we would make a temporary change of tax rates—down for recessions and up for inflations.

This policy was believed to have a number of advantages. By keeping the relation between receipts and expenditures constant most of the time we would keep the budget from becoming an unstabilizing force, sometimes pushing in an inflationary direction and sometimes in a deflationary direction. By requiring taxes to be kept in line with expenditures we would enforce a certain discipline on the expenditure decisions. The surplus that would be generated at high employment would contribute to rapid economic growth. Reduction of the government debt would increase the funds available for private investment by those who had held the debt. Moreover, the program would retain as an emergency option the possibility of a temporary change in tax rates to counter a serious recession or inflation. However, these would presumably be required infrequently if at all, and their utility would not depend on a very high degree of success in economic forecasting since they would be reserved for the cases of clear need.

In the course of the years experience has revealed many difficulties in this policy prescription.

Although the policy was intended to minimize the need for changes in tax rates it still would require a change if the rate of growth of expenditures departed significantly from the rate of growth of the yield of the existing tax system. This has proved very difficult to get in a timely fashion and appropriate amount. Given the existing and then expected rates of expenditure, the policy would have called for tax reduction in 1960, but we didn't get that until 1964. The policy would have required in 1966 the tax increase we finally got in 1968.

The problem is not only to get timely tax changes. It is also to avoid untimely tax changes. For example, on any reasonable expectation of what Federal expenditures will be, or of what Congress intends them to be, 1972 and 1973 will not be good years for tax reduction. But we are apparently about to decide on substantial tax reductions for those years.

This difficulty of getting the tax action or inaction the policy calls for is not accidental. Neither is it, I think, the result of rejection by Presidents or Congresses of the idea that there ought to be a fairly stable relation between receipts and expenditures. The simple fact is that Presidents and Congresses have wanted other things more. They have wanted to have their way about spending programs or tax structure or simply to avoid the onus of raising taxes or reap the credit for cutting them. These are not things that politicians are likely to surrender easily.

The policy prescription outlined above placed considerable reliance on the effectiveness of a temporary tax change as a way of restraining or stimulating the economy in the event of serious inflation or recession. However, subsequent analysis suggested that a temporary tax change would have little effect on private spending, by either businesses or households. This view has apparently been confirmed by experience with the temporary tax surcharge enacted in 1968. The rise of business investment which followed the enactment of the surcharge was so big that one can hardly expect to detect any repressive effect of the surcharge on the corporate profits tax. Microscopic analysis may yet discover some effect of the surcharge on consumption. But in any case we are going to have to say that the effect was small and late.

In fact, the final analysis of the 1968 episode may yet reveal that the net effect of the surcharge was inflationary. Evidently the enactment of the surcharge helped to convince the Federal Reserve that mid-1968 was a good time for monetary expansion. The inflationary effect of this outweighed whatever anti-inflationary effect the surcharge had. A similar consideration is relevant to the decision to continue the surcharge for the second half of calendar 1969 and the first half of 1970. There was a danger that the shift in the fiscal position attendant upon the expiration of the surcharge would convince the Federal Reserve of the need for a degree of monetary restriction that would turn out to be excessive. Yet this particular interrelationship between fiscal and monetary policy is surely not a good continuing basis of operation. We should be able to find a more efficient way of reaching a desirable monetary policy than by using massive tax charges as signals.

The earlier version of policy counted on the maintenance of a budget surplus as the government's contribution to the supply of savings and through that to economic growth. But it now appears that the political process abhors a surplus. We may from time to time generate a surplus accidentally and unnoticed. However, the argument that expenditure increases or tax reductions should be held back in order deliberately to create a surplus does not carry much weight. Economists have disabused the public of the idea that a deficit is a sin, an idea on which no one acted very much for a long time anyway. They have noted yet persuaded the public that a surplus is anything more than a useless ornament on a budget, which can be given up whenever it is inconvenient to keep it.

Moreover, the case for a surplus of any particular size is difficult to make. The difficulty is compounded by the variability in the composition and definition of the expenditure side of the budget. We start with the proposition that we need a surplus as an addition to the private savings available to finance investment. The surplus should be big enough so that when added to private saving it will finance the desired investment. However, this ignores the amount of investment that is done directly through the budget, in the form of Federal spending or lending. The amount of investment in the economy is equal to private savings plus the budget surplus plus the amount of investment in the budget. A decision on the proper side of the surplus should then depend on the amount of investment that is in the budget. Even if we concentrate on private investment we must recognize that there is a good deal of private investment financed within the budget, mainly by loans and largely for housing and related activities. Moreover the amount of such financing in the budget is quite variable, not only as a result of changes in real programs but also as a result of changes in legal forms and in the definition of the budget. For example, when FNMA became private the amount of private financing in the budget was substantially reduced. Thus, the appropirate size of the surplus depends on the composition and definition of the budget.

The foregoing rationale for determining the size of the budget surplus depends on our being able to reach some opinion about the desirable rate of investment. Without that it seems to me everything we might say about the size of the surplus, and therefore about the level of taxes, is arbitrary. We are not used to thinking in these terms, even though they are the terms in which the question of the surplus was classically discussed. This is a large part of the reason for the surplus appearing to be a mere ornament in the budget.

The problem of defining the budget, to which I have already referred, is also relevant to the use of taxation as a discipline on expenditures. The idea is that if we require expenditure increases to be matched by tax increases, the decision-makers will not be inclined to increase expenditures unless the value of doing so is great. There is a good deal to this. But imposing this requirement, or a ceiling on expenditures in some other way, also creates a strong incentive to get government programs financed outside the budget. A great deal of this has been done in recent years of budgetary stringency. The disciplinary effect of the limitation on budget expenditures is not entirely nullified by this. But there is a great deal of leakage. Moreover, the leakage is uneven, all programs not being equally able to get outside the budget. This causes a distortion in the pattern of spending.

I have spent a good many minutes here explaining why I am not encouraged about our ability to determine what the proper level of taxation is or to get it if we could determine it. Still decisions will be made and an attempt must be made to influence those decisions, if only by dragging one's heels and grumbling over the course of events. It should be clear enough that I don't see any simple rules that are satisfactory or enforceable, and I don't think we are prepared to promulgate sophisticated rules. But a few things may be said about the directions in which we should lean.

Prudence suggests that we should try to avoid large swings in the budget surplus or deficit position. On the whole present opinion assigns less destabilizing significance to such swings than was formerly expected, and some would assign a zero weight. But still the more extreme versions of this new view are unproven, and it would be rash to act as if we could absorb large abrupt changes in the fiscal position without risking inflationary or deflationary consequences.

At the same time, we should not allow ourselves to be frightened by small changes which, with almost any conceivable procedure, are inevitably anyway. I have the impression that many people now see a magical significance in a shift of a few billion dollars in the budget position, especially if the shift crosses the line between surplus and deficit. In a trillion dollar economy this is hard to understand, especially after our recent experience with the limited significance of the budget shift between a $25 billion deficit in fiscal 1968 and a $3 billion surplus in fiscal 1969. Preoccupation with small changes in the budget position leads to bad forecasts by the private economy and bad policy by the government.

To avoid large shifts in the budget position we shall have to rely primarily on stabilizing the rate of growth of expenditures so that it keeps pace, approximately, with the growth of the revenues from the existing tax system—as it will be after the legislation now pending is enacted. I expect that this legislation will satisfy the hunger for tax reduction for a while and that no one will want to open the Pandora's Box of tax reform for some time. On the other hand, barring a crisis, there is no taste for tax increases. So for some years we will have to tailor our expenditures to the existing tax system.

After a while we may have a freer choice about the levels of both revenues and expenditures. The revenue decision should then be made with a view to our longer-range plans and ambitions, with respect not only to government expenditures but also to private consumption and investment. Neither the Administration nor the Congress was prepared to do this in 1969. However, in the Administration we have been focusing a great deal of attention on the problem of laying out the claims on the national product for several years ahead and specifying the tax requirements for achieving whatever allocation of the national output is chosen. I would hope that by the next time we can make a major tax decision this kind of information and this way of looking at things will help to guide the outcome.

One implication of regarding the tax and budget problem as a problem of allocating the national output is that taxes serve to finance not only government expenditures but also the desired excess, if any, of private investment over private savings. Attention has been directed to this fact by the existence of a national housing goal, incorporated in legislation, for the construction of 26 million houses in a decade. Except insofar as these houses are directly financed through the Federal budget, they will have to be financed through private savings and the Federal surplus. Our preliminary calculations suggest that this will require a very large surplus. One consequence is that the advocates of housing, within the Administration and to some extent outside it, have become strong supporters of a budget surplus.

The point about housing is illustrative only. It does, however, suggest the possibility of putting some real content into the claim of the budget surplus as a use for the Federal revenue. It also suggests that if this is done support for a surplus will emerge to compete with the ever-present claims for increased expenditures and reduced taxes.

Recent experience warns against relying on quick temporary tax changes to cope either with expenditure variations or with changes in the economy. We are unlikely to get them in time and they are unlikely to be very effective if obtained, at least with the present tax system. One can conceive of kinds of taxes that might be varied more effectively. For example, changes in the rate of a value-added tax or general sales tax might cause some acceleration or deferral of expenditures. However, this is not sufficient reason for installing such a tax if there are not other important reasons.

We have a great deal of learning to do before we are prepared to give a good answer to the question, how high should taxes be. We have a good deal of education to do before we can get that answer, once learned, translated into action. However, I think there is a hopeful sign in the fact that we are awakening from our earlier illusion that we knew the answer.

DANGEROUS TOYS AT CHRISTMASTIME

HON. JAMES G. O'HARA

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, last week I pointed out that unwary parents may unknowingly buy dangerous toys for their children in the mistaken belief that as a result of passage of the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act all unsafe toys have been taken off the store shelves.

This, of course, is a false assumption.

The Child Protection and Toy Safety Act does not go into effect until January 5, 60 days after its signing by the President.

Until that time, parents are on their own. There is no governmental protection offered this Christmastime against toys which pose an electrical, heat, or mechanical hazard to children.

This, I believe, was not the intention of the Congress. The Child Protection and Toy Safety Act, as approved by the Senate in June, included the provision that it was to take effect 60 days after its signing by the President.

When the House passed its version of this legislation on September 4, many of us assumed that the differences would be quickly resolved in conference and the bill would be approved in time for its provisions to be in effect during the Christmas shopping season when toy purchasing is heaviest. However, the conference committee did not agree on the bill until late October and it was not signed by the President until November 6.

Mr. Speaker, in order to offer our children the protection of the act this Christmas, 18 Members of the House last week introduced a joint resolution providing that the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act take effect immediately.

Some might argue that even if this resolution were passed and the act became effective before Christmas, we could not assure that all unsafe toys would be removed from sale.

This is true. In fact, whenever the act takes effect, there will still be unsafe toys on the market.

But this act does provide a mechanism for removing hazardous toys. And this mechanism is not operating now.

There are toys now on the market which have been identified as hazardous by the National Product Safety Commission.

At this moment, nobody has the authority to order them off the store shelves.

The Child Protection and Toy Safety Act will—when it takes effect—authorize the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to prohibit the sale of these toys.

This resolution would give him this power now.

Unsafe toys will still be purchased. Parents must remain alert. But if as a result of this resolution but one dangerous toy is removed from sale, and one child is saved from a fatal or maiming injury this Christmas, it will have been well worth the effort.

Mr. Speaker, the New York Times recently discussed the problem of toy safety in an article "Toy Safety Is Added to Santa's Woes." I include that article in the RECORD:

TOY SAFETY IS ADDED TO SANTA'S WOES

(By Peter Millones)

The adult world has begun its holiday trek to the toy counters, with the difficult task of selecting gifts from objects that go ma-ma, bang, boom, whizz and whir.

The emphasis on toys that are educational as well as entertaining has made choosing harder for many adults, as has the continuing concern over war toys and their affect on children.

This year, an additional factor is attracting widespread attention—the safety of some toys.

Two weeks ago, President Nixon signed a bill that gives the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare the right to ban the sales of toys for children that present electrical, mechanical or heat hazards.

This enlarged the powers of the Federal Government, which already could ban toys that were too easily flammable, too highly pressurized or chemically dangerous. But the new legislation does not take affect until early January.

DANGEROUS TOYS CITED

"This Christmas the public is on its own," is the way the National Commission on Product Safety puts it.

The commission, set up during the Johnson Administration, has been investigating the safety of various products, including toys, and has found items of considerable potential danger, especially to children.

After hearing earlier this year, the commission showed examples of some toys that had been injurious or lethal to children. These included:

A child's stove that produced temperatures of 660 degrees Fahrenheit in the oven and 300 degrees on the top.

A bazooka gun that made a loud noise when fired and could permanently affect a child's hearing.

A plastic doll for infants that contained a hair ribbon that when pulled out, exposed a dangerous pin-like protrusion.

A slingshot with a missile whose razor-sharp tip was enclosed in a flimsy plastic sheath.

Presumably these and other toys with equally obvious harmful potential are removed from the market once the dangers are called to the attention of manufacturers and distributors. But since some of the toys did not violate any existing law, they or similar playthings could be on store shelves.

A more difficult problem are the toys that do not appear to be dangerous, but when given a tug or slam by a child easily break and expose sharp points or cutting edges. Other misuses could also easily pose a danger.

For example, the national commission found a rather harmless looking blow-gun was, in fact, dangerous because children tended to put the wrong end of the gun in their mouths and ingested the darts that it fired.

Safety experts advise adults to avoid toys with sharp edges and protrusions, although the age of the child and the normal way the toy is used are factors.

The commission on products safety has recommended that the Government pretest toys for safety, much as it does with drugs, before allowing them on the market. But Congress did not accept that recommendation in its latest legislation.

The toy industry, with sales of about $2-billion a year, did not generally oppose the widening of Government policing of the industry, but it did object to Government pretesting of products.

Once an adult has satisfied himself on toy safety, educational and entertainment value, he will find that toys, like virtually everything else, cost more this year.

One unusual factor discovered by Sidney Margolius, a consumer writer and adviser to labor unions, is that "some manufacturers have adopted the trick employed in the food business—they have kept the prices the same, but have reduced the sizes or number of pieces they give you."

He noted that one construction set had gone down in price, but "you get 165 pieces instead of 208."

"In the toy food-mix sets, a 130-piece product that was $8.99 is now $9.99 for 125 pieces," he notes. "A set that was $4.99 last year is the same price, but now you get 42 pieces instead of 45."

Mr. Margolius adds: "Some of the dolls not only have gone up in price, but have also shrunk in size." He found one popular doll that went up $1 and was reduced in size an inch.

His advice to union members, which is not likely to sit well with the industry, is: "As before, we suggest not buying early. Price cuts get bigger as Christmas draws closer."

A COLLEGE PRESIDENT MAKES HIS COVENANT

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the November 23 issue of the Chicago Tribune carried excerpts from the inaugural address delivered recently by Dr. Thaddeus Seymour, who this year assumed the office of president of Wabash College at Crawfordsville, Ind. For a number of reasons the inaugural remarks of Dr. Seymour are worthy of our attention and refreshing, to say the least. Associated with larger institutions of learning during his academic career, the new president of Wabash has retained time-tested values which have been forsaken by others in the educational field. For the past 10 years he had been dean of Dartmouth College, having earned his bachelor's degree at the University of California at Berkeley and his doctorate in English at the University of North Carolina.

In fair but firm terms Dr. Seymour promised that disruptive tactics on campus, experienced by too many institutions recently, would not be tolerated at Wabash:

There is no place here for any student or any faculty member who is unwilling or unable to accept the principle of free expression in the context of community order.

Referring to the trend toward increased dependency on public funds, he noted that:

Increasingly we see bills proposed which would pull on the invisible strings attached to government money. I am proud that we have stood on our own feet, refusing to trade private independence for public dollars.

And finally, expounding on a theme expressed too infrequently these days, Dr. Seymour stated:

Let me come right out and say it: The liberal arts campus can be accused of being too liberal, a form of political coercion which denies the student a chance to choose, to hammer out his own beliefs. To assure a fair exposure to new and old ideas, to guarantee balance, we must always include on our faculty, as a matter of policy, distinguished teachers who stand for limited government, a free market, and private property.

It is certainly to be hoped that more educators of similar persuasions follow Dr. Thaddeus Seymour to positions of leadership on the campuses of our educational institutions.

I insert at this point excerpts from his recent inaugural address in the RECORD:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Nov. 23, 1969]

A COLLEGE PRESIDENT MAKES HIS COVENANT

(By Thaddeus Seymour)

This is the time for me to covenant with the Wabash community, to tell you where I stand, what I believe, and what I aspire to for Wabash college in the decade of the '70s and beyond. My beliefs and my aspirations can be set forth together in a simple, declarative sentence. I want to see Wabash continue to excel as a small, independent, undergraduate, liberal arts college for men. . . .

No single change has strained our national purpose more than the breakdown of community identity and participation, whether in the quality of neighborhood life, in national and local government, or in our great social and economic institutions. Empty anonymity has sapped individual will and self-respect; has produced alienation, disjointedness, and apparent aimlessness at every level of American life. At Wabash we have a unique tradition of community, and we have the opportunity to enrich our own experience by sharing it together. . . . We begin by remaining a small college. I agree with the sentimental formula that our student body should never be larger than the capacity of this chapel.

But community is not measured by mere numbers. I aspire to a renewed spirit of participation which engages all elements of the college, students, faculty, staff alumni and trustees, in a collaborative effort to shape the quality of our future life together. I believe that we become a true community when all have a stake in the place. . . .

Wabash has always steered an independent course. It is basic to our heritage that we were established free of church or governmental control. Today we can see the wisdom of this policy, as private institutions become increasingly independent on public funds and thereby subject to public regulation. Increasingly we see bills proposed which would pull on the invisible strings attached to government money. I am proud that we have stood on our own feet, refusing to trade private independence for public dollars.

This year there are 7 million students on American campuses; one study conservatively predicts 14 million by 1985. Sheer force of numbers has produced an educational process which is more process than educational. At the same time, too much professional concern, what I can only call the "graduate school mentality," has promoted the concept of "publish or perish." It has been effective, creative classroom teaching which has perished in the process. Not so at Wabash. I do not need to tell this audience how the Wabash faculty daily demonstrates its commitment to the intellectual and personal development of the individual. The willingness of our teachers to invest themselves in the lives of their students is found in the close relationship, often close friendship, of students and faculty members both in and out of the classroom. We must preserve and promote this undergraduate spirit, for it is the real justification for our size and the case for our independence. . . .

Our society is best led by men of comprehensive understanding and vision, men with a broad exposure to the substance and method of the sciences, humanities, and the social sciences. As the needs of our society become more complex and specialized, men must more than ever before develop an outlook which leads them to ask not simply "How?" but "Why?" Our concern must always be not merely with what a man shall know, but with what a man shall become. . . . We must always stay loyal to the goal of the liberal arts—to liberate minds and to set men free. . . .

To be truly free, to offer the student a free and fair exposure to all points of view, we must live by a clearly articulated policy that our faculty and curriculum will fairly represent all political and economic points of view. Let men come right out and say it: The liberal arts campus can be accused of being too liberal, a form of political coercion which denies the student a chance to choose, to hammer out his own beliefs. To assure a fair exposure to new and old ideas, to guarantee balance, we must always include on our faculty, as a matter of policy, distinguished teachers who stand for limited government, a free market, and private property.

Free inquiry requires a free forum. I count it my most solemn duty to assure you and future generations at Wabash that you will be free to hear all points of view and that you will be free to speak and write within the bounds of decency on any subject without abridgment. I will defend that freedom. At the same time, I stand unambiguously opposed to any act which denies the right of any person to speak or to be heard, to listen and not to listen, to go about the orderly process of pursuing his education. . . . Wabash will continue to respect orderly processes. There is no place here for any student or any faculty member who is unwilling or unable to accept the principle of free expression in the context of community order. . . .

I believe in the positive values of learning in an environment of men. I am the product of such an experience myself, and for the last 15 years I have watched good men flourish in that setting at Dartmouth. At its best, the male community develops self-sufficiency thru independence, stretches with competitiveness, and binds men in fellowship.

So there you have it. I believe in Wabash. Some places are not as good as they claim to be; Wabash is a much greater place that it lets on. I believe it with all my heart, and I am anxious to get on with the job. I ask God's help and yours.

REPRESENTATIVE DON FRASER SPEAKS ON THE AMERICAN INDIAN IN TODAY'S WORLD

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, American Indians want the right to be Indians, to preserve their tribal identities and tribal lands, to make their own decisions and to have a say about their destiny.

One of the leading congressional advocates of a policy of Indian self-determination is my good friend and distinguished colleague, Congressman DON FRASER of Minnesota, who has long been interested in improving the social and economic conditions of the American Indian. Congressman FRASER believes, as I do, that through a policy of self-determination, with Indian participation at every level, ways will be found to better the existence of the Nation's 600,000 Indians, to improve their health, their education, their economic conditions, both on and off the reservation and without destroying their identity as Indians.

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD the following speech delivered by Congressman FRASER on today's American Indian before the 13th Annual Minnesota AFL–CIO Institute on Human Relations on November 2. This year's institute theme was "The Indian in Today's World":

"THE AMERICAN INDIAN IN TODAY'S WORLD"

(By Representative DONALD M. FRASER)

It is a pleasure for me to be here today with so many old friends. This is an important week in Minneapolis for Indian affairs. First, the National Conference on Indian Education and Now this Thirteenth Annual AFL–CIO Institute on Human Relations with its theme "The Indian in Today's World."

I want to commend the Minnesota labor movement for its leadership in focusing attention on the needs and concerns of American Indians. I know that the Minnesota Labor Committee for Human Rights, under the leadership of its executive director Lou Lerman, was involved in Indian affairs long before many of the rest of us were actively concerned about this issue.

Today's conference is particularly timely because we are now in the middle of a new period of Indian awareness—especially in Minnesota. I say this for myself as a public official with 7 years experience in the U.S. Congress and 8 years experience, before that, in the Minnesota state legislature. Somehow it was always too easy for us not to think very much about Indians before. For the most part, Indian people in Minnesota weren't very visible. We didn't hear from them very much and, besides, Indian problems were something for the BIA to worry about—not us.

But all that is changing. Indian people are no longer suffering injustices in silence. They are speaking out and making their concerns known. Groups like the American Indian Movement here in Minneapolis have done much to bring about this new awareness in the general community.

This is all to the good. But we must add a note of caution. In our new enthusiasm for Indian affairs we must be careful that we don't fall all over ourselves in an effort to impose all sorts of elaborate new programs on the Indians.

Indian problems have been "discovered" before but somehow Indian conditions have not improved very much. Their problems—poor education, poor health care, high unemployment—are still severe. And we will only cause more disappointment if we go over to Franklin Avenue or up to Leech Lake with exaggerated claims about the benefits that will occur if only the Indians will accept this or that new program.

Many Indians are suspicious about new programs, particularly if these are government programs, and they have every right to be. After all, the white man has been making promises to Indian regularly for hundreds of years—and breaking these promises just as regularly.

The United States government and its colonial predecessors have signed more than 380 treaties with Indian tribes. Many of these treaties have been broken outright. The Spirit of many others has been cruelly violated. We are often ashamed of our nation's early history in this area but many of us don't realize how strongly Indians feel that their treaty rights are still being violated today. The controversy over the wild rice harvesting regulations at White Earth is a good case in point.

More than 300 land claims against the Federal Government—some dating back to colonial days—are pending before the Indian Claims Commission in Washington. Several weeks ago, I visited briefly a session of the Indian Subcommittee in the House. At this session a band of Indians from the State of Washington was trying to gain title to land that should have belonged to the tribe according to an early treaty. But somehow title had been denied them because of a mistake by a government surveyor in 1890!

The number of complicated disputes over Indian hunting, fishing and water rights is growing. The basis for these disputes, of course, is the growing pressure for the economic exploitation of Indian land. Everyone from the National Park Service to California citrus growers has a good reason why they should have Indian land and water—or at least why they should control the use of this land and water.

Until recently, large economic interests didn't pay that much attention to Indian land. After all, the most desirable land had already been gobbled up in the 19th century when the reservations were created. But, today, as our natural resources become depleted there is going to be increasing pressure to use Indian land for purposes that might not be acceptable to the Indians who now live on the land.

Certainly the most dramatic example of this new economic pressure is the discovery of oil on the north slope of Alaska. The oil discovery is promoting efforts to exploit millions of acres of land claimed by Alaskan natives. Since these claims have not yet been settled, there is a very real danger that the natives will lose many of their land and mineral rights because their land suddenly has become so attractive.

This whole issue of Indian property rights is illustrated by a little story that Vine Deloria tells in his new book, "Custer Died for Your Sins." Several years ago a white man was introduced to an old chief in New York City. Taking a liking to the old man, the white man invited him to dinner. The old chief hadn't eaten a good steak in a long time and eagerly accepted. He finished one steak in no time and still looked hungry. So the white man ordered another steak. As they were waiting for the second steak, the white man said, "Chief, I sure wish I had your appetite." "I don't doubt it, white man," the chief replied. "You took my land, you took my mountains and streams, you took my salmon and my buffalo. You took everything I had except my appetite and now you want that too. Aren't you ever going to be satisfied?"

The next time we go to talk to Indians about our new schemes to "uplift" them maybe now we'll understand why they want to talk to us, first, about their treaty rights.

If progress is going to be made by Indian people, I am convinced that it is going to be through the efforts of the Indian people, themselves, and not because of any new programs dreamed up in Washington. Our earlier "grand designs" for the Indians—the termination policy of the early 1950s, the relocation emphasis of more recent years—have been disastrous at worst and ineffectual at best. These early policies were not successful in part because they were predicated on the assumption that "the Indian problem" could be solved only if Indians were assimilated into the dominant white culture—only if Indians left their reservations and gave up their "Indian-ness."

Only now are we beginning to realize that Indian people have unique cultures that should not be violated. With their emphasis on the importance of the community and the need for harmony with nature, these are cultures that the rest of us can well envy.

Two new reports, both issued during the past month, should help us understand these intangible factors. The first report, prepared by a private non-profit organization, the Citizens Advocate Center, provides a thoughtful analysis of the conflicts between Indian culture and Indian government programs. This report is entitled "Our Brother's Keeper, the Indian in White America." It should be available in Minneapolis book stores soon if it is not available already.

The second report, by the Senate Subcommittee on Indian Education, of which Senator Mondale is a member, dramatically documents the failures in Indian education resulting from the neglect of Indian culture by the agencies responsible for the education of Indian children. Hopefully, these reports will encourage the long overdue reform of many existing programs designed to aid American Indians.

Our awareness of Indian culture should make us sensitive to the derogatory image of the Indian that is often created in the mass media. How many of us still associate the word "Indian" with the blood-thirsty savage circling the wagon train or with the "heap big chief" who will sell you a used car for "very little wampum." If you are of Scandinavian descent, think how you would feel if every Scandinavian on television was portrayed as an illiterate Viking with two horns coming out of his helmet? The National Congress of American Indians and local groups here in Minnesota have embarked on a campaign to notify newspapers, advertisers and television producers about portrayals of Indians that they feel are offensive. Certainly this kind of effort should be encouraged until the image of the Indian is developed in the mass media with more sensitivity.

It is easy for us to criticize Indian programs of the past, but what of the future? I know that some people in Washington who have a real concern for Indians feel frustrated because they can see no clear directions for new policies. Because the Federal Government burned its fingers so badly with termination, there is almost a reluctance to try anything new for fear of getting burned again.

Most everyone concerned with Indian affairs has adopted the slogan of Indian self-determination. No one is exactly sure what this means, however. To some, self-determination is just another road to termination with the Federal Government absolving itself of any responsibility for Indian affairs by saying to the Indians—"Here, you take care of yourself, don't bother us anymore."

In the past, self-determination has often meant that the Indian could decide for himself whether to stay on the reservation and starve, or go to the city and take his chances in an alien environment. But if self-determination is going to be a way of improving conditions, support from the general community will be required—both financially and morally—for new programs that Indians have developed themselves.

In Minneapolis, Project STAIRS, Indian Upward Bound and the Indian teen centers are examples of Indian-directed programs that need support from the general community. Hopefully, there will be a new Indian center in Minneapolis soon.

On the national level, the Senate Indian Education Subcommittee has recommended the creation of Indian school boards with the authority to operate Federal Indian schools. In States like Minnesota, where there are no Federal schools, the subcommittee recommends that Indians participate in the planning, execution and evaluation of programs which make use of Johnson-O'Malley funds. These are the Federal funds available to local school systems to help defray the cost of educating Indian children. Currently these funds are only available to school districts which encompass or are adjacent to reservations. Hopefully, the Johnson-O'Malley program will be expanded before too long to make funds available to cities like Minneapolis and St. Paul where there are significant concentrations of Indian children.

On the reservations, we might want to take a look at the way basic public services are provided. In recent years, tribal councils have been able to receive direct grants from the Federal Government to operate their own community action programs under the Economic Opportunity Act.

Using the community action program as a model, tribal councils might want to provide certain public services directly—road maintenance, schools, etc.—or contract with other Government jursidictions to provide these services for them, rather than have the services provided directly by Federal employees of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

The BIA is now able to contract with tribal councils to provide some public services on a limited scale. Certainly this contract procedure could be improved. A proposal has been made that Indian communities be given the opportunity to assume local administration of any program now administered by the BIA provided that the local community requests this opportunity and that a decision to assume local control is made at a reservation-wide referendum. Block grants to finance these programs would then be available to the tribe—similar to the block grants now available to State and local governments for certain purposes.

Many of the proposals I have just discussed can be implemented, I feel, without a massive reorganization of Federal Indian programs. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has borne much of the brunt of the criticism of Government paternalism—and certainly much of this criticism is justified. But there is no reason to make the BIA the scapegoat for all the problems facing the American Indians. Indian problems will not be solved merely by abolishing the BIA, as some have proposed. Neither will the problems be solved just by taking the BIA out of the Interior Department and placing it in HEW or in the Office of the President as others have recommended. While reorganization is important, this issue alone should not distract us from other important work that has to be done.

What we really need are new ways for Indians to make their concerns known and felt. The establishment in 1968 by President Johnson of the National Council on Indian Opportunity is one step in the right direction. The Council is headed by the Vice President. Its members include the heads of cabinet level departments and six Indian leaders. Its function is to coordinate Indian programs in the various Federal agencies and to insure that any new programs reflect the needs and desires of the Indian people themselves. Currently, the six Indian leaders are selected by the President. However, we might want to consider expanding the Indian membership of the Council and making Indian membership an elected rather than an appointed position. Election districts could be set up to coincide with the regions served by the 11 BIA area offices.

While the National Council may provide a vehicle for Indian self-determination on the National level, it is even more important for us to think about ways to improve self-determination at the grass roots level. Just last week, I met with members of the American Indian Task Force, an ad hoc group of Indian leaders, to discuss this very issue. Included in the group were Clyde Bellecourt and Dennis Banks from Minneapolis and Simon Howard from the Leech Lake Reservation.

The task force recommended the establishment of all Indian boards of inquiry to be established in the eleven areas served by BIA area offices. The 11 boards of inquiry would be broadly representative of the tribal councils, private Indian organizations and off-reservation Indians in each of the areas. Each board would conduct hearings, receive grievances and generate recommendations for new programs and policies. In order to make this a continuing process, each board would hire a circuit rider or "ombudsman" who would regularly visit Indian communities in the area to hear complaints and to make recommendations about solutions.

Each panel would convene a "red ribbon grand jury" composed entirely of Indians to investigate and report upon deprivations of rights, charges of inaction or unresponsiveness by officials and the lack of effectiveness of public services. In appropriate situations, "grand jury" findings could lead to legal action.

Hopefully this process will produce the new programs that the Indian people themselves feel they need. In the months to come, I hope that the National Council on Indian Opportunity, headed by Vice President Agnew, will give serious consideration to the development of this new process. The National Council is ideally suited to assist with the implementation of the Indian boards of inquiry.

I want to conclude with a story, widely circulated by now, from Vine Deloria's book. Some years ago at a congressional hearing someone asked a council member of the Cheyenne River Sioux "Just what do you Indians want?" and the council member replied, "A leave-us-alone law."

Few Indians, I suspect, would interpret this literally to mean "leave us alone to starve." Maybe what this Indian leader really means is that his people should be left alone to develop their own solutions to their problems. They don't want anyone in Washington, to tell them that they should relocate to the cities or that they must industrialize their reservations.

After Indian goals have been developed, Indians will need our encouragement to help them achieve these goals. Resources from the public and private sector will be needed to enable Indians to establish more meaningful lives for themselves on their reservations, if this is what they want. At the same time, other Indians may need help to establish new Indian communities in our cities.

Our support and encouragement of Indian self-determination will, I am sure, enable the American Indian to become a full participant, on his own terms, in today's world.

AGREEMENT OF THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN VIETNAM, JULY 20, 1954

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, in the debates on the rule for House Resolution 613 this afternoon, I suggested that our chances for a negotiated just peace in Vietnam might be enhanced by a firm congressional declaration in support of a peace based on the 1954 Geneva accords.

The President's historic speech on May 15 of this year specifically conceded that this country would accept reunification of Vietnam; the President's last point in that speech was, and I quote: "all parties would agree to observe the Geneva Accords of 1954."

In the debates which have occurred over the past several weeks, there has been little discussion of what President Nixon meant when he referred to the two documents which comprised the Geneva accords.

The first of those documents was entitled "Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam." It was signed by two parties, representing the two forces which had been fighting in Vietnam for some 8 years, the French Union Forces and the forces of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. There were not then two Vietnams. There was one Vietnam, and the agreement provided for its temporary division "pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Vietnam."

The agreement provided that:

The signatories of the present Agreement and their successors in their functions shall be responsible for ensuring an observance and enforcement of the terms and provisions thereof.

The successors to the French were the South Vietnamese.

The second document which came out of the conference at Geneva, on the following day, July 21, 1954, was entitled "Final Declaration of Geneva Conferences, July 21, 1954."

This document specifically referred to the hope that Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam would play their part, in full independence and sovereignty, in the peaceful community of nations.

Note that the declaration referred to Vietnam, one nation, not South Vietnam or North Vietnam.

The declaration further provided "general elections shall be held in July 1956, under the supervision of an international commission."

While the United States did not sign this declaration, nor did any of the other participants at Geneva, President Eisenhower issued a separate statement on the same date, July 21, 1954, in which he stated "the United States will not use force to disturb the settlement."

For ready reference in the debates ahead, I append at this point in the RECORD the text of the Geneva Accords of 1954 and President Eisenhower's accompanying statement:

AGREEMENT ON THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN VIET-NAM, JULY 20, 1954

CHAPTER I—PROVISIONAL MILITARY DEMARCATION LINE AND DEMILITARIZED ZONE

Article 1

A provisional military demarcation line shall be fixed, on either side of which the forces of the two parties shall be regrouped after their withdrawal, the forces of the People's Army of Viet-Nam to the north of the line and the forces of the French Union to the south.

The provisional military demarcation line is fixed as shown on the map attached (omitted).

It is also agreed that a demilitarized zone shall be established on either side of the demarcation line, to a width of not more than 5 kms. from it, to act as a buffer zone and avoid any incidents which might result in the resumption of hostilities.

Article 2

The period within which the movement of all the forces of either party into its regrouping zone on either side of the provisional military demarcation line shall be completed shall not exceed three hundred (300) days from the date of the present Agreement's entry in force.

Article 3

When the provisional military demarcation line coincides with a waterway, the waters of such waterway shall be open to civil navigation by both parties wherever one bank is controlled by one party and the other bank by the other party. The Joint Commission shall establish rules of navigation for the stretch of waterway in question. The merchant shipping and other civilian craft of each party shall have unrestricted access to the land under its military control.

Article 4

The provisional military demarcation line between the two final regrouping zones is extended into the territorial waters by a line perpendicular to the general line of the coast.

All coastal islands north of this boundary shall be evacuated by the armed forces of the French Union, and all islands south of it shall be evacuated by the forces of the People's Army of Viet-Nam.

Article 5

To avoid any incidents which might result in the resumption of hostilities, all military forces, supplies and equipment shall be withdrawn from the demilitarized zone within twenty-five (25) days of the present Agreement's entry into force.

Article 6

No person, military or civilian, shall be permitted to cross the provisional military demarcation line unless specifically authorized to do so by the Joint Commission.

Article 7

No person, military or civilian, shall be permitted to enter the demilitarized zone except persons concerned with the conduct of civil administration and relief and persons specifically authorized to enter by the Joint Commission.

Article 8

Civil administration and relief in the demilitarized zone on either side of the provisional military demarcation line shall be the responsiblity of the Commanders-in-Chief of the two parties in their respective zones. The number of persons, military or civilian, from each side who are permitted to enter the demilitarized zone for the conduct of civil administration and relief shall be determined by the respective Commanders, but in no case shall the total number authorized by either side exceed at any one time a figure to be determined by the Trung Gia Military Commission or by the Joint Commission. The number of civil police and the arms to be carried by them shall be determined by the Joint Commission. No one else shall carry arms unless specifically authorized to do so by the Joint Commission.

Article 9

Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed as limiting the complete freedom of movement, into, out of or within the demilitarized zone, of the Joint Commission, its joint groups, the International Commission to be set up as indicated below, its inspection teams and any other persons, supplies or equipment specifically authorized to enter the demilitarized zone by the Joint Commission. Freedom of movement shall be permitted across the territory under the military control of either side over any road or waterway which has to be taken between points within the demilitarized zone when such points are not connected by roads or waterways lying completely within the demilitarized zone.

CHAPTER II—PRINCIPLES AND PROCEDURE GOVERNING IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PRESENT AGREEMENT

Article 10

The Commanders of the Forces on each side, on the one side the Commander-in-Chief of the French Union forces in Indo-China and on the other side of the Commander-in-Chief of the People's Army of Viet-Nam, shall order and enforce the complete cessation of all hostilities in Viet-Nam by all armed forces under their control, including all units and personnel of the ground, naval and air forces.

Article 11

In accordance with the principle of a simultaneous cease-fire throughout Indo-China, the cessation of hostilities shall be simultaneous throughout all parts of Viet-Nam, in all areas of hostilities and for all the forces of the two parties.

Taking into account the time effectively required to transmit the cease-fire order down to the lowest echelons of the combatant forces on both sides, the two parties are agreed that the cease-fire shall take effect completely and simultaneously for the different sectors of the country as follows:

Northern Viet-Nam at 8:00 a.m. (local time) on 27 July 1954.

Central Viet-Nam at 8:00 a.m. (local time) on 1 August 1954.

Southern Viet-Nam at 8:00 a.m. (local time) on 11 August 1954.

It is agreed that Pekin mean time shall be taken as local time.

From such time as the cease-fire becomes effective in Northern Viet-Nam, both parties undertake not to engage in any large-scale offensive action in any part of the Indo-Chinese theatre of operations and not to commit the air forces based on Northern Viet-Nam outside that sector. The two parties also undertake to inform each other of their plans for movement from one regrouping zone to another within twenty-five (25) days of the present Agreement's entry into force.

Article 12

All the operations and movements entailed in the cessation of hostilities and regrouping must proceed in a safe and orderly fashion:

(a) Within a certain number of days after the cease-fire Agreement shall have become effective, the number to be determined on the spot by the Trung Gia Military Commission, each party shall be responsible for removing and neutralizing mines (including river- and sea-mines), booby traps, explosives and any other dangerous substances placed by it. In the event of its being impossible to complete the work of removal and neutralization in time, the party concerned shall mark the spot by placing visible signs there. All demolitions, mine fields, wire entanglements and other hazards to the free movement of the personnel of the Joint Commission and its joint groups, known to be present after the withdrawal of the military forces, shall be reported to the Joint Commission by the Commanders of the opposing forces;

(b) From the time of the cease-fire until regrouping is completed on either side of the demarcation line:

(1) The forces of either party shall be provisionally withdrawn from the provisional assembly areas assigned to the other party.

(2) When one party's forces withdraw by a route (road, rail, waterway, sea route) which passes through the territory of the other party (see Article 24), the latter party's forces must provisionally withdraw three kilometres on each side of such route, but in such a manner as to avoid interfering with the movements of the civil population.

Article 13

From the time of the cease-fire until the completion of the movements from one regrouping zone into the other, civil and military transport aircraft shall follow air-corridors between the provisional assembly areas assigned to the French Union forces north of the demarcation line on the one hand and the Laotian frontier and the regrouping zone assigned to the French Union forces on the other hand.

The position of the air-corridors, their width, the safety route for single-engined military aircraft transferred to the south and the search and rescue procedure for aircraft in distress shall be determined on the spot by the Trung Gia Military Commission.

Article 14

Political and administrative measures in the two regrouping zones, on either side of the provisional military demarcation line:

(a) Pending the general elections which will bring about the unification of Viet-Nam, the conduct of civil administration in each regrouping zone shall be in the hands of the party whose forces are to be regrouped there in virtue of the present Agreement;

(b) Any territory controlled by one party which is transefrred to the other party by the regrouping plan shall continue to be administered by the former party until such date as all the troops who are to be transferred have completely left that territory so as to free the zone assigned to the party in question. From then on, such territory shall be regarded as transferred to the other party, who shall assume responsibility for it.

Steps shall be taken to ensure that there is no break in the transfer of responsibilities. For this purpose, adequate notices shall be given by the withdrawing party to the other party, which shall make the necessary arrangements, in particular by sending administrative and police detachments to prepare for the assumption of administrative responsibility. The length of such notice shall be determined by the Trung Gia Military Commission. The transfer shall be effected in successive stages for the various territiorial sectors.

The transfer of the civil administration of Hanoi and Haiphong to the authorities of the Democratic Republic of Viet-Nam shall be completed within the respective time-limits laid down in Article 15 for military movements.

(c) Each party undertakes to refrain from any reprisals or discrimination against persons or organizations on account of their activities during the hostilities and to guarantee their democratic liberties.

(d) From the date of entry into force of the present agreement until the movement of troops is completed, any civilians residing in a district controlled by one party who wish to go and live in the zone assigned to the other party shall be permitted and helped to do so by the authorities in that district.

Article 15

The disengagement of the combatants, and the withdrawals and transfers of military forces, equipment and supplies shall take place in accordance with the following principles:

(a) The withdrawals and transfers of the military forces, equipment and supplies of the two parties shall be completed within three hundred (300) days, as laid down in Article 2 of the present Agreement;

(b) Within either territory successive withdrawals shall be made by sectors, portions of sectors or provinces. Transfers from one regrouping zone to another shall be made in successive monthly installments proportionate to the number of troops to be transferred;

(c) The two parties shall undertake to carry out all troop withdrawals and transfers in accordance with the aims of the present Agreement, shall permit no hostile act and shall take no step whatsoever which might hamper such withdrawals and transfers. They shall assist one another as far as this is possible;

(d) The two parties shall permit no destruction or sabotage of any public property and no injury to the life and property of the civil population. They shall permit no interference in local civil administration;

(e) The Joint Commission and the International Commission shall ensure that steps are taken to safeguard the forces in the course of withdrawal and transfer;

(f) The Trung Gia Military Commission, and later the Joint Commission, shall determine by common agreement the exact procedure for the disengagement of the combatants and for troop withdrawals and transfers, on the basis of the principles mentioned above and within the framework laid down below;

1. The disengagement of the combatants, including the concentration of the armed forces of all kinds and also each party's movements into the provisional assembly areas assigned to it and the other party's provisional withdrawal from it, shall be completed within a period not exceeding fifteen (15) days after the date when the cease-fire becomes effective.

The general delineation of the provisional assembly areas is set out in the maps[1] annexed to the present Agreement.

[1] Department of State Bulletin, Aug. 2, 1954, p. 163.

In order to avoid any incidents, no troops shall be stationed less than 1,500 metres from the lines delimiting the provisional assembly areas.

During the period until the transfers are concluded, all the coastal islands west of the following lines shall be included in the Haiphong perimeter: meridian of the southern point of Kebao Island—northern coast of the Ile Rousse (excluding the island), extended as far a the meridian of Campha-Mines—meridian of Champha-Mines.

2. The withdrawals and transfers shall be effected in the following order and within the following periods (from the date of the entry into force of the present Agreement):

Forces of the French Union

	Days
Hanoi perimeter	80
Haiduong perimeter	100
Haiphong perimeter	300

Forces of the People's Army of Viet-Nam

Ham Tan and Xuyenmec provisional assembly area	80
Central Viet-Nam provisional assembly area—first installment	80
Plaine des Joncs provisional assembly area	100
Point Camau provisional assembly area	200
Central Viet-Nam Provisional assembly area—last installment	300

CHAPTER III—BAN ON INTRODUCTION OF FRESH TROOPS, MILITARY PERSONNEL, ARMS AND MUNITIONS, MILITARY BASES

Article 16

With effect from the date of entry into force of the present Agreement, the introduction into Viet-Nam of any troop reinforcements and additional military personnel is prohibited.

It is understood, however, that the rotation of units and groups of personnel, the arrival in Viet-Nam of individual personnel on a temporary duty basis and the return to Viet-Nam of individual personnel after short periods of leave or temporary duty outside Viet-Nam shall be permitted under the conditions laid down below:

(a) Rotation of units (defined in paragraph (c) of this Article) and groups of personnel shall not be permitted for French Union troops stationed north of the provisional military demarcation line laid down in Article 1 of the present Agreement, during the withdrawal period provided for in Article 2.

However, under the heading of individual personnel not more than fifty (50) men, including officers, shall during any one month be permitted to enter that part of the country north of the provisional military demarcation line on a temporary duty basis or to return there after short periods of leave or temporary duty outside Viet-Nam.

(b) "Rotation" is defined as the replacement of units or groups of personnel by other units of the same echelon or by personnel who are arriving in Viet-Nam territory to do their overseas service there;

(c) The units rotated shall never be larger than a battalion—or the corresponding echelon for air and naval forces;

(d) Rotation shall be conducted on a man-for-man basis, provided, however, that in any one quarter neither party shall introduce more than fifteen thousand five hundred (15,500) members of its armed forces into Viet-Nam under the rotation forces.

(e) Rotation units (defined in paragraph (c) of this Article) and groups of personnel, and the individual personnel mentioned in this Article, shall enter and leave Viet-Nam only through the entry points enumerated in Article 20 below:

(f) Each party shall notify the Joint Commission and the International Commission at least two days in advance of any arrivals or departures of units, groups of personnel and individual personnel in or from Viet-Nam. Reports on the arrivals or departures of units, groups of personnel and individual personnel in or from Viet-Nam shall be submitted daily to the Joint Commission and the International Commission.

All the above-mentioned notifications and reports shall indicate the places and dates of arrival or departure and the number of persons arriving or departing.

(g) The International Commission, through its Inspection Teams, shall supervise and inspect the rotation of units and groups of personnel and the arrival and departure of individual personnel as authorized above, at the points of entry enumerated in Article 20 below.

Article 17

(a) With effect from the date of entry into force of the present Agreement, the introduction into Viet-Nam of any reinforcements in the form of all types of arms, munitions and other war material, such as combat aircraft, naval craft, pieces of ordnance, jet engines and jet weapons and armoured vehicles, is prohibited.

(b) It is understood, however, that war material, arms and munitions which have been destroyed, damaged, worn out or used up after the cessation of hostilities may be replaced on the basis of piece-for-piece of the same type and with similar characteristics. Such replacements of war materials, arms and munitions shall not be permitted for French Union troops stationed north of the provisional military demarcation line laid down in Article 1 of the present Agreement, during the withdrawal period provided for in Article 2.

Naval craft may perform transport operations between the regrouping zones.

(c) The war material, arms and munitions for replacement purposes provided for in paragraph (b) of this Article, shall be introduced into Viet-Nam only through the points of entry enumerated in Article 20 below. War material, arms and munitions to be replaced shall be shipped from Viet-Nam only through the points of entry enumerated in Article 20 below;

(d) Apart from the replacements permitted within the limits laid down in paragraph (b) of this Article, the introduction of war material, arms and munitions of all types in the form of unassembled parts for subsequent assembly is prohibited;

(e) Each party shall notify the Joint Commission and the International Commission at least two days in advance of any arrivals or departures which may take place of war material, arms and munitions of all types.

In order to justify the requests for the introduction into Viet-Nam of arms, munitions and other war material (as defined in paragraph (a) of this Article) for replacement purposes, a report concerning each incoming shipment shall be submitted to the Joint Commission and the International Commission. Such reports shall indicate the use made of the items so replaced.

(f) The International Commission, through its Inspection Teams, shall supervise and inspect the replacements permitted in the circumstances laid down in this Article, at the points of entry enumerated in Article 20 below.

Article 18

With effect from the date of entry into force of the present Agreement, the establishment of new military bases is prohibited throughout Viet-Nam territory.

Article 19

With effect from the date of entry into force of the present Agreement, no military base under the control of a foreign State may be established in the regrouping zone of either party; the two parties shall ensure that the zones assigned to them do not adhere to any military alliance and are not used for the resumption of hostilities or to further an agressive policy.

Article 20

The points of entry into Viet-Nam for rotation personnel and replacements of material are fixed as follows:

Zones to the north of the provisional military demarcation line: Laokay, Langson, Tien-Yen, Haiphong, Vinh, Dong-Hoi, Muong-Sen;

Zone to the south of the provisional military demarcation line: Tourane, Quinhon, Nhatrang, Bangoi, Saigon, Cap St. Jacques, Tanchau.

CHAPTER IV—PRISONERS OF WAR AND CIVILIAN INTERNEES

Article 21

The liberation and repatriation of all prisoners of war and civilian internees detained by each of the two parties at the coming into force of the present Agreement shall be carried out under the following conditions:

(a) All prisoners of war and civilian internees of Viet-Nam, French and other nationalities captured since the beginning of hostilities in Viet-Nam during military operations or in any other circumstances of war in any part of the territory of Viet-Nam shall be liberated within a period of thirty (30) days after the date when the cease-fire becomes effective in each theatre.

(b) The term "civilian internees" is understood to mean all persons who, having in any way contributed to the political and armed struggle between the two parties, have been arrested for that reason and have been kept in detention by either party during the period of hostilities.

(c) All prisoners of war and civilian internees held by either party shall be surrendered to the appropriate authorities of the other party, who shall give them all possible assistance in proceeding to their country of origin, place of habitual residence or the zone of their choice.

CHAPTER V—MISCELLANEOUS

Article 22

The Commanders of the Forces of the two parties shall ensure that persons under their respective commands who violate any of the provisions of the present Agreement are suitably punished.

Article 23

In cases in which the place of burial is known and the existence of graves has been established, the Commander of the Forces of either party shall, within a specific period after the entry into force of the Armistice Agreement, permit the graves service personnel of the other party to enter the part of Viet-Nam territory under their military control for the purpose of finding and removing the bodies of deceased military personnel of that party, including the bodies of deceased prisoners of war. The Joint Commission shall determine the procedures and the time limit for the performance of this task. The Commanders of the Forces of the two parties shall communicate to each other all information in their possession as to the place of burial of military personnel of the other party.

Article 24

The present Agreement shall apply to all the armed forces of either party. The armed forces of each party shall respect the demilitarized zone and the territory under the military control of the other party, and shall commit no act and undertake no operation against the other party and shall not engage in blockade of any kind in Viet-Nam.

For the purposes of the present Article, the word "territory" includes territorial waters and air space.

Article 25

The Commanders of the Forces of the two parties shall afford full protection and all possible assistance and co-operation to the Joint Commission and its joint groups and to the International Commission and its inspection teams in the performance of the functions and tasks assigned to them by the present Agreement.

Article 26

The costs involved in the operations of the Joint Commission and joint groups and of the International Commission and its Inspection Teams shall be shared equally between the two parties.

Article 27

The signatories of the present Agreement and their successors in their functions shall be responsible for ensuring and observance and enforcement of the terms and provisions thereof. The Commanders of the Forces of the two parties shall, within their respective commands, take all steps and make all arrangements necessary to ensure full compliance with all the provisions of the present Agreement by all elements and military personnel under their command.

The procedures laid down in the present Agreement shall, whenever necessary, be studied by the Commanders of the two parties and, if necessary, defined more specifically by the Joint Commission.

CHAPTER VI—JOINT COMMISSION AND INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR SUPERVISION AND CONTROL IN VIET-NAM

28. Responsibility for the execution of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities shall rest with the parties.

29. An International Commission shall ensure the control and supervision of this execution.

30. In order to facilitate, under the conditions shown below, the execution of provisions concerning joint actions by the two parties, a Joint Commission shall be set up in Viet-Nam.

31. The Joint Commission shall be composed of an equal number of representatives of the Commanders of the two parties.

32. The Presidents of the delegations to the Joint Commission shall hold the rank of General.

The Joint Commission shall set up joint groups the number of which shall be determined by mutual agreement between the parties. The joint groups shall be composed of an equal number of officers from both parties. Their location on the demarcation line between the regrouping zones shall be determined by the parties whilst taking into account the powers of the Joint Commission.

33. The Joint Commission shall ensure the execution of the following provisions of the Agreement on the cessation of hostilities:

(a) A simultaneous and general cease-fire in Viet-Nam for all regular and irregular armed forces of the two parties.

(b) A re-groupment of the armed forces of the two parties.

(c) Observance of the demarcation lines between the regrouping zones and of the demilitarized sectors.

Within the limits of its competence it shall help the parties to execute the said provisions, shall ensure liaison between them for the purpose of preparing and carrying out plans for the application of these provisions, and shall endeavor to solve such disputed questions as may arise between the parties in the course of executing these provisions.

34. An International Commission shall be set up for the control and supervision over the application of the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet-Nam. It shall be composed of representatives of the following States: Canada, India and Poland.

It shall be presided over by the Representative of India.

35. The International Commission shall set up fixed and mobile inspection teams, composed of an equal number of officers appointed by each of the above-mentioned States. The fixed teams shall be located at the following points: Laokay, Langson, Tien-Yen, Haiphong, Vinh, Dong-Hoi, Muong-Sen, Tourane, Quinhor, Nhatrang, Bangai, Saigon, Cap St. Jacques, Tranchau, These points of location may, at a later date, be altered at the request of the Joint Commission, or one of the parties, or of the International Commission itself, by agreement between the International Commission and the command of the party concerned. The zones of action of the mobile teams shall be the regions bordering the land and sea frontiers of Viet-Nam, the demarcation lines between the re-grouping zones and the demilitarized zones. Within the limits of these zones they shall have the right to move freely and shall receive from the local civil and military authorities all facilities they may require for the fulfillment of their tasks (provision of personnel, placing at their disposal documents needed for supervision, summoning witnesses necessary for holding enquiries, ensuring the security and freedom of movement of the inspection teams etc. . .). They shall have at their disposal such modern means of transport, observation and communication as they may require. Beyond the zones of action as defined above, the mobile teams may, by agreement with the command of the party concerned, carry out other movements within the limits of the tasks given them by the present agreement.

36. The International Commission shall be responsible for supervising the proper execution by the parties of the provisions of the agreement. For this purpose it shall fulfill the tasks of control, observation, inspection and investigation connected with the application of the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities, and it shall in particular:

(a) Control the movement of the armed forces of the two parties, effected within the framework of the regroupment plan.

(b) Supervise the demarcation lines between the re-grouping areas, and also the demilitarized zones.

(c) Control the operations of releasing prisoners of war and civilian internees.

(d) Supervise at ports and airfields as well as along all frontiers of Viet-Nam the execution of the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities, regulating the introduction into the country of armed forces, military personel and of all kinds of arms, munitions and war material.

37. The International Commission shall, through the medium of the inspection teams mentioned above, and as soon as possible either on its own initiative, or at the request of the Joint Commission, or of one of the parties, undertake the necessary investigations both documentary and on the ground.

38. The inspection teams shall submit to the International Commission the results of their supervision, their investigation and their observations, furthermore they shall draw up such special reports as they may consider necessary or as may be requested from them by the Commission. In the case of a disagreement within the teams, the conclusions of each member shall be submitted to the Commission.

39. If any one inspection team is unable to settle an incident or considers that there is a violation or a threat of a serious violation the International Commission shall be informed; the latter shall study the reports and the conclusions of the inspection teams and shall inform the parties of the measures which should be taken for the settlement of the incident, ending of the violation or removal of the threat of violation.

40. When the Joint Commission is unable to reach an agreement on the interpretation to be given to some provision or on the appraisal of a fact, the International Commission shall be informed of the disputed question. Its recommendations shall be sent directly to the parties and shall be notified to the Joint Commission.

41. The recommendations of the International Commission shall be adopted by majority vote, subject to the provisions contained in article 42. If the votes are divided the chairman's vote shall be decisive.

The International Commission may formulate recommendations concerning amendments and additions which should be made to the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet-Nam, in order to ensure a more effective execution of that agreement. These recommendations shall be adopted unanimously.

42. When dealing with questions concerning violations, or threats of violations, which might lead to a resumption of hostilities, namely:

(a) Refusal by the armed forces of one party to effect the movements provided for in the regroupment plan;

(b) Violation by the armed forces of one of the parties of the regrouping zones, territorial waters, or air space of the other party; the decisions of the International Commission must be unanimous.

43. If one of the parties refuses to put into effect a recommendation of the International Commission, the parties concerned or the Commission itself shall inform the members of the Geneva Conference.

If the International Commission does not reach unanimity in the cases provided for in article 42, it shall submit a majority report and one or more minority reports to the members of the Conference.

The International Commission shall inform the members of the Conference in all cases where its activity is being hindered.

44. The International Commission shall be set up at the time of the cessation of hostilities in Indo-China in order that it should be able to fulfill the tasks provided for in article 36.

45. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Viet-Nam shall act in close co-operation with the International Commissions for Supervision and Control in Cambodia and Laos.

The Secretaries-General of these three Commissions shall be responsible for co-ordinating their work and for relations between them.

46. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Viet-Nam may, after consultation with the International Commissions for Supervision and Control in Cambodia and Laos, and having regard to the development of the situation in Cambodia and Laos, progressively reduce its activities. Such a decision must be adopted unanimously.

47. All the provisions of the present Agreement, save the second sub-paragraph of Article 11, shall enter into force at 2400 hours (Geneva time) on 22 July 1954.

Done in Geneva at 2400 hours on the 20th of July 1954 in French and in Viet-Namese, both texts being equally authentic.

For the Commander-in-Chief of the People's Army of Viet-Nam

TA-QUANG BUU,
Vice-Minister of National Defence of the Democratic Republic of Viet-Nam.

For the Commander-in-Chief of the French Union Forces in Indo-China

Brigadier-General DELTEIL.

ANNEX TO THE AGREEMENT ON THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN VIET-NAM

I. DELINEATION OF THE PROFESSIONAL MILITARY DEMARCATION LINE AND THE DEMILITARIZED ZONE

(Article 1 of the Agreement: Reference Map: Indo-China 1/100,000)

(a) The provisional military demarcation line is fixed as follows, reading from east to west: the mouth of the Song Ben Hat (Cua Tung River) and the course of that river (known as the Rao Thanh in the mountains) to the village of Bo Ho Su, then the parallel of Bo Ho Su to the Laos-Viet-Nam frontier.

(b) The demilitarized zone shall be delimited by Trung Gia Military Commission in accordance with the provisions of article 1 of the Agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet-Nam.

II. GENERAL DELINEATION OF THE PROVISIONAL ASSEMBLY AREAS

(Article 15 of the Agreement; Reference Maps: Indo-China 1/400,000)

(a) North Viet-Nam

Delineation of the boundary of the provisional assembly area of the French Union forces

1. The perimeter of Hanoi is delimited by the arc of a circle with a radius of 15 kilometres, having as its centre the right bank abutment of Doumer Bridge and running westwards from the Red River to the Rapids Canal in the northeast.

In this particular case no forces of the French Union shall be stationed less than 2 kilometres from this perimeter, on the inside thereof.

2. The perimeter of Haiphong shall be delimited by the Song-Van-Uc as far as Kim Thanh and a line running from the Song-Van-Uc three kilometres northeast of Kim Thanh to cut Road No. 18 two kilometres east of Mao-Khé. Thence a line running three kilometres north of Road 18 to Cho-Troi and a straight line from Cho-Troi to the Mong-Duong ferry.

3. A corridor contained between:

In the south, the Red River from Thanh-Tri to Bang-Nho, thence a line joining the latter point to Do-My (South-west of Kesat), Gia-Loc and Trien Kieu;

In the north, a line running the Rapids Canal at a distance of 1,500 metres to the north of the Canal, passing three kilometres north of Pha-Lai and Seven Pogodas and thence parallel to Road No. 18 to its point of intersection with the perimeter of Haiphong.

Note: Throughout the period of evacuation of the perimeter of Hanoi, the river forces of the French Union shall enjoy complete freedom of movement on the Song-Van-Uc. And the forces of the People's Army of Viet-Nam shall withdraw three kilometres south of the south bank of the Song-Van-Uc.

Boundary between the perimeter of Hanoi and the perimeter of Haiduong

A straight line running from the Rapids Canal three kilometres west of Chi-ne and ending at Do-My (eight kilometres south-west of Kesat).

(b) Central Viet-Nam

Delineation of the boundary of the provisional assembly area of the forces of the Viet-Nam People's Army south of the Col des Nuages parallel

The perimeter of the Central Viet-Nam area shall consist of the administrative boundaries of the provinces of Quang-Ngai and Binh-Dinh as they were defined before the hostilities.

(c) South Viet-Nam

Three provisional assembly areas shall be provided for the forces of the People's Army of Viet-Nam.

The boundaries of these areas are as follows:

1. Xuyen-Moc, Ham-Tan Area

Western boundary: The course of the Song-Ray extended northwards as far as Road No. 1 to a point thereon eight kilometres east of the intersection of Road No. 1 and Road No. 3.

Northern boundary: Road No. 1 from the above-mentioned intersection to the intersection of Route Communale No. 9 situated 27 kilometres west-south-west of Phanthiet and from that intersection a straight line to Kim Thanh on the coast.

2. Plain des Joncs Area

Northern boundary: The Viet-Nam-Cambodia frontier.

Western boundary: A straight line from Tong-Binh to Binh-Thanh.

Southern boundary: Course of the Fleuve Antérieur (Mekong) to ten kilometres south-east of Cao Lanh. From that point, a straight line as far as Ap-My-Dien, and from Ap-My-Dien a line parallel to and three kilometres east, and then south of the Tong Doc-Loc Canal, this line reaches My-Hanh-Dong and thence Hung-Thanh-My.

Eastern boundary: A straight line from Huong-Thanh-My running northwards to the Cambodian frontier south of Doi-bao-Voi.

3. Point Camau Area

Northern boundary: The Song-Cai-lon from its mouth to its junction with the Rach-Nuoc-Trong, thence the Rach-Nuoc-Trong to the bend five kilometres north-east of Ap-Xeo-La. Thereafter a line to the Ngan-Dua Canal and following that Canal as far as Vinh-Hung. Finally, from Vinh-Hung a north-south line to the sea.

12. FINAL DECLARATION OF GENEVA CONFERENCE, JULY 21, 1954[1]

Final declaration, dated July 21, 1954, of the Geneva Conference on the problem of restoring peace in Indo-China, in which the representatives of Cambodia, the Democratic Republic of Viet-Nam, France, Laos, the People's Republic of China, the State of Viet-Nam, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America took part.

1. The Conference takes note of the agreements ending hostilities in Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam and organizing international control and the supervision of the execution of the provisions of these agreements.

2. The Conference expresses satisfaction at the ending of hostilities in Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam; the Conference expresses its conviction that the execution of the provisions set out in the present declaration and in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities will permit Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam henceforth to play their part, in full independence and sovereignty, in the peaceful community of nations.

3. The Conference takes note of the declarations made by the Governments of Cambodia and of Laos of their intention to adopt measures permitting all citizens to take their place in the national community, in particular by participating in the next general elections, which, in conformity with the constitution of each of theese countries, shall take place in the course of the year 1955, by secret ballot and in conditions of respect for fundamental freedoms.

4. The Conference takes note of the clauses in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet-Nam prohibiting the introduction into Viet-Nam of foreign troops and military personnel as well as of all kinds of arms and munitions. The Conference also takes note of the declarations made by the Governments of Cambodia and Laos of their resolution not to request foreign aid, whether in war material, in personnel or in instructors except for the purpose of the effective defence of their territory and, in the case of Laos, to the extent defined by the agreements on the cessation of hostilities in Laos.

5. The Conference takes note of the clauses in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet-Nam to the effect that no miliary base under the control of a foreign State may be esablished in the regrouping zones of the two parties, the latter having the obligation to see that the zones allotted to them shall not constitute part of any miliary alliance and shall not be utilized for the resumption of hostilities or in the service of an aggressive policy. The Conference also takes note of the declarations of the Governments of Cambodia and Laos to the effect that they will not join in any agreement with other states if this agreement includes the obligation to participate in a military alliance not in conformity with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations or, in the case of Laos, with the principles of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Laos or, so long as their security is not threatened, the obligation to establish bases on Cambodian or Laotian territory for the military forces of foreign Powers.

6. The Conference recognizes that the essential purpose of the agreement relating to Viet-Nam is to settle military questions with a view to ending hostilities and that the military demarcation line is provisional and should not in any way be interpreted as constituting a political or territorial boundary. The Conference expresses its conviction that the execution of the provisions set out in the present declaration and in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities creates the necessary basis for the achievement in the near future of a political settlement in Viet-Nam.

7. The Conference declares that, so far as Viet-Nam is concerned, the settlement of political problems, effected on the basis of respect for the principles of independence, unity and territorial integrity, shall permit the Viet-Namese people to enjoy the fundamental freedoms, guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot. In order to ensure that sufficient progress in the restoration of peace has been made, and that all the necessary conditions obtain for free expression of the national will, general elections shall be held in July 1956, under the supervision of an international commission composed of representatives of the Member States of the International Supervisory Commission, referred to in the agreement on the cessation of hostilities. Consultations will be held on this subject between the competent representatives authorities of the two zones from 20 July 1955 onwards.

8. The provisions of the agreements on the cessation of hostilities intended to ensure the protection of individuals and of property must be most strictly applied and must, in particularly, allow everyone in Viet-Nam to decide freely in which zone he wishes to live.

9. The competent representative authorities of the Northern and Southern zones of Viet-Nam, as well as the authorities of Laos and Cambodia, must not permit any individual or collective reprisals against persons who have collaborated in any way with one of the parties during the war, or against members of such persons' families.

10. The Conference takes note of the declaration of the Government of the French Republic to the effect that it is ready to withdraw its troops from the territory of Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam, at the request of the governments concerned and within periods which shall be fixed by agreement between the parties except in the cases where, by agreement between the two parties, a certain number of French troops shall remain at specified points and for a specified time.

11. The Conference takes note of the declaration of the French Government to the effect that for the settlement of all the problems connected with the re-establishment and consolidation of peace in Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam, the French Government will proceed from the principle of respect for the independence and sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam.

12. In their relations with Cambodia, Laos, and Viet-Nam, each member of the Geneva Conference undertakes to respect the sovereignty, the independence, the unity and the territorial integrity of the above-mentioned states, and to refrain from any interference in their internal affairs.

13. The members of the Conference to consult one another on any question which may be referred to them by the International Supervisory Commission in order to study such measures as may prove necessary to ensure that the agreements on the cessation of hostilities in Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam are respected.

13. THE CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENTS IN INDOCHINA:

Statement by the President, July 21, 1954[1]

I am glad, of course, that agreement has been reached at Geneva to stop the bloodshed in Indochina.

The United States has not been a belligerent in the war. The primary responsibility for the settlement in Indochina rested with those nations which participated in the fighting. Our role at Geneva has been at all times to try to be helpful where desired and to aid France and Cambodia, Laos, and Viet-Nam to obtain a just and honorable settlement which will take into account the needs of the interested people. Accordingly, the United States has not itself been party to or bound by the decisions taken by the Conference, but it is our hope that it will lead to the establishment of peace consistent with the rights and the needs of the countries concerned. The agreement contains features which we do not like, but a great deal depends on how they work in practice.

The United States is issuing at Geneva a statement to the effect that it is not prepared to join in the Conference declaration, but, as loyal members of the United Nations, we also say that, in compliance with the obligations and principles contained in article 2 of the United Nations Charter, the United States will not use force to disturb the settlement. We also say that any renewal of Communist aggression would be viewed by us as a matter of grave concern.

As evidence of our resolve to assist Cambodia and Laos to play their part, in full independence and sovereignty, in the peaceful community of free nations, we are requesting the agreement of the Governments of Cambodia and Laos to our appointment of an Ambassador or Minister to be resident at their respective capitals (Phnom Penh and Vientiane). We already have a Chief of Mission at Saigon, the capital of Viet-Nam, and this Embassy will, of course, be maintained.

The United States is actively pursuing discussions with other free nations with a view to the rapid organization of a collective defense in Southeast Asia in order to prevent further direct or indirect Communist aggression in that general area.

(This unilateral declaration by the United States Government sets forth its position with regard to the Geneva Accords, which it did not sign.)

14. STATEMENT BY THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE[1] AT THE CONCLUDING PLENARY SESSION OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE, JULY 21, 1954[2]

As I stated on July 18, my Government is not prepared to join in a declaration by the Conference such as is submitted. However, the United States makes this unilateral declaration of its position in these matters:

DECLARATION

The Government of the United States being resolved to devote its efforts to the strengthening of peace in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations takes note of the agreements concluded at Geneva on July 20 and 21, 1954 between (a) The Franco Loatian Command and the Command of the Peoples Army of Viet-Nam; (b) the Royal Khmer Army Command and the Command of the Peoples Army of Viet-Nam; (c) Franco-Vietnamese Command and the Command of the Peoples Army of Viet-Nam and of paragraphs 1 to 12 inclusive of the declaration presented to the Geneva Conference on July 21, 1954 declares with regard to the aforesaid agreements and paragraphs that (i) it will refrain from the threat or the use of force to disturb them, in accordance with Article 2(4) of the Charter of the United Nations dealing with the obligation of members to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force; and (ii) it would view any renewal of the aggression in violation of the aforesaid agreements with grave concern and as seriously threatening international peace and security.

In connection with the statement in the declaration concerning free elections in Viet-Nam my Government wishes to make clear its position which it has expressed in a declaration made in Washington on June 29, 1954, as follows:

"In the case of nations now divided against their will, we shall continue to seek to achieve unity through free elections supervised by the United Nations to insure that they are conducted fairly."

With respect to the statement made by the representative of the State of Viet-Nam, the United States reiterates its traditional position that peoples are entitled to determine their own future and that it will not join in an arrangement which would hinder this. Nothing in its declaration just made is intended to or does indicate any departure from this traditional position.

We share the hope that the agreements will permit Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam to play their part, in full independence and sovereignty, in the peaceful community of nations, and will enable the peoples of that area to determine their own future.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED PUBLIC DEFENDER ACT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention this afternoon to the President's proposed Public Defender Act for the District of Columbia which has been pending since July 11. It is essential that we act immediately on this legislation.

In 1960 we created a Legal Aid Agency for the District with a small staff and limited jurisdiction. It was an experiment and a highly successful one. Since then, however, crime has increased dramatically, the criminal law has been changed radically by the courts, the backlog of court cases has risen and the problem of providing adequate representation to indigent defendants has increased accordingly.

Moreover, since 1960, we have realized that professional defense services in adult criminal cases is not all that is needed. There are increasing demands for court appointed counsel in serious misdemeanor cases, but the Legal Aid Agency has no express authority to take such cases. Counsel is required in probation and parole revocation but the Legal Aid statute is silent on this. Counsel is obviously needed in narcotic addict commitment and mental commitment cases—where the defendant also faces incarceration—but there is no direct authority for the Legal Aid Agency to take such cases.

The Public Defender Act would expressly authorize representation in all these areas and would provide sufficient staff. I might also add that it would provide sufficient staff pay to get the type of competence necessary to handle such cases.

The legislation proposes no radical departure or novel idea. Essentially it would bring the District's criminal justice system up to date so that it is capable of facing the problems before us. We must act promptly on this legislation. We cannot afford to fall further behind.

YALE MEDICINE BULLETIN COMMENDS WEST HAVEN, CONN., VA HOSPITAL

HON. JOHN S. MONAGAN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the fall 1969 issue of Yale Medicine which is the alumni bulletin of the school of medicine, Yale University, contains a fine article on the West Haven Veterans' Administration hospital located in West Haven, Conn.

From my own experience in working with veterans in Connecticut and the Veterans' Administration, I am aware of the outstanding work done for many years at the West Haven hospital and which is currenly continuing under the directorship of Mr. David Anton, a very able and dedicated administrator, aided by a loyal and efficient staff.

I insert the article for the information and consideration of my colleagues:

THE VETERANS ADMINISTRATION HOSPITAL

When Dean Francis Blake accepted the Newington Veterans Administration Hospital as an affiliated hospital in 1946, it was only as a temporary liaison, since a new hospital was to be built in West Haven, about 35 miles closer to the medical school.

The new hospital, built on the site of the former William Wirt Winchester Hospital, consists of a 500-bed General Medical and Surgical Building and a 400-bed Tuberculosis Building. The older buildings linking the two new structures were refurbished and became the Administration Building. The whole complex, set in 43 acres, rose above a commanding hill, dominating West Haven "like a colossus."

In April, 1953, the West Haven Veterans Administration Hospital opened the doors of the Tuberculosis Building, and immediately began its association with Yale, guided by a Dean's Committee. The General Medical and Surgical Building opened in September, 1953. With changing times and disease patterns, these two major clinical buildings are referred to simply as Buildings No. 1 and No. 2.

The hospital is headed by David Anton, the fourth director in its 16-year history. The non-professional side of the hospital operates under the assistant hospital director, Calvin Chandler. Professional programs are the responsibility of the chief of staff, Dr. Raymond Yesner, who has been chief of the Laboratory Service at West Haven since the hospital's inception, and who is an associate professor of pathology at the medical school. As chief of staff, he has an advisory group, consisting of the various chiefs of services. He is supported by an associate chief of staff for administration, Paul Eule, and an associate chief of staff for research, Dr. Robert Green, professor of medicine. It is expected that another position, that of associate chief of staff for education, will be filled at some time in the future. Dr. Yesner is also an associate dean of the medical school, with the responsibility for Veterans Hospital affairs.

The Medical Service at the VA Hospital has a model relationship with the Department of Internal Medicine at Yale and plays a major role in its training programs. There are 68 medical beds for acutely ill patients plus a six-bed intensive care unit and a four-bed coronary care unit. Last year 1,709 patients were admitted to the acute medical service. Staffing is provided by eight full-time Yale faculty members and two part-time staff physicans. The chief of the Medical Service is Dr. Thomas T. Amatruda, Jr., associate professor of medicine.

Yale-New Haven Medical Center house staff members are assigned in rotation to the Medical Service during their internship and residency training. In addition, there are specialty training programs in metabolism and endocrinology, hematology and oncology, gastroenterology, dermatology, and cardiology which complement similar programs at the Yale-New Haven Hospital.

During the academic year, approximately half the third- and fourth-year medical students are assigned to West Haven for their clinical clerkships on the acute medical wards. Under the new curriculum, many second-year students will also receive their initial clinical experience there.

FIRST HEMODIALYSIS IN STATE

In December of 1966, the first successful hospital-based hemodialysis program in the enter State of Connecticut was started at the West Haven VA Hospital. In May of 1968, a modern nine-bed dialysis unit was opened for out-patient chronic hemodialysis; at present 16 patients are involved in the program. In the near future it is hoped that the hospital-based unit will be supplemented by a home dialysis program to aid in the management of some patients who currently travel as far as 85 miles twice a week for their dialysis.

In addition to the responsibilities of patient care and teaching, the full-time staff are actively engaged in clinical and laboratory research in the areas of infectious diseases, metabolism and endocrinology, renal disease, cardiovascular disease, liver disease, gastroenterology, oncology, and hematology.

The Surgical Service has a 179-bed capacity. Approximately 100 of these beds are for the various surgical specialities. Each of the specialty services is under the direction of the head of the specialty section at Yale.

The General Surgical Service has a new chief, Dr. Edward Storer, professor of surgery, and two full-time and three part-time surgeons who have faculty appointments.

The VA surgical program functions as an integral part of the Department of Surgery at Yale. There is complete integration of the intern and resident training programs, and an active student teaching program has been established. Staff members devote a major part of their time to the teaching of residents, interns, and medical students. The Surgical Service also has frequent consultations with university surgeons for both teaching and patient care, and surgeons from the medical school attend on the wards on a rotating schedule.

A new operating room recovery room and a ten-bed intensive care unit has recently been completed and are in operation. The intensive care unit, which has two isolation cubicles, is equipped with modern monitoring devices.

The Pathology Service is a centralized operation combining pathologic anatomy and clinical pathology in one department; thus the residency training program leads to combined Board certification. In addition to Dr. Yesner, there are four full-time pathologists and a research associate. Pathologic anatomy is very well equipped with double-headed teaching microscopes, cryostats, and excellent new electron microscope suite, histology and histochemistry laboratories, and closed circuit television for autopsies and the tumor clinics. The clinical pathology workload has been growing steadily at about 25 per cent per year and now stands at well over a million tests annually. This is handled by extensive automation, with 20 analyzer channels operating continuously in chemistry and a 7-channel analyzer in hematology. The bacteriology laboratories are among the finest in the country and receive many students for training. The tuberculosis bacteriology laboratory has contributed much original research and is scheduled to become a regional laboratory, along with two others in the country, to do definitive identification work on typical and atypical isolated organisms. Blood banking, serology, mycology, and parasitology laboratories complete the spectrum. Residents are also trained in the use of radioisotopes and selected residents may spend six months in the clinical chemistry laboratory at Yale-New Haven Hospital.

COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH SERVICE

The Psychiatry Service has been an integral component of the Yale department since 1953. Under Dr. Louis B. Fierman, associate professor of clinical psychiatry, it now consists of 123 beds, four acute treatment wards, a day hospital and mental hygiene clinic, and a staff of eight psychiatrists. It functions as a community mental health service and processes annually over 800 applicants for admission, of whom about half are referred to other community facilities. There are no locked or chronic wards.

The Psychiatry Service provides a first-year residency training program in cooperation with the Yale Department of Psychiatry. Second- and third-year residency training is also available. Since 1953 the Psychiatry Service has trained 193 residents and, in collaboration with the Veterans Administration Psychology Service, 119 psychology trainees. In addition, the Psychiatry Service is available to Yale medical students for clerkships and elective clinical courses. Training opportunities have also been offered to student nurses from the University of Connecticut and the University of Bridgeport, and ongoing professional training has been provided for social workers and nurses. Psychosomatic teaching has been conducted in collaboration with the Medical and Surgical Services.

The psychiatric research program has had a strong clinical orientation, in psychotherapy, schizophrenic language, the uses of humor, social structure of psychiatric populations, and patient government. Basic research in neurophysiology has also been conducted in collaboration with the Psychology Service on cerebral-sensory-evoked potentials.

The Psychology Service is divided into clinical, counseling, and research sections. The clinical section provides consultation and treatment and assists the Psychiatric Service in its treatment programs. The counseling section is primarily engaged in vocational guidance, rehabilitation counseling, personal adjustment counseling, and retirement counseling. It also utilizes community resources to help the discharged veteran make a successful vocational and social readjustment. The service is strongly research-oriented, four members spending a major portion of their time in research. The staff is inovlved in the supervision of graduate and medical students' theses and the residents' projects. Students from universities throughout the country come to this hospital for training in counseling and neurophysiological, social, and experimental psychology.

REHABILITATION FOR ORTHOPEDIC PATIENTS

The Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation Service is under the direction of Dr. Frederick Dugdale. It is comprised of five therapy sections—physical therapy, occupational therapy, corrective therapy, educational therapy, and manual arts therapy—that contribute to overcoming physical, educational, and vocational handicaps.

In recognition of the frequent need of orthopedic patients for rehabilitation and the need for orthopedic surgeons to be better versed in the prescription of rehabilitation procedures, the service participates actively in the training program for residents. In addition, the surgical residents are invited to attend monthly prosthetic clinics, which provide an opportunity for the resident to correlate his knowledge of amputation surgery with the latest developments in prosthetics and the relationship of both to the patient's ability to walk again.

The Chest Disease Service, headed by Dr. Nicholas D'Esopo, associate clinical professor of medicine, includes a non-tuberculosis medical chest ward, a surgical chest ward, two tuberculosis wards, an emphysema unit, an active out-patient clinic, a pulmonary physiology laboratory, an immunology laboratory, and an inhalation therapy department. A one- or two-year training and research program, principally located at the VA Hospital but closely coordinated with Yale-New Haven, offers a balanced and flexible program in which a trainee or fellow can become an accomplished chest physician and pulmonary physiologist.

When the hospital opened, 400 tuberculosis beds were assigned. Due to the nation-wide decrease in tuberculosis, there are now only two tuberculosis wards, consisting of 96 beds, staffed by full-time staff physicians. The chief of the service is chairman of a cooperative chemotherapy trial involving 26 other VA hospitals, and the service has been continuously active in chemotherapy trials since 1953.

The Intermediate Service is under the direction of Dr. William Braisted. It occupies four wards with a total bed capacity of 168 and has a full-time staff of six physicians. Patients with complicated, usually multisystem and progressive chronic disease, too chronic for acute wards and too sick for nursing homes, are given chronic hospital care, to provide maximum efficiency and pleasure in living within the limits of disability. The Service coordinates physical, corrective, occupational, speech, educational, vocational, psychological, and social therapies.

The chief of the Dental Service is Dr. John Weimer. He is assisted by an oral surgeon and two staff dentists in operating a general six-chair clinic and a tuberculosis two-chair clinic. Both are equipped with the most modern dental equipment from high speed units to the panorex x-ray machine, supported by a complete dental laboratory. There is an approved rotating internship and a training program for dental assistants affiliated with the Eli Whitney Technical School.

Dr. Dorothea Bradford is chief of the Speech Pathology Service, which evaluates and treats language, speech, and voice disorders by acoustic amplification and speech reading. A training program is conducted in communicative disorders.

The Department of Radiology, under Dr. Mary F. Keohane, associate professor of clinical radiology, was completely reorganized five years ago. A full-time staff of five diagnostic radiologists and one radiatherapist is provided, on a contract basis, by Yale. Four residents from Yale-New Haven Hospital rotate through the department at three-month intervals. In diagnostic radiology, the case load has doubled in the last seven years, to 30,000 examinations per year. More than 5 per cent of these are special studies. Four new diagnostic rooms, to be completed by August, 1970, will contain all of the most advanced and sophisticated equipment available. Complete right and left cardiac catheterizations, transseptal catheterizations, and selective coronary angiography are now routinely done in our special diagnostic suite. In spite of the marked increase in both routine examinations and special procedures, our radiologists conduct 30 hours of teaching-work conferences weekly for the interns, residents, and medical students from all services. An active research program is maintained with project participation in both the Departments of Medicine and Surgery, as well as those areas of particular interest to the radiologist.

Among the exciting new developments in the Department of Radiology is the successful establishment of a School of Radiologic Technology presently training 18 students.

Recently the Eastern Blind Rehabilitation Center for the visually impaired veteran was established at West Haven, under the supervision of George M. Gillespie. This center provides basic adjustment to the losses associated with blindness for veterans from the east coast of the United States. Included in each patient's individualized 18-week program is medical care; training in orientation, mobility, manual skills, and communications; and social and vocational counseling. Upon leaving the center the veteran is guided toward academic and vocational training or returns to the positions he held prior to the onset of his blindness.

EASTERN RESEARCH SUPPORT CENTER

Another major regional activity in the Eastern Research Support Center under Dr. Alvan Feinstein, professor of medicine. This center provides assistance to Veterans Administration investigators throughout the east in such areas as experimental design, editing, and computer assistance.

The Neurology Service, headed by Dr. Lewis L. Levy, associate clinical professor, has recently been separated from the Medical Service. New Stroke and Epilepsy Centers will shortly be operative.

Under the direction of Arline E. Burns, the Nursing Service provides quality nursing care and services to patients, both on an in-patient and out-patient basis. There are 20 nursing units for the Medicine, Surgery, Intermediate, Pulmonary Disease, and Psychiatry Services. In addition to these, there are specialized units, such as those for coronary care, medical and surgical intensive care, post-anesthesia, hemodialysis, day hospital (psychiatric service), mental hygiene clinic, operating room, and the Blind Rehabilitation Center. The Nursing Service personnel assigned to the Out-Patient Department provide nursing care and services to patients for pre-admission, in-patient clinics, post-hospital care, and the community home-nursing referral program. Throughout the academic year clinical experience is provided for nursing students from the University of Bridgeport and the University of Connecticut.

The research program at the West Haven VA Hospital commenced with the activation of the institution in 1953, when many of the staff and projects originally at the Newington VA Hospital moved to West Haven. Since then, the number of active research projects has increased by 45 percent; the amount of research space available has more than tripled; and publications have increased sevenfold. Concurrent with these gains, there has been a significant increase in both VA research funds and non-VA grant funds. These assets, coupled with the proximity of the excellent academic, patient care, and research facilities at the Yale-New Haven

Medical Center, have enabled this VA Hospital to attract not only established, independent investigators, but—equally important—young, eager, intellectually responsive researchers whose future scientific contributions will no doubt help mold the shape of patient care in the future.

TAX SHARING IS DANDY, BUT TAX CREDITS ARE SLICKER

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the debate over the administration's plan to begin sharing Federal revenues with State and local governments is capturing wide public attention. The need to help our financially impoverished States and cities is incontestable. The question is how best to extend this help.

The Nixon administration proposes a system of tax sharing that would be returning about $5 billion a year in Federal tax revenues to State and local governments by the mid-1970's.

My bill, H.R. 13663, would instead authorize a tax-credit system that would allow the taxpayer to claim 40 percent of the income taxes he pays to State and local governments against the tax bill he owes to Washington. State and local governments could then pick up this revenue saving in their tax schedules.

As a contribution to the debate, I am inserting herewith in the RECORD the text of an address given recently by Mortimer M. Caplin before the Tax Institute of America symposium on "Tax Incentives" held at Princeton, N.J. Mr. Caplin is a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue and is currently in private law practice.

Reviewing the pro's and con's of both approaches, Mr. Caplin concludes that the tax-credit approach is favorable for several reasons—it is more in line with traditional concepts of States rights and independence, it is simpler to administer, and it is "more familiar to tax legislators and more readily acceptable to Congress from a political and budgeting standpoint."

I commend these arguments to the attention of the Congress:

FEDERAL-STATE TAX SHARING VS. STATE-LOCAL INCOME TAX CREDITS

(By Mortimer M. Caplin)

Politics, it's been said, makes strange bedfellows. True this is for political groups as well as for political ideas and economic views. And true this is for the current interest in shifting both financial resources and decision-making responsibility from the national government in Washington to our numerous state and local governments.

Economist Milton Friedman was one of the early voices to call for federal-state tax sharing. Critical of the spawning patchwork of federal grants to the states for specified purposes, he viewed his new system as a substitute for the old.

Later, Walter Heller, in conjunction with Joseph Pechman of Brookings Institution, sponsored a revenue sharing plan which would complement the federal categorical grants-in-aid program.

In 1964 the Democratic Party platform pledged "development of fiscal policies . . . (to) provide revenue sources to hard-pressed state and local governments." And a few days before the 1964 election, first President Johnson and then Barry Goldwater endorsed federal fiscal policies to strengthen our state and local governments.

Today, in the name of shifting "the balance of political power away from Washington and back to the country and the people", President Nixon is giving his full support to a "taxback" plan which would turn over to the states and localities, without any strings, over $500 million in fiscal 1971 and over $5 billion annually by 1976.

FISCAL SQUEEZE ON STATES AND LOCALITIES

Whether the lable attached is "creative federalism", "new federalism" or just plain "old federalism", the fiscal squeeze on the states and localities is apparent to all. A soaring population, rising levels of affluence, inflation, rapid urbanization, and confrontations in our cities, have all added to the sharp growth in responsibilites and costs of state-local governments.

During the period 1948 to 1967, state outlays more than quadrupled (reaching over $34 billion in 1967), while local expenditures multiplied more than five times (passing $59 billion in 1967). At the same time, federal grants-in-aid were multiplying rapidly: $7 billion in 1960, $21 billion in 1969, and an estimated $25 billion in 1970.

Today, federal grant programs provide about 18% of state and local revenue, and their matching requirements call for state-local expenditures of close to $1 for every $2 of federal grants-in-aid.

Both the fiscal crisis and the need for better financing of state and local governments are urgent problems. Workable solutions must be found for keeping up with present demands on state and local governments, meeting the anticipated growth of these demands, and facing the new responsibilities arising from any shift of responsibility from the federal to the state and local level.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO STATES AND LOCALITIES

Students of public finance are well aware of the vastly superior revenue capacity of the federal government in contrast to states and localities. Relying chiefly on a progressive income tax structure, federal revenues increase faster than the national economy thus creating a large automatic revenue growth capability—which is currently throwing off a growth dividend of over $10 billion a year. At the same time, federal expenditures for current programs (except under wartime conditions) are likely to rise more slowly than the economy.

The contrast is sharp for states and localities: With heavy reliance on sales and property taxes, their revenues are unable to keep pace with the rate of growth of the national economy—while their expenditure requirements for existing programs tend to rise more rapidly than the economy.

Kenneth Galbraith highlighted this fiscal mismatch under our federal system when he noted that "U.S. prosperity seems to give Washington the revenues and the state and local governments the problems".

Traditionally fiscal assistance has been given to state and local governments in three principal ways:

(1) Federal income tax deductions for state and local taxes;

(2) Federal income tax exemption for interest on state and municipal bonds; and

(3) Outright federal grants for specific purposes (so-called categorical grants).

Although 13 states still have not adopted an income tax—and 12 others have been described as "anemic users"—the loss of federal revenue from deductions of state and local individual income taxes amounted to almost $1.5 billion for 1968, and probably will reach close to $2 billion for 1969.

For the state and municipal bond exemption, the loss of federal revenue is over $2.6 billion annually, although the aid to states and localities is estimated to be under $2 billion—represented by the savings achieved through lower interest rates.

As for the outright federal grants, the dollar amount being spent today is about $25 billion a year, spread over some 420 separate grant authorizations.

In brief, these three accepted routes are costing the federal government about $30 billion a year, and yet our states and localities need more funds as they assume additional responsibilities. The old forms of intergovernmental assistance have been found lacking for one reason or another, and the current demand is for new approaches.

Ample room for increased state-local support was believed to exist in the annual $10 billion "growth dividend" built into our federal income tax system and in the budgetary "peace dividend" anticipated after the end of the war in Vietnam. The Vietnam estimate, however, has been reduced sharply from the original $19 billion projection; and the remaining balance will have to meet competing priorities of increasing Social Security benefits, unavoidable increases in normal domestic programs, federal pay raises, as well as President Nixon's new welfare reform and mass transit programs. Further, under the Tax Reform Act of 1969, long range revenue losses could run at the rate of $4 billion a year.

Nevertheless, despite these factors—and the need to maintain fiscal restraint to combat the inflationary forces in our economy—discussion continues on relieving the fiscal plight of our states and localities.

Should the federal government assume increased responsibility for welfare and education?

How about block grants for broad categories of expenditures?

Should there be sharing of a percentage of federal income tax revenues?

Would it be better to have a federal income tax credit for state income taxes?

Which direction shall we follow?

PRESIDENT NIXON'S TAX-SHARING PLAN

On August 13, 1969, President Nixon presented a tax sharing plan aimed at strengthening state and local government so that "by the end of the coming decade, the political landscape of America will be visibly altered, and state and cities will have a far greater share of power and responsibility for solving their own problems." To accomplish this, four major features are proposed in the draft bill which was forwarded to Congress on September 23, 1969:

1. Size of fund: the fund to be shared is a stated percentage of "personal taxable income"—the base on which federal individual income taxes are levied. Today this base is about $300 billion, and it continues to rise with our growing economy. To ease the budget impact, the percentage for the first fiscal year of the plan (1971) is set at only 1/6 of 1% ($500 million). In subsequent fiscal years there are phased increases until a permanent 1% is reached in fiscal 1976—estimated to yield over $5 billion a year by then.

2. Distribution formula: The distribution is made on the basis of each state's share of national population, with an adjustment for the State's revenue effort. A state, therefore, which taxes its citizens more than the national average will receive a proportional bonus. (Revenue effort is defined as the ratio of total general revenues collected by a state and its local governmental units during a given fiscal year to the total personal income of that state.) Thus, a state whose revenue effort is 10% above the national average is provided with a 10 percent bonus above its basic per capital portion of revenue sharing.

3. Local "pass-through": The distribution within states to the local government units is established by a prescribed formula. The total pass through corresponds to the ratio of total local government general revenues raised to the sum of all state and local general revenues raised in the state. In turn, the amount which an individual local government receives corresponds to its share of all local government general revenues raised in the state.

4. Administrative requirements: The only requirements imposed on the states are (a) local sharing, (b) quarterly reporting and accounting, and (c) maintenance of existing state aid to localities. No other strings or limitations are imposed on the use of these funds.

On the pass through of funds to the localities, the Nixon plan contains an optional provision. To provide local flexibility, a state, working with its local governments, has the option of developing an alternative distribution plan. Any alternative, however, must receive sufficient support from both the state and the local government.

If we accept the view that unfettered block grants are the solution for the deep financial trouble of state-local governments, then the administration's tax-sharing plan has much to commend it from the standpoint of simplicity and fairness. Also, it is a modest plan with an ultimate 1% tax-sharing formula—as compared to the Heller-Pechman proposal, which calls for an eventual 2% of the federal individual income tax base.

The question remains, however: Is tax sharing what we as a nation want or, more directly, what Congress will enact?

THE TAX CREDIT APPROACH

On August 19, 1969, Congressman Al Ullman of Oregon proposed that individuals be permitted to claim a credit against federal income taxes for 40% of state and local income taxes paid. This was the first bill to use the tax credit approach alone to alleviate current state and local fiscal needs. The Muskie-Goodell bill introduced on June 25, 1969 took a more comprehensive and complex approach, including a plan which combines both tax sharing and tax credits.

The Muskie-Goodell Intergovernmental Revenue Act of 1969 was introduced at the request of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR), which has long been a champion of tax credits. Its views are bottomed on the strong conviction that the income tax—even if not necessarily the best type of tax in all situations—is a highly desirable and fair tax, and one that is readily adaptable to state and local needs. With an eye to encouraging state-local adoption of income taxes, ACIR has been supporting a federal income tax credit of some 30% to 50% of income taxes paid at the state levels. The credit would be optional, with the federal deduction of 100% of state-local income taxes paid still being available to taxpayers whose marginal tax rates exceed the 30%–50% figure. The credit would reduce the net income tax payable to the federal government and the states would thereby be stimulated to pick up the difference by raising their own income tax rates.

The interplay of tax sharing and tax credits are found under the first two of the five titles of the Muskie-Goodell bill:

Title I permits federal distribution of general support payments to state and local governments on the basis of population adjusted for tax effort—in accordance with the following:

a. It sets aside federal revenue equal to the average of 1% of the federal taxable income base and 25% of state income tax collections.

b. Population dominates as the distribution factor, but the adjustment for tax effort would shift about 25% of the funds to high-effort states and encourage state-local maintenance of the tax effort.

c. Special fiscal needs of big cities and counties are recognized in two ways: (i) only cities and counties with populations over 50,000 are assured a share, and (ii) in determining their shares, double weight is given to their own receipts.

d. State alternative plans for the use of funds are permitted under conditions acceptable to the cities and counties.

Title II allows taxpayers the option of either itemizing their state income tax payments or claiming a credit of 40% of such payment against their federal income tax liability.

Title III authorizes the U.S. Treasury to collect state personal income taxes for states under terms mutually agreeable to the Secretary of the Treasury and the individual states.

Title IV enlarges and restructures the federal tax credit for state death taxes, provided a state adopts an estate-type tax and increases its death tax rates.

Title V permits states and their localities to tax the personal property of private individuals located in enclaves under exclusive federal jurisdiction.

In support of the bill, ACIR testified that while conventionally tax sharing and tax credits have been "strong competitors" for reinforcing state-local fiscal independence, "only by joining together their unique virtues is it possible to reach several other important intergovernmental fiscal objectives":

"Federal tax credits stand out as the instrument of choice for creating a less competitive intergovernmental tax environment thereby strengthening the revenue generating power of state and local governments. However, this approach can aggravate interstate fiscal disparities by providing the greatest benefit to jurisdictions with the highest personal income.

"Revenue sharing on the other hand gets the highest marks when it comes to enhancing the budgetary discretion of state and local officials while reducing intergovernmental fiscal disparities. However, it is vulnerable to the charge that it divorces tax and expenditure responsibilities."

According to ACIR, it is only by linking these two aid approaches that we can "both harness their strengths and minimize their weaknesses".

As might be expected, the administration takes sharp issue with many of the approaches of the Muskie-Goodell bill, particularly the dollar costs. The administration would release $500 million in 1971, reaching the $5 billion level after five years. In contrast, Muskie-Goodell would cost the the federal government in revenue foregone $5.4 billion in the first year (1970), $7.1 billion in 1971 and almost $10 billion in 1972.

CONCLUSION

Where do we go from here? My own view is that—particularly in light of current budgetary pressures and the level of our presence in Vietnam—we are still a long way off from blank check grants to the states and localities.

Aside from federal fiscal demands, revenue sharing plans question our most fundamental views of federalism and challenge the crucial spending-control roles at different levels of our federal-state hierarchy. Categorical grants have kept these controls in the hands of the Congress and administrators at the federal and state-local levels. But if revenue sharing or tax credits were adopted, an important shift of power would occur in the direction of state governors and city mayors. Former Budget Director Charles Zwick—in addition to his concern over the impact on federal spending priorities—poses the issue in the following fashion: "Through what channels of government do we want public resources and priorities to flow and thereby strengthen or weaken the several elements of the federal system?"

That Congress is sensitive to this issue is reflected in the recent remark of Congresswoman Martha Griffiths of Michigan at a symposium on tax sharing: "I would like to predict that it will be many years before the states get any unencumbered money out of the federal government."

And Congressman Wilbur Mills, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has been quoted as asking whether the states and localities would be willing to pick up part of the federal deficits as well as sharing in the federal surpluses. A true partnership arrangement, indeed!

On the other hand, if Congress should move in this new direction, I believe it is more likely to prefer tax credits to tax sharing.

For one thing, the tax credit is more consistent with traditional concepts of states' rights and independence; for there would truly be no strings attached to the new revenue flowing into state-local coffers and almost total independence from the federal government in revenue planning and use. The credit device thus bears the esthetic (and perhaps too idealistic) feature of carrying through to its logical end the apparently growing belief that states and localities should begin to bear the principal burden of handling and resolving domestic problems that beset the nation. Within this setting, it would also allow for differences among the states with respect to particular local needs, and would permit relatively simple adjustments at the state level to meet any special or sudden crisis or condition.

Again, the administrative simplicity of the tax credit plan has great practical appeal. Any plan in which revenue flows into and out of one pocket before reaching its final destination in another is bound to prove more costly than a similar plan under which revenue is collected directly by its intended final recipient.

Finally, I believe that use of tax credits is more familiar to tax legislators and more readily acceptable to Congress from a political and budgeting standpoint. For despite our recognition of the budgetary concealment and other weaknesses of this form of "backdoor spending", tax credits still have a practical appeal that must be taken into account. Will Congress be willing to make a long-range commitment of over $5 billion a year in direct blockgrant aid to the states and localities? Or is it more likely to accept an indirect revenue loss of the same amount by authorizing a credit against federal income taxes for 40% of state and local income taxes paid? Congressman Ullman's recent criticism of the administration's tax-sharing plan and his strong support of a tax credit may suggest what the answer will be.

Plato defined democracy as "a charming form of government, full of variety and disorder, and dispensing a sort of equality to equals and unequals alike."

Much later, Caryle cynically said: "Democracy is, by the nature of it, a self-canceling business; and gives in the long run a net result of zero."

From a dollar standpoint, a shift in revenue from the federal government to the states and localities may seem merely "a self-canceling business". But democracy is also "based upon the conviction that there are extraordinary possibilities in ordinary people". And if we are to solve our urgent domestic problems and make vital and tangible improvement in our environment, a revitalized federal system may be our best hope for the synergistic force to accomplish what is so badly needed. The how's and why's of this important endeavor lie as much in the field of taxation as in that of political science and sociology. And I commend the Tax Institute of America and all of you here today for the time and effort that you are devoting to the achievement of this important goal.

TELLING IT LIKE IT IS

HON. LIONEL VAN DEERLIN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, in the hue and cry over the newly explosive quality of life on many of our campuses, it is occasionally difficult to hear the voices of reason. The loudest commentators tend to be either wild-eyed radicals bent on toppling our institutions or at the other extreme self-righteous standpatters who dread any change, even when it is for the better.

In today's atmosphere of fear and truculence, a calm and detached assessment of the situation at our universities can stand out like a beacon in the darkness.

Such a statement was made October 28 by William J. McGill, the distinguished chancellor of the University of California at San Diego, in a speech to the San Diego Kiwanis Club.

In his talk, he carefully weighs the requirements of what he terms "two mutually opposed principles," public order and personal freedom. He warns against "compartmentalized" thinking on these principles, and appeals for understanding to permit both to flourish.

I believe Dr. McGill's eloquent remarks are worthy of study by anyone interested in the relationship of our universities to their public, and I include the speech at this point in the RECORD:

THE PROBLEM OF FREEDOM IN THE UNIVERSITY

We live in a time when men seem more interested in the images of things than in the things themselves. Recently television has been severely criticized for its role in introducing a new level of violence into our lives, but the difficulty goes much deeper. Television is a limited medium. It concentrates on visual action, not on abstract ideas. In the same sense the newspapers are a limited medium. They concentrate on newsworthy events rather than on the intricate tapestry of causes that generate the events.

The difficulty is not so much violence on television or action-reporting in the newspapers. It is the pace of our lives which has accelerated so rapidly that we have come increasingly to depend on these limited media for our understanding of the world around us and the forces that move it. We read less, write less, and think less. The sins of television and newspaper coverage are not so much a concentration on violence as they are a concentration on superficiality. If ever there was a time when thoughtful men needed to penetrate deeply into the problems that afflict society, this is the time.

Today I wish to speak to you in ths rational vein. I would like to pose two fundamental problems for which there are no easy solutions. I want to indicate the nature of the problems and the nature of the difficulty in finding solutions. These problems bear on the basic question of what is called academic freedom, and I am seeking to put before you the elements of a deeper understanding of the difficulties universities face in this complex and sensitive area. I am fully aware that the term "academic freedom" is almost an obscenity in the lexicon of the general public and almost a cliché among university people.

It is precisely for this reason that I want to approach the topic in the rational, analytic manner that thinking men must apply before they adopt any position, positive or negative, on any complex question.

The genius of the American concept of freedom has been our ability to find a solution to the requirements of two mutually opposed principles. One principle deals with the public order. We must have an orderly environment or we cannot function in the highly technological and interdependent social order that we have constructed. The other principle is our constitutional commitment to personal freedom as enunciated in the Bill of Rights. We must keep our society free of unreasonable incursions into the personal lives of its citizens. Such incursions are typically thought of as coming from the Government but the principle applies equally well to interference with our personal freedom arising from any other element of society.

Most of us tend to think about freedom and order in separate compartments. When crime in our cities and unrest on our campuses develops to the point of national concern, we want law and order. When the raw power of the Government or when external threats make us fearful of restrictions on our fundamental rights, we want freedom. Our thinking is compartmentalized. Thus it is not wholly adequate to an understanding of the fundamental problem of freedom and order because it is a fact that the two principles are opposed. Where personal freedom increases, the orderliness of society must decrease. Where law and order is on the increase, personal freedom diminishes. There is no way to escape this opposition. Ask any prison inmate. He will tell you that law and order is maintained at the expense of his personal liberty. The resolution of this problem is something that our society has always been able to achieve with spectacular success. We have been able to generate suitable compromises between personal freedom and public order so that the freedom of most citizens is maintained as fully as possible. The nature of the compromise is not stable from generation to generation. It swings in dynamic balance with the changing problems which confront our society. The balance, of course, is maintained by the courts. The courts determine in any era of our history whether American society is to be considered as permissive or repressive. They make this determination by setting the limits that public agencies must observe in dealing with individual citizens.

Many people have been critical of our courts during the last two decades because of their increasing stress on personal freedom and on the rights of the accused.

The courts themselves have taken the posiiton that they were restoring personal freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution, and hitherto encroached upon by some States and some police practices in order to maintain purely local conceptions of public order. As I observed, this position of the courts is not dogmatic. It is subject to change as society comes to view the consequences of increased personal freedom and increased permissiveness. I think we are now beginning to witness still another swing of the delicate balance back in the direction of increasing concern for the rights of society.

The Romans once conquered the European and the Mediterranean world, and for a period of time beginning in the reign of Caesar Augustus the world enjoyed a "Pax Romana", a Roman peace. It was an uneasy peace constituted out of fear that violations would bring swift and deadly justice meted out by Roman legions. Most Americans would reject the concept of a Roman peace for our society, but they do not want anarchy either. The balance must be struck between freedom and order in such a way as to permit our society the necessary order to function smoothly and yet at the same time to permit us the necessary freedom to experiment and to undergo peaceful change. The genius of the American way has been our ability to move this pendulum back and forth to deal with the unpredictable problems that confront our restless and changeable people. We have thus far been able to accomplish this without destroying the stability of government; without moving all the way to total anarchy which is the ultimate in personal freedom, or to total repression which is the ultimate in an assured public order.

The problem that I wish to put before you is the problem of how much personal freedom our society ought to manifest, and I urge you now to avoid thinking of this question in the compartmentalized boxes that we typically employ. We are all committed to the preservation of the public order, to law and order, and to the smooth functioning of our society. But how far are we prepared to go in this commitment? Do we repress dissent ruthlessly in the manner of the Roman legions? If we do not, how much dissent can we tolerate and in what form? Do we attempt to control dissidence in our society by legal punishment or by public criticism? What forms of dissent are protected by the Bill of Rights? For example, can students picket an administration building as an extension of free speech, dramatizing their dissent against the university administration? None of these questions has an easy answer because each one has subtle consequences that are by no means easy to forecast in detail. We proceed with changes in our reaction to dissent in little steps so that we can examine the consequences and thus avoid well-intentioned actions designed to protect the social order which instead seriously damage our own freedoms. We may agree that the protections of the right of free speech do not extend to such forceful acts as blocking the entrances to an administration building, but do we then also insure an orderly campus by arresting students who demonstrate quietly in the free speech area? One intrusion is clearly more serious than the other, but often the less serious act leads to the more serious one. Do we then ban both or draw the line between them?

The problem of freedom and order, opposed principles which push the common attitudes of our society in opposite directions, is a fundamental question with very subtle difficulties for deciding just how much freedom is too much. Americans have generally drawn the line so as to allow a great deal of personal freedom. In recent years, however, as violence and conflict have become increasingly prominent in American society, we have begun to wonder; to criticize the courts and the libertarian attitudes of our schools.

It is regrettable that the critics of our social order ordinarily approach the problem of freedom and order from a base that is almost entirely moralistic. These critics seem to know just how our society should be constructed. At least they know which elements of society must prevail in order to meet the demands of their dogmatic convictions. Hence, in the full assurance that they are in the right and those who disagree with them are wrong, these visionaries would proceed to impose their conceptions on you and me without benefit of our advice or acceptance. They would deny to their opponents the rights of free speech and free advocacy which they demand for themselves. The basis of this inverted logic lies in the irrational but absolute conviction that they are right and their adversaries are wrong. So it has always been with the zealous who know what is best for the people and who will force it upon them whether the people want it or not.

I have had many occasions during the last two years to debate with the radicals on my campus. I find them singularly unable to entertain even the thought that their analysis of society may be faulty. The campus new left has become ideologically frozen in dreary and discredited Marxist economic dogma. Its loud sophomoric protagonists manifest that complete conviction of moral rectitude that is the distinguishing mark of intellectual folly. One young man told me with absolute self-assurance that students would become interested in their science classes at UCSD only if there were a complete revolution of the political, economic and social system. How much that fellow still has to learn about human nature, and how blind his moralistic self-assurance makes him to what is patently obvious!

The problem of freedom and order is the first of the two fundamental problems which I seek to review for you. It is fundamental in the sense that there is no easy solution if one approaches the opposed principles of freedom and order in depth rather than compartmentally. In fact, the balance of the rights of the individual against the rights of society probes at the heart of the American constitutional and legal system. Thus the opposition of freedom and order characterizes a whole series of conundrums that arise in the more restricted context of the modern American university. The restricted context provides the setting for my second problem.

It deals with the logical conflicts we confront in attempting to maintain individual freedom at an institution supported by taxpayers. Again there are two opposed principles. The first principle is obvious. In a tax supported institution, those who pay the bills must have some voice in determining how their tax funds are spent. The second principle, equally obvious, is that no university can generate new knowledge unless its professors are free to express heretical views.

The opposition of these two principles has led to much agony for universities in recent times. The issue generally arises when a professor engages in some activity or expresses some set of views which are a source of outrage and objection to the public. I can cite numerous examples. The case of professor Marcuse and his Marxist analysis of the revolutionary forces in a technological society springs almost immediately to mind. But the professor is only the most recent and the most locally prominent of many examples.

A few years ago a professor at the University of Illinois attracted severe public disapproval for advocating free love in a letter to the student newspaper.

I also remember a professor of history at Rutgers University who proclaimed at an open convocation several years ago that he would welcome the victory of the Viet Cong. So much outrage was generated by this episode that it became the focal point for a contest between two candidates for the U.S. Senate in New Jersey.

There are many more examples. Only recently I read of a misguided population biologist at the University of New Hampshire who proposed sterilizing all women with an airborne virus in order to control the population explosion.

The common denominator of all of these extraordinary and outrageous pronouncements is that each one originated in a university supported by the taxpayers. Life is difficult enough for the ordinary citizen in these days of harsh governmental demands on his pocketbook, but it must be exceptionally hard for him to bear the revelation that his hard-earned tax dollars are being spent to support the heretical pronouncements of a Marxist philosopher, or the immoral preachments of an advocate of free love, or the ugly appeal in behalf of a deadly adversary who has no compunction about murdering and maiming women and children, or the crackpot advice of a visionary who would wipe out much that is beautiful in life, love and family, using an invisible airborne virus.

The taxpayer has a right to demand that if he is paying the bills, his money should not be used to support subversion, immorality, treachery, or madness. The argument is so simple and so plausible that it occurs to many agonized taxpayers as they read newspaper accounts of what some professors do or say. I receive hundreds of letters that begin approximately as follows: "Now look here, Chancellor, I am not a crank or a crackpot, but you must understand that I do not want my tax money used for such purposes."

There is, however, an opposed principle. A university cannot function unless there is free inquiry. Not every taxpayer remembers that a university has a special creative role to play in society. It is not just a repository for the ancient knowledge of civilization's past. It is not just a memory bank providing a record of our knowledge of nature and the cosmos. It is not just a center in which the literature and art that we have come to revere is transmitted to new generations. A university does all of these things but they do not characterize the central role that every vital university plays in generating new knowledge, new physical understanding, new literature and art.

The creative role of the university in society turns on the university's capacity to generate new knowledge and to develop new modes of thought. Because it must serve this creative role, a university is not just a school. Creativity is almost always painful and often unattractive. Moreover, the sensitive and restless people who are most effective in generating new knowledge and in experimenting with new modes of thought, are not especially comfortable to live with.

When Hemingway was learning how to write English sentences that were, as he described them, both simple and true, he worked in a kind of creative agony. He tells us that he would sit for hours in a freezing hotel room or in a steaming cafe in the Latin Quarter of Paris, and nothing would come. Then he would go in the late afternoon, frustrated after having written only a few words, walking in the cold air of the Luxembourg Gardens to Gertrude Stein's house in order to be told rather archly that he belonged to a lost generation.

Creative work is often extremely frustrating. You sit there pondering on an objective that you conceive only in the dimmest way. The problem is not so much to find the answer to a particular question, but to find out which question is the right one to ask.

The creative process leaves its mark of tension and anxiety on those who engage in it most effectively. Moreover, people and especially professors are by no means creative all the time. Some of their ideas are crackpot. One of the most remarkable talents a thinker can have is the ability to tell which of his ideas are good and which are best forgotten. The famous cosmologist Kepler comes down to us from the Middle Ages historically revered as the man who determined finally and conclusively that the planets travel in elliptical orbits around the sun. He did this by establishing that the motions of the planet Mars across the night sky from season to season were completely predictable if Mars traveled in an elliptical orbit around the sun. It was a brilliant discovery, but it was mixed in with other work claiming the mystical occurrence of certain numerical ratios in the motions of the planets, work that was the purest kind of crackpottery without any redeeming value whatever. It is interesting to wonder whether Kepler ever understood which part of his work we would remember and which part we would smile at.

The nature of the creative process and the obvious linkage of universities to the production of new knowledge then argues for our second principle which is that universities must sustain free advocacy, free expression, and the free inquiry, these are all essential to the preservation of the university's creative role. Moreover, it is perfectly clear to us that unless a university sustains these freedoms it becomes corrupt and quickly dies as a center of learning. We witnessed the fate of the great German universities during the Nazi era. They were systematically converted by the Nazi state into centers of ideology for the development and propagation of the Teutonic mythology which Hitler and his subordinates sought to substitute for genuine learning in order to buttress their own power. Many professors left Germany because they felt they could not work in such an atmosphere, and those who remained were in no sense the cream of the creative spirit of the German universities of the early Twentieth century. Hitler destroyed the universities in Germany in less than ten years simply by robbing them of their integrity. Thus universities must be free institutions or they cannot survive in recognizable form. When freedom disappears everything that the university teaches is cast into doubt.

Many of you will recall the scandal of Lysenkoism in Russian genetics during the postwar Stalinist era. Trofim Lysenko was a Russian geneticist who simply tried to falsify genetic experiments in order to establish that Soviet Marxism could create better wheat, better cattle, and a better race of men. In so doing he sought only to improve his own status in the Soviet scientific hierarchy by telling the Stalinist Government what it wished to hear. Thus Lysenko achieved power and eminence as the protege of that strange and powerful despot, but in the process Stalin and Lysenko destroyed Russian genetics for nearly twenty years. This was at the time when genetics in Western science was making unparalleled strides by discovering the code in which nature tells cells how to make templates so as to construct other cells just like them.

The argument is perfectly plain and perfectly plausible. Unless the university is free it cannot play its creative role. It cannot tell reason from nonsense. It cannot express the heretical view that proves in the long run to be fundamentally insightful.

I hope you see again that these two principles, the principle of ultimate control by the taxpayer and the principle of free inquiry are in opposition. Free inquiry at a university is expanded by diminishing the taxpayer's right to control what may be taught. Making the faculty and the curriculum of the university directly responsible to the taxpayers implies inevitable limitations on what may be taught and who may teach.

Obviously the opposition of the principle of taxpayer-control and the principle of free-inquiry in the university is formally similar to the opposition of order and freedom in society at large. But our American genius in dealing with the complexities of an orderly, free society has not been manifested with equal effect in resolving the university's problems.

In universities there is nothing equivalent to the majesty of the courts for maintaining the delicate balance between the rights of taxpayers and the rights of professors. Boards of trustees and boards of regents are groups of lay persons, exceptionally successful in life and serving in an honorary capacity. Because of this essentially unrewarding service, the turnover on such boards is usually high, and thus the board members are not often well-equipped to deal with the subtleties of balancing the rights of taxpayers against the problems posed by free inquiry. It has been my experience with the Board of Regents of the University of California that these fine men and women, seeking to serve not only the University but the people of the State without recompense and often without appreciation, are almost always caught in the immense gap between what is publicly damaging to the university and what is reasonable and proper to do. Similarly, the university chancellors, faced with the widening gap between the attitudes of the taxpayers and the freedoms that are traditional in academic communities, find themselves making decisions that please no one at all. I spend much of my time teetering on the delicate brink between the rights of the bill-paying public and the freedom of expression that I must sustain if we are to be a vital and effective university. In this balance there are no easy solutions. There is also no peace and no easy way to fend off the demands of those who would demand the full rights of the taxpayers on the one hand, or those in the university who demand full freedom of expression on the other.

Thus the opposed principles of freedom and order present insoluble problems to our society, but we have handled them rather well despite the inherent difficulties. The opposed principles of taxpayer-control of public universities and freedom of inquiry present roughly the same logical problems, but public universities seem to have handled them rather badly. My own view is that the chancellor or the university president, playing a role supposedly like the courts in society at large, has not been able to build up either the public understanding or the public support that affords him the freedom to adjust the delicate balance between his university and the community that sustains it. It is probable that such men, overburdened and overworked, cannot give sustained attention to the subtleties of these problems and thus make ill-thought-out compromises. Presidents too often are bound up in fending off budget slashes and in dealing with the immediate imperatives of profound student unrest. What we need most in universities these days is time—time to conceptualize our difficulties, time to think through sensible courses of action, time to work with the critical sensitive and occasionally hostile general public. We have no time and we are not going to get any.

It seems clear to me that much of the structure of human society operates in the dynamic balance of pairs of opposed principles: freedom and order; the rights of the taxpayer and the freedom of the professor; and similar oppositions. The quality of freedom in a society must somehow be derived from the manner in which the balance is set between the extremes of such polarizations. There is no textbook and no dogma telling us how we should set these balances. Moreover, there is no way to escape the conflicts generated by opposed rights. No moralistic precepts assure us of a monopoly on right answers. We are forced to find freedom's equilibrium condition in the crucible of the problems we face. The problems of each generation are partly historic but mostly unique. It is almost always true that the solutions which worked for an earlier generation do not apply with equal force or effect to the problems we confront today. Thus in attempting to set the balance between the rights of the individual, and the rights of society, we must find the compromise which balances these rights in a condition of quasi-stability during our time. That search for compromise is very difficult for a university administrator. Universities are idealistic communities. They do not admire compromise.

I do not for a moment maintain that all understanding must come from the taxpayers. Professors tend to be absolutists where freedom of expression and inquiry are concerned. They view such principles uncompromisingly and hold me accountable for their maintenance. The solid center of the academic senate regards freedom of expression as something sacred, and believes that the public should be grateful to have a university at all. Similarly, I suppose, there must be groups of taxpayers who will demand that they control the university totally or there will be no university at all. The balancing of these opposed demands must be achieved by the regents and the administration. It must be accomplished so as to guarantee freedom from harassment for professors who pursue truth as they see the truth. On the other hand the academic senates must moderate their absolutist position on freedom or face a public disavowal. One major step that should be taken soon is an effort by the academic senate on the University of California to write a code of ethical behavior for its membership. Thus its legitimate demand for academic freedom can be buttressed by a parallel commitment to ethical conduct. It is a fact that very few divisions of the academic senate are prepared to agree even on simple matters such as the definition of disruption of classes. In this respect the senate is hesitant to discipline its own membership and thus ties up administrators in petty legalisms when administrators attempt to act in the public interest. This irresponsibility must stop and I believe it will be stopped as the academic senate becomes aware of the public consequences of unbounded permissiveness accorded to its membership.

I see freedom in the public university operating in the same dynamic equilibrium as governs freedom in society at large. Absolutism in academic freedom is equivalent to anarchy in society. It is intolerable. But so is the destructive demand for total conformity. Creativity withers in such an atmosphere. The delicate balance between the freedom of professors and the rights of society must be maintained. The university will then flourish as a free institution. This requires reason and responsibility from advocates of each side in the conflict of opposed rights.

I must listen to the academic community with one ear and to the taxpayers with the other. Sometimes the dissonance of those disparate inputs is extraordinary, but if a public university is to function today in a climate of freedom while still maintaining its public support, those disparate, dissonant voices must be heeded.

THINGS NEVER SEEM TO CHANGE FOR THE AMERICAN TAXPAYER

HON. CHARLES A. VANIK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to highly commend one of my Republican colleagues from the State of Ohio, a former member of the distinguished Ways and Means Committee, for his outstanding statement on the need for tax reform. This Ohio Republican stated:

I believe that this income tax, as now administered, is the very essence of injustice. There are men who have no other capital than their hands and brains, who are taxed more than men worth sixty, seventy, eighty, and a hundred thousand dollars. I can give examples by the dozen of precisely such instances from the working of the income law of last session. A captain in the Army with a family to support, and with no wealth but his salary, pays more income tax to the Government than many a man who has $50,000 invested and lives comfortably without labor or risk.

Mr. Speaker, this mode of taxation is the very soul of injustice.

Unfortunately, this speech was delivered in this Chamber 104 years ago, on February 16, 1865 by the Honorable James A. Garfield.

Yet what he said 104 years ago is still true today.

And, unfortunately, Congressman Garfield—later President—seems to have been one of the last Republicans to advocate tax reform. The Republican President who occupies the White House today advocated cutting back the tax relief provided to individuals by the House and giving corporations a better tax break; this administration has taken the "Wall Street line" on capital gains; this administration has failed to take a strong stand on cutting back oil depletion.

Well might the American taxpayer ask, "How much longer?"

SHILOH JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL, PARMA, OHIO, SUPPORTS COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY

HON. WILLIAM E. MINSHALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MINSHALL. Mr. Speaker, when H.R. 12549 came before the House last September 23 I took the floor to give vigorous support to this measure which would establish a Council on Environmental Quality. The House and Senate are meeting tomorrow in conference, I am told, to try to resolve differences in the two versions of this urgently needed legislation. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues who are serving as conferees a petition written and signed by more than 900 students and adults at Shiloh Junior High School in Parma, Ohio, which I have the honor to represent.

I am proud to serve such alert and thoughtful constituents and I urge the conference to quickly resolve its differences so that this vital legislation can be enacted.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert the following letter and petition from Shiloh Junior High School; as well as an explanatory article from the Plain Dealer:

[From the Plain Dealer, Nov. 12, 1969]

PARMA PUPILS BACK POLLUTION FIGHT

More than 860 pupils and 76 adult employes at Shiloh Junior High School, Parma, have signed a petition endorsing remarks made by U.S. Rep. William E. Minshall Jr. (R–23) calling for establishment of a national council on environmental quality.

Minshall based the need for such a council to combat increasing air and water pollution as well as use of pesticides.

Science classes at the school prepared the petition. In addition to the pupils, signers included 50 teachers, guidance counselors, teacher aides, secretaries, cafeteria workers and cleaning staff.

Copies of the petition have been sent to Rep. Minshall, President Nixon, federal, state and local officials.

SHILOH JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL,
Parma, Ohio, November 16, 1969.

Congressman WILLIAM E. MINSHALL,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MINSHALL: We at Shiloh Jr. High School want to commend you on your concern for the environment in which we live. Your remarks given September 23, 1969, before the House of Representatives concerning bill H.R. 12549, to establish a Council on Environmental Quality were presented by the Science teachers to their students and a discussion followed. As a result, a petition was drawn up supporting your views and 862 students signed it as well as 76 adult employees of Shiloh consisting of 50 teachers, guidance counselors, teacher aides, secretaries, cafeteria workers and cleaning staff.

A copy of the Staff's signatures is enclosed as well as the signatures of the students.

Please continue your efforts in these vital areas which affect the welfare of all humanity.

Very truly yours,

ADAM D. WYSOCKI.

We, the undersigned, from Shiloh Jr. High School, wholeheartedly endorse the remarks of Congressman Minshall in support of H.R. 12549, to establish a Council on Environmental Quality, which were presented to the House of Representatives on September 23, 1969.

We are concerned about Air Pollution.

We are concerned about Water Pollution.

We are concerned about the indiscriminant use of toxic pesticides, and especially urge the banning of DDT.

We are concerned about the destruction of topsoil in strip mining.

We are concerned about the environment in which we live.

We, therefore, urge all levels of government to hasten action in these areas.

LAW DEANS' OPPOSITION TO MURPHY AMENDMENT

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, the House will soon consider H.R. 12321, the Office of Economic Opportunity authorization bill. The Senate passed an amendment to that bill known as the Murphy amendment. This amendment would allow Governors of the various States an ultimate veto authority over legal services programs. Such an arrangement could spell disaster for one of the most successful programs in the history of OEO.

The groups opposing this amendment are numerous and prestigious. They include the American Bar Association, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the League of Women Voters, the National Council of Churches, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors. In addition, a group of 84 deans of law schools throughout the Nation have subscribed to a statement in opposition to the Murphy amendment.

These law school deans are concerned with the interference with the attorney-client relationship which might occur if this amendment is enacted. They are concerned as well with the detrimental effect that the amendment may have on the development of a sense of professional responsibility among law students to participate in programs providing meaningful legal services to the disadvantaged of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I join these law school deans in opposing the Murphy amendment. I also oppose any other amendment which might restrict the right of legal services attorneys fully to assist indigent clients. Any restriction on the legal services attorneys would in all likelihood cause the poor to view the program as a paternalistic handout meant to deceive and not to help effectively.

Mr. Speaker, I include at this point in the RECORD the statement subscribed to by the 84 law school deans as well as a resolution supporting the legal services program adopted by the American Bar Association on October 18, 1969, and a statement of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights opposing the Murphy amendment:

STATEMENT OF LAW SCHOOL DEANS

We concur with the resolution adopted on October 18, 1969, by the Board of Governors of the American Bar Association and the action of the Judicial Conference of the United States at its meeting on November 1, 1969, and voice our opposition to the amendment to S. 3016 which would give State Governors a veto over legal services programs.

As law school deans we are concerned with the possibility of interference with the attorney-client relationship and the traditional independence of the legal profession. We are especially concerned with the effect that this amendment may have on legal education and the development of a sense of professional responsibility among law students to participate in programs providing meaningful legal services to the disadvantaged.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION BOARD OF GOVERNORS, OCTOBER 18, 1969

Whereas, the adoption by the United States Senate of an amendment to S. 3016 seeks to place in the hands of the Governors of the various States a power of veto over the activities of Legal Services Programs funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

And whereas, such power contravenes the American Bar Association's commitment to secure full and effective legal services to the poor by providing every person in our society with access to the independent professional services of a lawyer of integrity and competence;

And whereas, enlarging the scope and effectiveness of the power to veto legal services programs is highly undesirable because experience has shown that the power to veto may be used to circumscribe the freedom of legal service attorneys in representing their clients to address issues of governmental action or omission affecting the rights of their clients, and to discourage actions which are politically unpopular or adverse to the views of the majority;

And whereas, such limitations impair the ability of legal services programs to respond properly to the needs of the poor and constitute oppressive interference with the freedom of the lawyer and the citizen;

Now, therefore be it resolved, that the American Bar Association reaffirms its position that the Legal Services Program should operate with full assurance of independence of lawyers within the program not only to render services to individual clients but also in cases which might involve action against governmental agencies seeking significant institutional change.

And, further resolved, that representatives of the American Bar Association be authorized to express the concern of the Association as to the effect of the aforesaid amendment.

STATEMENT BY U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS VETO POWER FOR GOVERNORS OF LEGAL SERVICES PROGRAMS

The United States Commission on Civil Rights wholeheartedly supports the American Bar Association, The United States Judicial Conference, The National Legal Aid and Defenders Association, as well as local and State bar associations and other interested groups in their opposition to the proposed amendment to the Office of Economic Opportunity authorization bill providing State governors veto power over OEO funded legal services programs. The adoption of this amendment would critically weaken the most successful and fulfilling of all of the OEO programs and undermine the concept of equal legal representation for all. It especially would jeopardize survival of legal services programs that vigorously represent Negroes, Mexican Americans and Indians.

The need for vigorous and aggressive legal representation on behalf of the poor of all races cannot be overemphasized. "Equality before the law," said former Supreme Court Justice Wiley Rutledge, "in a true democracy is a matter of right. It cannot be a matter of charity or of favor or of grace or of discretion." In many areas such as housing, welfare rights and consumer protection, legal services groups have provided the best hope for a system of effective representation for the poor—not just in providing day to day legal counsel on an individual basis—but in attending to those activities which establish legal precedents and law reform affecting large numbers of people.

In a recent speech President Nixon set for the OEO Office of Legal Services the following goal:

"It will take on central responsibility for programs which help provide advocates for the poor in their dealings with social institutions. The sluggishness of many institutions—at all levels of society—in responding to the needs of individual citizens is one of the central problems of our time. Disadvantaged persons in particular must be assisted so that they fully understand the lawful means of making their needs known and having those needs met."

Those legal services programs which have proven most vigorous, resourceful and innovative in the assistance of their clients and which have been responsible for the most far-reaching legal reforms are the very programs which are put in greatest jeopardy by the proposed amendment. The right of disadvantaged groups to have full and effective access to the courts must not be fettered by the political restrictions imposed by the amendment. Such an amendment would be a regressive step that can only serve to discourage the poor from bringing their grievances to the courts rather than to the streets.

APOLLO 11 ASTRONAUTS PRESENTED PERE MARQUETTE DISCOVERY AWARD

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, on November 8 the State of Wisconsin, the Milwaukee community, Marquette University, and the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission had the honor of paying special tribute to the Apollo 11 astronauts—Neil Armstrong, Buzz Aldrin, and Mike Collins.

It was my pleasure to be present on this memorable occasion and to participate as a member of the Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Commission was established by Congress in 1967 to help commemorate the 300th anniversary of Father Marquette's explorations and discoveries in what is now the United States.

In recognition of their own brave and historic efforts the Apollo 11 astronauts were presented with the first "Pere Marquette Discovery Award" medals. The presentations were made at a dinner in their honor at Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wis. The Discovery Award was instituted this year by the Marquette University board of regents in memory of the great explorer whose name the university bears and in tribute to his great achievements.

Like Father Marquette, the Apollo 11 astronauts have earned the right to be called "discoverers" and assuredly enjoy a place in history. It is therefore most fitting that these three courageous men be the first recipients of this award.

Following the dinner, the astronauts were the guests of the Tercentenary Commission at the world premiere of the "Pere Marquette Symphony," which was composed and directed by Dr. Roy Harris. During the intermission of the symphony—performed by the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra in their beautiful new home in the Milwaukee Performing Arts Center—the astronauts were each presented with a silver Pere Marquette medal, the minting of which was authorized by Congress as part of the tercentenary. The presentation was made by Mr. James Windham, able and respected chairman of the Commission.

In order to acquaint my colleagues further with the Pere Marquette Discovery Award ceremony I am pleased to insert in the RECORD at this point the proceedings from the dinner and symphony program honoring the astronauts:

FATHER MARQUETTE TERCENTENARY DINNER PROGRAM

(Invocation.)

Father RAPHAEL HAMILTON. In the beginning God, then the refulgent galaxies, then the planet earth and man. Today, America, by the combined effort of its men and women, has placed discoverers on planet moon. A great leap forward to the stars! A wonderful lesson for humanity. With the cooperation and union, great deeds are wrought in faith. With these we hope that in the end we may be brought to God. May He bless us then and now. Amen.

Mr. JAMES WINDHAM. Honored clergy, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen. As Chairman of the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission, on this historic night for the State of Wisconsin, the Milwaukee community, Marquette University, and the Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission, I would like to take a minute to set the stage for the events of the evening.

Due to the great importance of this dinner, I am pleased to announce that the entire proceedings are being telecast through the courtesy of WTMJ-TV, channel 4, and WVTV, channel 18.

I would like to begin by recognizing distinguished guests at the speaker's table. To my right at the front table—The Most Reverend Leo J. Brust, Auxiliary Bishop of Milwaukee . . . Mayor Henry Maier and his lovely wife Mary Ann . . . Mr. Eliot Fitch, Chairman of the Boad of Trustees Marquette University and Chairman of the Board of the Marine National Exchange Bank. To my left at the front table—Father Hamilton . . . County Executive John Doyne and Mrs. Doyne . . . Acting Governor Jack Olson and Mrs. Olson. To my right—Mr. James Dickey, Professor of English and Poet in Residence, University of South Carolina, Columbia, South Carolina . . . Congressman Clement Zablocki of Wisconsin, Vice Chairman of the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission and more than any other man, responsible for Congress establishing the National Commission. Congressman and Mrs. Zablocki . . . My boss, Father John P. Raynor, Society of Jesus and President of Marquette University. To my left—Father William F. Kelley, Society of Jesus, a member of the National Commission and Assistant to the President, Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska. I don't know what I'm doing up here with all these educators. . . . Dr. Kenneth Shouldice, a member of the National Commission and Chancellor, Lake Superior State College . . . my better half and lovely wife Lorraine Windham.

It is now my privilege to introduce the guests of honor—the crew of Apollo 11—Neil A. Armstrong . . . Michael Collins . . . Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr.

In 1965, through the efforts of Representative Clement J. Zablocki and United States Senator Philip A. Hart of Michigan, a Joint Resolution of the 89th Congress established the Father Marquette Commission. The Commission includes 12 members—four United States senators, four representatives and four lay people. The Commission was specifically set up to commemorate the 300th anniversary of the advent of Father Marquette in North America. The celebration will last five years—1968–1973. Certainly tonight is and will be the highpoint of the activities of the National Commission. We thank you for sharing this wonderful time with us.

Mr. James Dickey, our next speaker, earned his Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts degrees from Vanderbilt University. He was the Poet in Residence at Reed College in Portland, Oregon, at San Fernando State College and at the University of Wisconsin. Additionally, he has been the Consultant in Poetry for the Library of Congress. He served in the United States Air Force in Korea and was decorated with the Air Medal. He is the recipient of numerous art prizes. Tonight Mr. Dickey will read his poem, "The Moon Ground", which was commissioned by Life Magazine and appeared in Life's July 4 issue.

Mr. DICKEY. This is a poem I wrote about the Apollo 11 mission, on which it may come as news to you I was not on—except in the strange realm of the imagination. It's always trying to project yourself into the position of another person—say like an astronaut. It is always kind of a suspect thing—even dangerous, but then poets have always done that, and I tried to imagine what it must have been like to be there. I wrote this before they went actually, but that's all right—as I say, poets have always done that. I'm sure it will come as a complete surprise to the crew of the Apollo 11 that this is what they thought, but it really was. They might not admit it, but anyway. . . . It's a poem about first touching down on the lunar surface—these two fellows with the other one circling overhead and the feeling that one has brought the whole of human culture and the whole aspiration of the human race, and all the tortuous, bloody and goriest history of humanity here—all the gods, all the things that men have ever believed in to this desolate place. They brought the human imagination—they brought poetry—they brought religion—they brought Gray's "Elegy". You know? And why not? You remember that from high school, I'm sure. It's supposed to be spoken by one of the fellows on the lunar surface to the other, or maybe just thought by him. You can have it however you like. In this particular context, they've come on the lunar surface and they're taking these rocks up off the ground to bring them back.

Now, as I say, I wrote this before the mission was completed, and I didn't know whether they were going to bring the moon plaque back or not you know, and kill everybody on the earth—and all that quarantine—evidently not—after all, we're sitting here this evening. But anyway, I won't go on and on but, what I tried to do was to get these facts into a poem, as spoken by one of the astronauts. You can take your pick.

"You look as though
You know me, though the world we came from is striking
You in the forehead like Apollo, Buddy,
We have brought the gods. We know what it is to shine
Far off, with earth. We alone
Of all men, could take off
Our shoes and fly. One-sixth of our weight, we have gathered,
Both of us, under another one
Of us overhead. He is reading the dials he is understanding
Time, to save our lives. You and I are in earth light and deep moon shadow on magic ground
Of the dead new world, and we do not but we could Leap over each other like children in the universal playground of stones
But we must not play
At being here: we must look
We must look for it: the stones are going to tell us
Not the why but the how of all things. Brother, your gold face flashes
On me. It is the earth. I hear your deep voice rumbling from the body
Of its huge clothes Why did we come here
It does not say, but the ground looms, and the secret
Of time is lying
Within amazing reach. It is everywhere
We walk, our glass heads shimmering with absolute heat
And cold. We leap slowly
Along it. We will take back the very stones
Of Time, and build it where we live. Or in the cloud striped blue of home, will the secret crumble
In our hands with air? Will the moon-plague kill our children
In their beds? The Human Planet trembles in its black
Sky with what we do I can see it hanging in the god-gold only Brother of your face. We are this world: we are The only men. What hope is there at home
In the azure of breath, or here with the stone
Dead secret? My massive clothes bubble around me
Crackling with static and Gray's
Elegy helplessly coming
From my heart, and I say I think something
From high school I remember Now
Fades the glimmering landscape on the sight, and all the air
A solemn stillness holds. Earth glimmers
And in its air-color a solemn stillness holds
It. O brother! Earth-faced god! Apollo! My eyes blind
With unreachable tears my breath goes all over
Me and cannot escape. We are here to do one Thing only, and that is rock by rock to carry the moon to take it Back. Our clothes embrace we cannot touch we cannot Kneel. We stare into the moon
Dust, the earth-blazing ground. We laugh, with the beautiful craze
Of static. We bend, we pick up stones."

Mr. WINDHAM. Thank you, Mr. Dickey. Father Raynor will be our next speaker.

Father JOHN P. RAYNOR. Thank you, Mr. Windham. Distinguished guests and friends of Marquette University. Our university has observed many proud milestones since its doors first opened in 1881. Tonight, as part of the Pere Marquette Tercentenary, we are celebrating another great, great milestone, which I'm sure will prove most memorable in this history of this institution. Tonight we present our first Pere Marquette Discovery Award Medals. And the honor that we pay to their recipients is a most fitting way to memorialize the work of Father Jaques Marquette of the Society of Jesus, discoverer with Joliet of the Mississippi River, and patron of this university.

Human history and human tradition are filled with the accounts of man's great achievements. Great achievements in the struggle to find answers to age-old questions. Through the centuries, brave men have, for the benefit of their fellow men, faced and accepted the challenges of nature. The challenges to make their impossible dreams come true. Father Marquette was one of these men.

He lived at the very edge of mystery. He knew the terrors of fatigue in an alien land. He kept his own mind open and he kept it deep. He kept his sense of beauty—his ability to make beauty, and, above all, his ability to see beauty. He did this in places remote and strange and unfamiliar to himself.

In memory of this great man, and in tribute to his very great achievements, we've struck a medal—and we'd like tonight to present this medal for the first time to the intrepid crew of Apollo Eleven, who like Father Marquette, explored a new world and gave us illumination and light and insight. Illumination and light and insight into the world of the unknown and into the wonders of the unknown world. Father Marquette himself proved, as explorers before him had done, and as the astronauts of today have done, that the analogies, insights and harmonies of scientific discovery can find their way into the wider life of man on this earth.

Like Father Marquette, the Apollo Eleven astronauts have earned the right to be called "discoverers" and, as a result, beloved and respected by all. And as long as heroism is prized, the names of Armstrong, Collins and Aldrin will be remembered, and the history of our nation in particular will be greatly embellished. And as long as men wish to recall the past and the development of great ideals, so long will the astronauts historic mission fascinate the imagination, enlarge the minds and enkindle the hearts of all men.

Like the astronauts, Father Marquette faced the challenges of the unknown in his explorations and discoveries in the Great Lakes and Upper Mississippi River regions. He was a man of vision—a pioneer—a discoverer in 1669, just at the astronauts are men of vision—pioneers and discoverers in a much more complex and changing world of 1969.

Like the astronauts and like Marquette, whose name we bear, this university too, through excellence in thought and scholarship, also probes the unknown and seeks to satisfy its destiny to make men free through the personal possession of truth about God's creation—about man's relation to man and about man's relation to God.

For all of these reasons we are pleased, as a university, to bestow the first Pere Marquette Discovery Award Medals on the crew of the Apollo Eleven. We are grateful that our astronauts are able to be here this evening at considerable sacrifice to accept these awards, for, as you know, they have just returned to the United States only three days ago after a very exhausting 44,000 mile world tour.

On behalf of our trustees, our faculty, staff, students and alumni, it is my distinct pleasure this evening to present to them the Pere Marquette Discovery Award.

This medal honoring Father Marquette and his work in this very area 300 years ago, was inaugurated recently by our Board of Trustees. It was designed by our esteemed colleague and good friend, Mr. Edmund Lewandowski, who is President of the Layton School of Art here in Milwaukee.

Bearing the 16 points of the compass rose, the medal symbolizes the possibility of discovery in every direction. The ring in the center of the medal, carrying the inscription "Pere Marquette Discovery Award" surrounds a letter "M", which represents both the family name of Father Marquette and the name of the university that has been named after him. The design suggests the sunburst which symbolizes the enlightenment of mankind. This, of course, is the particular aim of Marquette University—as surely it must be of any university. This is one reason—this is the decisive reason—why these medals should be presented in this setting—in this company—on this night to men who opened up for us tremendous new possibilities for observation and experiment; new means of communication with our fellow men; new opportunities for common understanding among people who share a common purpose and who desire to work together in freedom, in truth, in trust and in peace.

As I see it, this is the meaning of the astronauts' spectacular achievement. This is the meaning of Father Marquette's achievement, and this is the essence of our work as a university.

I would like at this time to call forward, in order, our three astronauts to receive their medals, and as I call them up here, I will first read the citation or certificate which will be presented to them; then, with the assistance of Mr. Windham, Chairman of the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission, will put the medal around their neck.

First of all, Mr. Neil Armstrong . . . The Pere Marquette Discovery Award bestowed upon Neil A. Armstrong in recognition of his exploration aboard Apollo 11, whereby he became the first human being to set foot upon the moon on July 20, 1969. Given this eighth day of November in the Year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixty nine—signed by Mr. Eliot Fitch, Chairman of our Board of Trustees and by myself.

Michael Collins . . . Pere Marquette Discovery Award bestowed upon Michael Collins in recognition of the rendezvous he made with the first men to walk upon the moon July 21, 1969. Given this eighth day of November in the Year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixty nine.

Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr. . . . Pere Marquette Discovery Award bestowed upon Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr. in recognition of his exploration aboard Apollo 11 whereby he landed upon the moon July 20, 1969—given this eighth day of November in the Year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixty nine.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to call on the astronauts themselves for response to your congratulations and to our award.

Mr. NEIL ARMSTRONG. Father Raynor, Mr. Windham, distinguished guests. We of Apollo 11 are indeed honored to be with you here this evening and to have been chosen as the recipients of the first Pere Marquette Discovery Award medals. As you are celebrating the 300th anniversary of the great voyage of discovery by the remarkable man in whose honor these awards are named, we feel that there are a number of similarities and parallels to our own voyage of discovery. There are of course some rather striking differences. Pere Marquette's famed exploration of the Mississippi, father of waters, involved a relative handful of men, himself and his friend and companion Louis Joliet, five other Frenchmen, I believe, and a handful of Indian guides. Apollo 11 was a tremendous team effort, involving the dedicated efforts of thousands of persons in this country and around the world. Indeed, the Apollo program has been described as being the greatest cooperative endeavor, entirely for peaceful purposes, that has ever been engendered in the history of the world. At its peak, more than 350,000 persons in government, industry and in the university community were directly participating. Thus, we of the Apollo 11 crew accept these awards with a full appreciation of the fact that Columbia and the Eagle could never have reached the moon, and we could never have sent back the word from Tranquility base that the Eagle has landed without that great teamwork and cooperation that gave us that confidence. So, I feel that, symbolically, we are accepting these awards on behalf not only of ourselves but on behalf of those thousands of others. And just as Pere Marquette's great exploration of three centuries ago had far-reaching consequences that are still being felt today—paving the way for many events that followed—we believe that the full implication of Apollo 11 may not be fully realized for decades or even centuries to come. As you know, Mike, Buzz and mysef have just returned from an extended good will tour that has taken us to 30 foreign cities in almost that many countries, in just more than a month. Perhaps you have heard of the contemporary film entitled, "If this is Tuesday, it must be Belgium". A trip to the moon seems easy by comparison. There was one thing that we became increasingly aware of during that trip around the world. Due to the marvel of modern communication, people everywhere had almost a sense of personal participation in Apollo 11. From the many comments we received, and in the warm welcomes that we received in every city around the world we visited, we like to think that our mission has helped to draw the nations of the world closer together. As President Nixon said to us in that famous and expensive long distance telephone call from the White House to us on the moon, "For one priceless moment in history, all the people on the earth are really one."

"We'd like to thank you for this great honor. I'd like now to introduce my colleague, Mr. Michael Collins.

Mr. MICHAEL COLLINS. Thank you, Neil, and good evening ladies and gentlemen. It has sometimes been said that the space program is now in approximately the same state of development that the airplane was during the early days—say in the days of the Wright brothers when they made their first small step at Kitty Hawk. I'm not sure whether this is a good analogy, but I would like to mention one case in point when the two good brothers were invited to a very important, prestigious dinner and Wilbur was called upon by the toastmaster to make a few remarks—and he sort of stammered and said, "Gee, I'm sorry—there must be some mistake, but Orville is the one that does the talking". Now Orville stood up and said, "Well, Wilbur just made the speech". So I suppose I could say that Neil just made the speech, but I would be remiss if I did not add my own thanks, which I very sincerely feel, for the great honor which has been bestowed upon us.

It's still a bit difficult I think for those connected with the Apollo program to realize just how far we have come since this nation accepted the commitment to go to the moon back in 1961—which was back in the days when we had no Saturn 5 rockets, no even rough idea of how to conduct a rendezvous, no space suits, no lunar modules—well really, not much of anything. It was even in fact before John Glenn had made the first orbital flight. As Dr. Tom Paine, the administrator of NASA said, the lunar exploration mission got under way on vision, discipline, courage and commitment. We gained the essential knowledge and understanding step by step along the way—developing a whole new technology. Mistakes were made, but a team was forged in government, industry and the universities—very importantly the universities—all working together to anticipate obstacles and to overcome them. It is a record of achievement that this nation can be proud of; and, as we learned on our world tour, it has made the people of all other nations, at least all those other nations which we visited, proud as well. President Nixon has spoken of the spirit of Apollo, and we have had ample opportunity these past weeks to see that it really exists, and we feel most fortunate to be able to be a part of it.

You know, I wonder sometimes whether Father Marquette, whom I really admire, would have been admired in this day and age. You know, he set off in search for the Mississippi River at a time when his home parishioners, the Indians, had deep and serious troubles in the lines of education and health, and he probably should not have done that. He probably should have gotten 100% of those things sorted out before he left. But I think he was a wise man and he understood that we have to keep pushing back our frontiers, and that is what we have done on project Apollo, and I hope that that will be the way we'll continue to run this country in the future—to have a blend of solving our problems at home, while we do in fact push our frontiers forward.

I'd like now to introduce Colonel Buzz Aldrin.

Mr. EDWIN ALDRIN. Thank you very much, Mike. I couldn't agree with your words more. Father Raynor, Mr. Windham, distinguished guests, and ladies and gentlemen. The Pere Marquette Discovery Awards have a very special meaning for all of us, because without the stimulus of exploration, whether in the uncharted areas of the earth by men like Pere Marquette, or into the nature of things by explorers in their scientific laboratories, or now, in space, men's mental capabilities would tend to stagnate. Man's concept of himself and of his relation to the earth environment, and now even to the stars, could not have developed save for the broadening and deepening of his vision which this exploration brings. It forms a part of our purpose in existence—a motivation to find ourselves—which today has become a burning issue in a great numbers of the world's populations. We believe that the newest form of exploration in space is opening up the possibility of an entirely new destiny for man. We have run out of many frontiers on the surface of the earth. Mankind has opened unlimited new frontiers in space. Space technology is simply the latest tool to be used in our endless quest for understanding of man's place in the universe. But as a bonus, this tool is also serving to provide material benefits far beyond anything that we would have imagined many years ago—in areas of communications, navigation, weather forecasting, agriculture and forestry, and many other earth resources. The list is almost endless. In this respect, space exploration is following in the tradition of all previous exploration in influencing human development and adaptability—socially, politically and economically. None of us could even venture to guess what will grow out of some of these future explorations. The factor of unpredictability lies at the heart of every discovery—of every venture into the unknown. No one can really foretell in years or centuries to come what we will find. We do know from experience that characteristically, man has the tendency to be very conservative in his estimates of what will come in the future. Very shortly, Apollo 12 will be starting on its voyage to the moon and they, as we did, will make their small steps for man. But there will be many more such steps—longer and much surer than ours—we have no doubt about that.

At this time, we would like to thank all of you for the great honor that you have given all three of us by bestowing this medal on us.

Mr. NEIL ARMSTRONG. Father Raynor, when we were on the moon we had a still camera with us, and it only had one roll of film. We're sure glad it came out—we could prove we were really there. So we'd like to present to Marquette University, and ask you to accept for them, one of the pictures off that roll.

Father RAYNOR. Thank you very much, Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Collins and Mr. Aldrin for this wonderful gift to Marquette University. We know you were really there—it's recorded, and we know that you're really here and we're delighted to have you here. It's really a pleasure to listen to gentlemen like this with their varying approaches to something magnificent that together they have done. I took a special pleasure, of course in listening to Mr. Collins. He's got a good wit; but, as I was telling Neil Armstrong during the meal that he is the best physics teacher that I had anyway, because I remember his TV program—he showed me what it was like to drink water up there in the moon flight.

I want to thank all of you for participating in this tribute to three great men who forged the first link between the earth and the moon. I wish again to express my gratitude to the astronauts themselves, and to all of you who have joined us this evening. I would be remiss if I did not offer a special note of gratitude to the members of the National Pere Marquette Tercentenary Commission, to the Wisconsin State Committee and to the Marquette University Tercentenary Committee, as well as to all of those who have labored so arduously to make this celebration a truly memorable event for Marquette University and for the City of Milwaukee. I hope the example which has been set for us by the historic missions of Father Marquette and the crew of Apollo 11 will continue to inspire each of us to strive, in our own personal way, to emulate them—and to do what we can to create the brightness of a new-born day—as they have done—not for ourselves alone, but for the world, for all of our fellow men—for our country—for everybody.

Thank you very much.

Mr. WINDHAM. Thank you Father Raynor, and thank you gentlemen all. Now His Excellency, Bishop Brust, will give the benediction.

Bishop BRUST. We thank You Almighty Father for the food we have just shared—but tonight especially, our hearts are filled with gratitude for the recent lunar landing. We thank You for the intellectual genius that discovered the laws of nature and the principles of physics from which such a voyage could be conceived. In them we thank You, Almighty Father, Whose divine intellect originally devised the laws of nature and created the limited, finite mind of man designed to discover them. We thank You for the marvelous human skill that produced the machinery for the trip, for they dimly reflect the products of Your divine skill, the balanced universe and the raw material we need for our own works. We thank You for the dedication and the courage of our astronauts who risked all to give humanity a foothold in the heavens. For this reminds us, Father, that You risked sending Your Son to put His footprint and His blood on our planet. And it reminds us, too, that You continually hold out Your hand from the heavens to beckon us to join You there in our true home. Amen.

Mr. WINDHAM. I want to remind you of the arrangements for tonight. In order to facilitate moving to the Performing Arts Center on time, please leave your cars here at Marquette. Busses will be waiting in front to take you to the Performing Arts Center building. The busses will run until all have been returned. Thank you all for coming. We will see you at the Symphony and reception.

FATHER MARQUETTE TERCENTENARY INTERMISSION OF PERE MARQUETTE SYMPHONY

Father RAYNOR. Ladies and gentlemen—my name is John P. Raynor. I am President of Marquette University. You have just listened to Dr. Roy Harris' Pere Marquette Symphony. The symphony was commissioned by the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission as part of the five year celebration honoring the 300th anniversary of this great scholar, explorer, missionary and priest; and his arrival in this part of the world.

Among our guests helping us commemorate this evening—we would like to recognize the following: First of all—the Mayor of the City of Milwaukee, Henry W. Maier. Secondly—our County Executive, Mr. John L. Doyne; and finally—the Acting Governor of the State of Wisconsin, Mr. Jack B. Olson. We have with us also, the Vice Chairman of the National Father Marquette Tercentenary Commission, Congressman Clement Zablocki of Wisconsin.

It is my privilege now, ladies and gentlemen, to introduce the Chairman of that Commission—a fellow Milwaukeean and a very close friend, Mr. James C. Windham, President of the Pabst Brewing Company, together with the Apollo 11 astronauts whose intrepid exploits 300 years later assist us in recalling the deeds of Father Marquette.

Mr. WINDHAM. In my judgment, there will never be a symphony composed that will get that kind of an ovation. Thank you Father Raynor.

Congress established the National Father Marquette Commission in 1965. Two years later, Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Commission with a supply of bronze Marquette medals struck by the United States Mint in Washington, D.C. A small number of medals were coined in silver.

Tonight I have the privilege of presenting to the crew of Apollo 11 silver Father Marquette Tercentenary medals on behalf of the members of the National Commission.

(Medals were then presented in order to Nell Armstrong, Michael Collins and Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr.)

Mr. WINDHAM. NASA was kind enough to assist us in getting the three astronauts to join us this evening, so I had this medal enlarged and put on a plaque to send back to NASA to hang in the NASA headquarters and we will mail this to NASA. Thank you very much gentlemen.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Windham, Father Raynor—it's a great pleasure for me on behalf of not only the crew of Apollo, but the thousands of Americans around the country who have made it possible to accept these awards. It's a particular pleasure to accept them here in this beautiful hall in this magnificient building in the City of Milwaukee. As a small remembrance of our visit here on this occasion, I'd like to present to the Tercentenary Commission a small photograph taken during the flight of Apollo 11.

Mr. WINDHAM. Thank you Neil. This shall be preserved with the records of the Tercentenary Commission, and in the end it will end up in the Library of Congress.

INITIAL TEACHING ALPHABET: TEACH THEM TO READ AT FOUR WITH HELP OF MACHINES

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, last week the General Subcommittee on Education heard testimony from Sir James Pitman, developer of the initial teaching alphabet, on the overwhelming success of his method in teaching very young children to read.

The initial teaching alphabet uses 44 symbols which represent specific sounds, augmenting the present 26 letters of the alphabet. Close to half a million preschool and first grade children in America are learning to read in classes that use ITA. Almost 1½ million children are using the system in England. Surprisingly, children on both sides of the Atlantic encounter no difficulty in making the transition at about the second grade to books that utilize the 26-word alphabet exclusively.

Here in our Nation's Capital, an ITA project is meeting with highly rewarding results in teaching preschoolers to read. Under the creative leadership of Frank Ferguson, 3- and 4-year-olds are learning to read at a day-care center.

A description of Mr. Ferguson's success and the very inexpensive system he has inaugurated appeared in the Washington Post, November 30, 1969. I bring it to the attention of my colleagues today as an excellent example of a highly innovative yet uncomplicated teaching method that works.

Mr. Speaker, the article follows:

TEACH THEM TO READ AT 4 WITH HELP OF MACHINES

(By Colman McCarthy)

James E. Allen Jr., the U.S. Education Commissioner and a man of quiet wisdom, pledged the Nixon administration recently to a new national goal: assuring every citizen "the right to read."

"We should," said Allen, "immediately set for ourselves the goal of assuring that by the end of the 1970s the right to read shall be a reality for all—that no one shall be leaving our schools without the skill and desire necessary to read to the full limits of his capability."

Although the administration has been silent about this new war on illiteracy—it would have been called that a few years ago—the nation's concerned teachers know that it is high time. They see daily the choking, mumbling kids who are helpless before the printed page.

Official statistics are nearly unbelievable: one in four students have serious reading deficiencies; in city schools, up to one in two students read below expectation; one in two jobless youths is functionally illiterate; two in three youngsters tested recently by the Pentagon were below the seventh grade in reading ability.

A UNIQUE PROJECT

One educator who has converted his alarm into creative action is Frank Ferguson, a 30-year-old educational innovator. He is presently directing a Washington day-care reading project that may prove to be one of the programs capable of fulfilling Allen's goal.

Specifically, Ferguson and a skilled staff of eight local teachers are teaching 100 3- and 4-year-olds in inner-city Washington how to read through the use of a low-cost technology. Operating for the past six months on a small Office of Economic Opportunity grant, this project is the only one in the country that is teaching children this young and this poor this cheaply.

Few education programs, to begin with, have tried to teach 3- and 4-year-olds to read, and those that did dealt with middle-class children, usually in experimental classes in a university setting. Moreover, the technology was high cost; talking typewriters, the most common type of early reading technology, cost $35,000 to $45,000 with a high maintenance cost. The Washington project uses audiovisual-response teaching machines that cost only $350.

A BRITISH DEVICE

For many years, Ferguson searched for a method that would quickly, efficiently and unpressuringly allow 3- and 4-year-olds to learn to read. The only one he found that consistently produced results with children that young was the Initial Teaching Alphabet.

First used in British infant schools and now operating in 10 percent of U.S. elementary school districts (according to the ITA Foundation), it has 44 letters, each standing for a sound and covering the entire English language. It borrows 24 letters from the conventional alphabet, drops "x" and "q," adds 17 new symbols resembling combinations of standard letters and adds three new symbols.

"About the same time I came to ITA," says Ferguson, "my 2-year-old son was learning words. I noticed how confused he was when I would say 'table' and then identify one by pointing to the dining room table. Later, we'd be in another room and I'd say 'table' again, this time pointing to the kitchen table or the coffee table or the telephone table. He couldn't understand it. All those different-shaped and different-sized objects, yet all named table.

"It's the same confusion when a child begins reading with the conventional alphabet. He is taught, say, the sound 'i.' There are some 20 ways to spell it, as in eye, aye, aisle, height, cry, choir, by, bye, buy. Or the sound 'a' can be pronounced at least five ways, as in 'The fat father's fate was to fall while skating.'

"For millions of kids, this is when the reading problem begins. They see reading as complex, furtive and frightening. If a child has other problems to cope with, as do most of the poor kids—perhaps no father, or poor health, a crowded home life—he has little stamina to persevere with reading until the system becomes figurable."

So he lags and falls behind. At this early age, he suffers a bruise that in time will swell, fester and eventually make him a social cripple. Society will call him a "functional illiterate" and hand him a broom to do its dirty work.

The reason why Ferguson in the classroom and James Allen in his speeches see early reading as critically important is that by the age of 4, a child has formed half the intelligence he will have at maturity. Well-known educators like Benjamin S. Bloom and J. McVicker Hunt have been saying for years that by the time a child begins school at 6, he has reached two-thirds of the intelligence he will have at 17.

What this means, grimly, is that for many children who do not learn to read at 3 or 4, what begins at 6 is already remedial education.

AN EASY TRANSITION

One of the fears about widespread use of ITA is that it is meant to replace the traditional alphabet. This is not true. After a child learns to read with it, he switches over to the regular alphabet. The conversion is speedy and without trouble.

Psychologically reinforced with success and confidence, the child is now ready for the complexity of the 26-letter alphabet. He does not come cold to the language barrier; thanks to the phonetic code-breaking system of ITA, the barrier has been broken.

The main criticism of ITA is that many children lose its advantages by the time they reach the second and third grades. But this has more to do with the inadequate schools they go into than with the quality of their earlier learning.

British educators take the challenge of early reading much more seriously than Americans. After eight years of trials with ITA, John Downing wrote in the London

Sunday Times: "Teachers who continue to teach reading with the conventional English alphabet and spelling can be sure that they are making it harder for their pupils to become literate. They are using a defective instrument which is a serious handicap to young children in their first steps in learning to read and write."

Locally aside from the day-care reading centers, ITA is used at the Bruce and Monroe elementary schools in the Cardozo area among first and second graders. Bruce Principal Alma Felder said recently: "Since we introduced ITA into our school, I've seen the reading ability of the children blossom almost immediately—not just in the classroom, but also in the official reading tests."

The parents of the children are so sold on ITA that they have asked the D.C. Model Schools Division to use it in the new Tubman school soon to open in the same neighborhood.

One reason why the early-reading innovations of Frank Ferguson are seen by many as among the most exciting in the country is that, aside from the ITA manuals that he and his staff wrote themselves, he is using technology. The self-operating audio-visual machines—developed by Dr. Peter Goldmark of the CBS laboratories at Stamford, Conn.—use 40 cartridges for the entire program.

The machine projects letters and pictures onto a televisionlike screen. A coordinated tape talks and asks questions appropriate to the pictures. The child responds by pushing one of four keys. The machine then advances to a new picture and question—at the child's own pace and pleasure.

"We've only begun to notice," says Ferguson, "that the first thing a child interacts with, after his parents, is television. So his early learning pattern is resoundingly audio-visual. This is why teaching ITA by means of a self-operating machine fits in to the child's life almost naturally. The letters are compatible with his comprehension and the machine, which looks like a TV, fits in with his technological culture."

"ITA works," says Dr. William Zangwell, director of educational evaluation at the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. "It makes a significant improvement in a student's reading ability. Frank Ferguson has gone a step further by packaging it simply. He has taken a good idea out of the laboratory and put it into the classroom."

A PITMAN DEVELOPMENT

Anita Metzger, who has three highly successful early-learning schools in the Atlantic City area, is responsible for bringing the initial Teaching Alphabet to the United States. In 1962, after teaching diction, drama and corrective speech for 35 years and conducting the CBS "Children's Theater of the Air" for two decades, Mrs. Metzger went to London to study under Sir James Pitman, the educator who developed the ITA.

A year later, Mrs. Metzger "imported" the idea to this country. She began with a pilot class of six 4-year-olds and now has three schools with 60 children each.

"In my schools, the 4-year-olds usually spend a year learning to read with ITA," she says. "After they are at ease with it, we transfer them to the standard alphabet. The ITA already has 24 letters from the standard alphabet, so the familiarity is there. I have never had a child who did not make the transfer easily."

After her early successes with ITA, educators began visiting Mrs. Metzger's schools to see for themselves. Among them were representatives of the Ford Foundation.

"They offered me a large sum to spread ITA," said Mrs. Metzger. "But they wanted it to be used among first and second graders. I said it should be done earlier, at ages 4 and 5. That is when the child is eager to learn reading. Why wait just because the system finds it more convenient to begin at ages 6 and 7?

"I wanted to keep control of my schools for another reason. I have something to prove about education: that ITA is the way to defeat illiteracy. I knew I would have to do this on my own, in the private competitive market where the public demands and will appreciate results. I would have liked to have worked in the public school system, but it has become so locked up with outdated and ineffective approaches that it is not capable of more innovation."

Mrs. Metzger will soon open more schools around the country, including one in Silver Spring for 4- and 5-year olds. They will use technology.

"If we're going to educate all the Nation's children—not just in easy reading but in nearly everything—we have to do it with audiovisual machines and computers," she says. "It is time educators got over their fear of technology. The machine won't replace them; it will help them."

DOT NEARS FIRST CYCLE

HON. SAMUEL N. FRIEDEL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, legislation creating the Department of Transportation was enacted a little over 3 years ago. Many changes have come about, both in Government and in industry transportation circles during the agency's initial years of existence.

Harry L. Tennant, longtime transportation writer on the Washington scene, spells out some of the effects the Department has had in the current issue of U.S. transport. I believe this well prepared analysis of DOT, covering its activities thus far shows conclusively that this Department has now won a secure place among other cabinet-level agencies and before long will supply the Congress and the executive branch with some of the answers to the Nation's complicated and troubled transportation problems.

I believe the following excerpts from Mr. Tennant's recent article will be of interest to my colleagues and I include them in the RECORD at this point:

DOT NEARS FIRST CYCLE

(By Harry L. Tennant)

Legislation creating a Department of Transportation was signed nearly three years ago but the staggering task of making sense out of the highly competitive transportation field is far from realized.

True, DOT hasn't chewed up a Secretary or two as happend at the Department of Defense. One might say the agency's achievement has been a move toward a centralized area for all of the fights that have existed among transportation mediums since the depression years.

Lyndon Johnson approved the legislation creating DOT on Oct. 15, 1966, but DOT did not come into being until the following April. Organization has been the order of the day since. DOT can boast of one achievement directly and another indirectly. It has given safety a new emphasis and it has brought a sprawling army of transportation experts to Washington in the industry sector. This has been particularly evident in the shipper and rail areas. This indirect accomplishment has been noticeable in the railroad field where a sizeable army of rail lobbyists have moved into Washington probably giving this industry its greatest Washington team.

". . . Too, DOT has pushed vigorously for high speed rail transportation. And in a sense it has had to drag rail heads along with the thinking. This complexity needs money and lots of it. It may well be that Mr. Volpe's shining hour will come here. If the Administration decides to support a big subsidy venture for passenger train operations, then it may well that Mr. Volpe can guide some of the thinking in Republican circles here. Some, of course, think DOT hasn't pushed as hard as it could in the high speed field, or at least its efforts haven't matched the complaints in Congress. Perhaps the Interstate Commerce Commission's study on rail passenger operations expected momentarily will prod the government into speedier action but certainly little will come out of it legislatively in this session of Congress or for that matter in the next few months.

Urban transportation does have a top priority at DOT. It is perhaps the most political of issues there and it takes a great deal of money. It seems to have more of any immediate priority than the airways-airport programs, but the wrangling in Congress over just how these projects will be financed remains the key stumbling block to faster action.

DOT has thrown in its weight behind higher truck carrying capacities and it has gone along here about as far as it can go. It's anyone's guess whether Congress will approve this.

DOT has also been active in the area of putting more teeth in regulations governing shipment of hazardous materials, both on the highways and railroads. Like most issues this one has been spurred on by Ralph Nader and more recently by the U.S. Army inadvertently. Much will come out of this effort because the States are more and more making themselves heard. This drive is unique in that it is under the jurisdiction of a unit headed by William Jennings and it can make decisions stick. The National Transportation Safety Board which is attached to DOT for administrative purposes has in recent months made its existence felt publicly. Undoubtedly more will be heard from this sector as time goes along.

There is still some evidence that the Federal Aviation Administration would like to be divorced from DOT, but the chances of this are fading. There isn't enough support in Congress and the Administration doesn't appear to be much interested.

Probably the true course of DOT will be steered by such persons as Paul Cherrington and Jim Beggs, both experts and long-time planners. Volpe depends a great deal on these individuals. If they remain, DOT may come out with some striking annual reports in 1971 and 1972. If they leave, the Department could slip back to an earlier state.

But perhaps the most noticeable advancement in Washington transportation circles has been industry reaction to setting up DOT. Numerous persons have been moved into trade and industry groups during the past two years. Practically all of these individuals are experts in one form or another.

Stan Sender, who for a number of years was Transportation Counsel for the Senate Commerce Committee, is directing Sears & Roebuck's transportation activities in Washington. Dr. William Haddon, Jr., former Director of DOT's National Highway Safety Bureau, now heads the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety. He is assisted by Ben Kelly, who directed public relations for the Federal Highway Administration at DOT. Charles Webb, former ICC Chairman and longtime transportation authority, heads the National Association of Motor Bus Owners. He is also assisted by a former DOT information head, Stan Hamilton. The Automobile Manufacturers Association enlisted the services of Lynn Mote, a mainstay on Capitol Hill, who for many years had been closely allied with transportation. Shortly after DOT was set up the National Automobile Dealers Association picked out Frank McCarthy Jr. to help guide its legislative program. McCarthy had been a legislative liaison man at the ICC and had served for a number of years on the House Rules Committee. Ray Courage, also a top new man at DOT, moved into the job of directing problems for the Independent Natural Gas Association.

Such organizations as the Railway Progress Institute moved lock, stock and barrel from Chicago to Washington after the Department came into being. It brought along Nels Lennartson, formerly Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs at the Defense Department. Later Frank Holeman, longtime Washington and New York newsman joined this organization. More recently he has been named Manager of the newly formed organization known as the Tire Industry's Safety Council.

A very significant feature has been the strengthening of the Washington railroad picture. In recent months a number of rail experts have been moved to Washington, some of them with the title of vice president.

Such organizations as the American Trucking Association, the Air Transport Association and the Association of American Railroads have done some shifting about but they remain very much the same. The American Waterways Operators and the Freight Forwarders Institute have reshaped their organizations. Both have become considerably stronger. Reports have circulated for some time that such shipper groups as the National Industrial Traffic League may be redone to match more the needs created by the setting up of DOT and the various congressional committees but this has not yet become a fact.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a resolution which makes me a cosponsor of the equal rights amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Simultaneously I would like to place in the RECORD two articles which are germane to the equal rights issue. The first is by Richard E. Farson and appears in the December 16, 1969, issue of Look magazine. The second appears on the front page of yesterday's Washington Post.

The articles follow:

[From Look magazine, Dec. 16, 1969]

THE RAGE OF WOMEN

(By Richard E. Farson)

On July 31, ten young militants, shouting obscenities and distributing radical literature, burst into a classroom at Macomb County Community College in Warren, Mich. When one student stood up to protest the intrusion, he was pushed into his chair and struck several times in the face. Another student attempting to leave was punched, bitten on the neck, shoulder, and wrist, and taken to a hospital for medical attention. This incident may seem commonplace until you discover that the ten young militants were women, and the literature they were distributing bore the slogan, "Women Rise Up!" Then, for most people, the story seems funny. Just how much longer such episodes will amuse us remains to be seen, for the days in which laughter and ridicule will work to contain the liberation activities of women may be about over. For many women, a long suppressed rage is now beginning to surface, and their movement for equal rights is becoming organized and gaining momentum. We are on the brink of another massive rebellion—the rebellion of women—one that is bound to have a profound impact on all of us and one that could lead to severe disruption, even a major upheaval of our society. It might actually overshadow the black revolution and the student protests, because it involves not another minority but this time a majority of Americans—51 percent. For that reason, it may force us to change where the others have not. That's not to say that members of minority groups, civil rights workers, anti-war demonstrators and student activists have had no impact on the conduct of our national affairs; they obviously have. But most Americans have not been personally touched by their efforts. By and large, we go about our lives in much the same way as we did before "the movement." Our neighborhoods and organizations are not integrated; the violence and destruction are pretty much limited to the black ghettos; we are still at war in Vietnam; the educational system continues unchanged in most important ways; major social and economic reforms have not been made.

Were it not for mass media, most of us would know little or nothing about these protests. Unless one is a politician, a personnel director, a college president or a policeman, he has probably not had to change his way of doing things or even change his way of thinking about most of these issues.

But when women revolt, all of us will change. We will not be able to escape this rebellion, because it reaches into every institution of our society and affects our most personal and intimate relationships. Unfortunately, it has been possible for society to ignore the blacks and the hippies. Mothers and wives and daughters and teachers and secretaries and girl friends cannot be ignored.

The other revolutions took us by surprise. Perhaps we shouldn't have been surprised, because clear warnings were given. But we are slow to recognize social problems and even slower when it comes to correcting them. Paradoxically, it is probably still too early to see the full potential for a women's rebellion and already too late to avoid it.

Any lead time we might have is shortened by the rebellious mood now so pervasive in our society. More than ever before, people want to take part in all aspects of life, want to determine their own futures. They want to contribute up to the level of their actual abilities, not to the level dictated by their traditional social roles. One by one, each of the groups that have been denied full participation in our society is insisting that the wrongs must be righted, that the balance must be redressed. We are getting around to women last because discrimination against them has been so thoroughly a part of our way of life. People are surprised when sociologists tell us that our prejudice against women is more deeply entrenched than that against any minority group in our society, but consider these statistics:

Twenty-nine million women are working, making up one third of our work force—yet almost none hold management or executive positions.

The median salary for women is only 48 percent of what it is for men. Women receive 10 percent less pay than men for similar jobs.

Half the women who work are paid annual salaries under $3,700. Less than two percent of Americans earning $10,000 and up are women.

After half a century of women's suffrage, there is only one woman in the U.S. Senate.

Out of more than 300 administrative posts filled by President Nixon, only 13 have gone to women, and three of those are White House secretaries.

Since the 1930's, women have actually received a decreasing proportion of master's degrees, doctorate and faculty appointments.

Most women professionals are in "women's professions"—schoolteachers, nurses, laboratory assistants, librarians.

Only seven percent of physicians are women, compared to 74 percent in Russia, for example.

Compelling statistics, but even they don't really reflect the many indignities that women endure. They are often denied independent credit, unable to get a mortgage to purchase a house, excluded from many bars, clubs and other social gathering places, dismissed as inferior, emotional, childlike, illogical, irresponsible, incapable of genius. In one state, a woman's clothes legally belong to her husband. Male college graduates are given management aptitude tests; females are given typing tests.

If you visit a women's career day on a college campus, the situation becomes clear almost at once. The organizations trying to recruit women for career opportunities are airline companies (for stewardesses), the Army and Navy (for nurses) and the local banks (for tellers). That's it. Real access to leadership positions in American society is not open to women.

But perhaps the greatest frustration arises out of the very situation that is supposed to bring the greatest satisfaction—family life. American society, aided considerably by Freudian psychology, has held marriage and motherhood to be the ultimate expression of femininity—the only approved road to happiness and fulfillment. To be a complete woman is to be a devoted wife and mother.

Marriage does offer a great deal, but not enough, tapping only a few of the dimensions of a multidimensional human being. Women, like men, are capable of a great deal more than family life.

The home, for many women, has turned out to be a prison from which there is no escape. The average woman, who bears her last child before age 30, is subject to 40 years or more of life when her children are in school or grown. Yet, during these years, she is not permitted to study or work or live in a manner equal to that of a man.

The ideal of the woman as homemaker is a major target of women's liberation groups throughout the country. They deplore the fact that today the only avenue to self-esteem is to be attractive enough to get a man and motherly enough to raise a family. Such American institutions as Mother's Day, Playboy magazine and the Miss America contest have felt the sting of their protest demonstrations. The day may come when their efforts in this direction will have succeeded to the extent that it will seem stereotyped and insulting to portray a "typical" homemaker in the mass media. It would then be as unwise to show a woman opening an oven door on television as it now is to show a black operating an elevator or eating a watermelon.

Every woman has her boiling point, when she will say to herself, "Now I understand what it's all about. I'm ready to rebel." This may happen when she suddenly realizes that she didn't get a promotion simply because she was a woman. Or when she is counseled to become a nurse instead of a doctor, or an elementary schoolteacher instead of a college professor. She may suddenly recall the times she has been treated by her husband or her boss or her lawyer as some kind of a lesser being because she is a woman. Or the way that she is trapped in the role of homemaker and exploited by countless advertisements designed to make her feel guilty or negligent as a wife and mother. The woman is caught in a web of helpless frustration—too well educated to accept anything less than identity as a full person, yet unable to achieve that identity either in the home, which is now only partially fulfilling, or in the "man's world" to which she is denied access. The difference between what her limited roles permit her to be, and what she knows inside she could be, is the source of her incipient rage.

Women may be oppressed, but they seldom feel oppressed. It's as difficult for most women to respond to the call of these liberation groups as it has been for Negroes to join the black revolution. They tend to accept their circumstances with resignation and simply don't believe that they harbor great rage. Nobody really thought that the blacks were enraged either—least of all the blacks themselves—but we found that there was a great reservoir of rage there, just under the surface.

Rage is not impulsive; it appears as openly aggressive behavior only when such behavior is in one way or another made acceptable. We have seen how organizations can legitimize such rage.

The woman's dilemma is either to accept the humiliating role of the second sex or openly express the resentment she may feel. Most women, of course, deal with their anger in other ways. They may become stereotypically gossipy or castrating, but they are more likely to turn their rage against themselves and all women. This self-hate plagues the recruitment effort of the various women's groups for equal rights. Women who will organize to work for almost any other cause are slow to organize in their own behalf. They just don't feel that women are worth it. Since childhood, they have been conditioned to believe that it's a man's world and that their place in it is only in relation to him. If anything, women show more prejudice toward women and do more to perpetuate the stereotype of women than men do. Women who make statements such as, "I wouldn't want to work for another woman," or, "Her aggressiveness just isn't feminine," are marked as the Uncle Toms of the women's revolution and are held in contempt by the liberation groups. (What will we call them, Doris Days?)

We have all heard comments like these: "Women who know their place in the world and accept it are really happy." Or, "They don't really want to be leaders." Or, "This new rebellious attitude is just being stirred up by a lot of agitators who are sick women themselves." Doesn't that kind of talk have a familiar ring? It should, because it's almost exactly what we used to say about blacks, before we started calling them blacks.

The possibility of violence in the women's rebellion cannot be discounted. That is a disturbing thought, and it may be more threatening for women to consider than for men. It's difficult to picture a college co-ed or a middle-aged mother becoming a militant, violent rebel, but it should be abundantly clear that women are entirely capable of violence. We can look to their own suffrage movement, which was not without violence, especially in England, where it was bloody indeed. Or we can simply watch our evening TV newscast and see armed and helmeted girls clashing with police in Chicago.

One after another, the groups in the feminist movement have come to endorse more militant positions, because they feel a more aggressive posture seems to work where reason fails.

One lesson from the black revolution and the student protests is that what gains they have made, as well as what losses they have suffered, seem to have come too often from violence or the threat of it.

It is disturbing to speculate about this potential for violence because this time we're not dealing with a small minority but with the majority. They may control as much as 70 percent of the money. They are well educated and experienced in organizational life. And they inherit all the potent new techniques of protest and change that have come from the civil rights movement and from the student rebellions, techniques that are much more powerful than any we have used in previous generations.

More and more feminist organizations are appearing, and while the largest counts no more than two or three thousand members, they are growing in numbers and strength. There are more than 35 new groups, some strongly militant. One of the best known is the National Organization for Women (NOW), headed by Betty Friedan, author of The Feminine Mystique. Women's Liberation Front, a sizable organization, is roughly divided between action groups that challenge basic American institutions (family structure, capitalism), and encounter groups that feel that the first step in liberation is to help women to discover in each other their plight and their potential. Women's Radical Action Project is the Chicago branch of Women's Liberation Front. Its most noteworthy protest was at the University of Chicago, over the firing of a woman professor. Add to these groups the more militant WITCH (Women's International Terrorist Conspiracy from Hell), who reportedly train themselves in defense tactics and handling firearms; SCUM (the Society For Cutting Up Men) and so on.

An endless and perhaps irrelevant argument can be held over whether women and men are different in more than genitalia. Primitivists and biologists argue that there are important differences between the sexes, in historical conditioning and in makeup. Social anthropologists, on the other hand, can find examples of cultures in which almost anything we think of as masculine is practiced by females. At this point, it matters little. Any differences that exist must not be cause for discrimination. We no longer permit any arguments about fundamental black-white differences to justify discrimination against blacks. Why should we then when it comes to women?

The new feminists seem quite prepared to accept the consequences of equality. "Protective legislation" that supposedly is designed to provide for the weaker sex (limited working hours, lounges and rest periods, etc.) is challenged by them as discriminatory; just one more way of keeping them segregated in a cheap labor pool.

What, then, do women want? Certainly it is not dominance over men. Women of all ages dread that. The NOW bill of rights calls for an end to all forms of discrimination on the basis of sex, access to leadership positions and equal employment opportunities—not only in legislation but in practice. For example, NOW wants an end to help-wanted ads that are classified under separate headings for men and women.

Another set of NOW demands clusters around eliminating the penalties that come with pregnancy and motherhood. NOW's women demand the right to return to their jobs within a reasonable time after childbirth without loss of seniority or accrued benefits, and to be paid maternity leave as a form of Social Security or employee benefit.

They expect a revision of tax laws to permit deduction of child-care costs, provision for government-supported child-care centers and removal of laws governing abortion and birth control. Other demands have to do with guaranteeing equal opportunities in education, including graduate and professional schools, and "revision of welfare legislation and poverty programs that deny women dignity, privacy and self-respect."

Now, the push is for equality with men. Ultimately, however, women may want to become equal to themselves, to realize their own potential—again paralleling the black revolution. Who could have guessed that the blacks didn't simply want what whites have, but instead what they themselves have, their own natural way of being? Who could have predicted a few years ago that blacks would be interested in eating soul food and wearing their hair natural and taking black history courses? If we have come to see that black is truly beautiful, what would it mean to say that woman is beautiful?

Who, for example, might the sexually liberated female be? Here we must be highly tentative because the present influence of sexual freedom groups and lesbian organizations is very difficult to assess. Compared to the mainstream, they do not represent strong currents. We can guess that with the end of the double standard, any concern for chastity will give way to concern for fulfillment. Beyond that, we are probably safe in predicting that heterosexuality is likely to persist as the dominant sexual mode. Around that norm, we may see very different trends. Sexual liberation could mean something quite different, depending upon each woman's previous personal experiences. For some, liberation will be a freedom from sexual pressures and sexual guilts. Sex for countless millions of women has been so full of pain and fear and shame and disappointment that their liberation may be to enjoy a nonsexual life. Others may tend toward lesbianism or bisexuality. In any case, women are likely to become more dominant and aggressive. And studies by Abraham Maslow show that dominant women, contrary to the popular myth, enjoy sex more than submissive women.

As long as we are exploding myths, the idea that women who work are inferior mothers is just not true. Studies show no difference in child-rearing effectiveness between mothers who work and mothers who don't, except that working mothers tend to feel guilty for working. Incidentally, the best workers are also the best mothers.

Also, research indicates that children who are reared in child-care centers, even full-time 24-hour ones such as the kibbutzim in Israel, show adjustments at least as good as those of children who are brought up at home by their parents.

The strategy that will benefit us most will be not only to meet the women's demands but to go far beyond them. We must radically change our schedules of work to enable women, even mothers of infants, to pursue careers of their choice. There is, after all, nothing magical about the nine-to-five workday, which was designed mainly for the convenience of men.

More difficult will be the redesigning of our places of work. Work centers that include child-care units, recreational facilities, even residences must become commonplace in the United States. Sweden has made significant progress along these lines with consequent improvements in the education and employment of women.

Practically everything about our way of life—our economy, our laws, our recreation, our schools, our homes and our cities—will require redesigning to permit women full participation. If this seems too much to ask, it may help to recognize that big changes are necessary to solve big problems, that big changes are relatively easier to make than small ones, and that gradualism, in spite of its rational appeal, has never really worked.

Women's liberation is a cause awaiting a mobilizing incident and a charismatic leader. The student movement needed the Berkeley Free Speech Movement episode and Mario Savio; the civil rights movement needed the Montgomery bus boycott and Martin Luther King, Jr. The women's struggle could take many forms, only depending on the incident and the leader.

There may be a magnificent outcome to all this. A new woman may emerge—a person who is more interesting to be with because she likes herself. She may have a new sexuality, a new beauty and a new relationship to offer a man. The effect on the man may be salutary indeed. Perhaps then he, too, will be liberated.

Women have always been a great humanizing force in our society, devoting an enormous amount of time and energy in their support of social reforms, beginning with the movement to abolish slavery and continuing with their efforts on behalf of child-labor legislation, social casework, slum clearance and many other programs promoting health and welfare. Now perhaps they will rechannel this energy towards helping themselves achieve full humanity. The women's revolution could lead to a genuine human revolution in which we will no longer be willing to settle for so much less than our potential, in which we will no longer allow ourselves to be exploited and deceived, in which we will no longer permit our environment to be polluted and our children endangered, in which we will no longer endure the inanity and superficiality of our human relationships, in which we will no longer tolerate war and violence as the ultimate solution to human conflict.

POLICE WOMAN MUST NOW BE BIG AS MEN

(By Anne Hebald)

Last spring a young woman applied for a job as a policewoman on the metropolitan police force. She failed to qualify because she held only a high school diploma. Women on the force, unlike men, are required to have further education.

She filed a complaint with the D.C. Human Relations Commission citing discriminatory hiring procedures in the metropolitan police department.

The police department responded more literally than the young woman had expected.

The department removed the requirement of higher education for women but at the same time imposed an "equal" physical requirement. Washington policewomen, like men, must now be between 5 feet 7 and 6 feet 4. The minimum weight for women is 118 pounds, for men 135.

Previously, a policewoman could be as short as 5 feet 1 (but no taller than 5 feet 10) and could weigh as little as 110 pounds.

The young woman whose complaint resulted in the changed requirements still cannot get a job on the force.

She is shorter than 5 feet 7.

Chief of Police Jerry V. Wilson responded in an interview yesterday saying, "My point is that if we're going to give women the same work we give men, we've got to hold them to the same size requirements.

"If we set a lower height standard for women doing the same work as men," he said, "then we'd be discriminating against men. The human relations commission would then be getting complaints from short men."

Chief Wilson said the 17-pound difference between minimum weight for policewomen and that for policemen is "a question of effectiveness." He was referring to the difference in weight between a healthy male and a healthy female of the same height.

"It is a fact in this country that most women are shorter than 5 feet 7 inches," J. Donald Anderson, acting deputy director of the D.C. Human Relations Commission, said in an interview yesterday.

The average height of American females is 5 feet 5, according to a study made at the New York University School of Medicine.

Anderson said, too, that "when you translate the requirements you have for men into the same requirements for women, you are still discriminating against women."

Chief Wilson asked the Civil Service Commission in August to amend its regulations governing the admission of women to the uniformed police force. Then, on Oct. 28, he ordered the educational and physical requirements for women changed as part of an experiment.

The personnel director of the police department, James M. Murrey, said in an interview, "As an experiment, we want to see how many situations we can use policewomen in. We want to greatly expand her role on the force."

"We're setting a limit of 100 women for this experiment," Murrey said.

He said he did not yet know the exact length of time the experiment would be in effect. "Several months, maybe a year," he said.

The experiment is intended to add to the police force "a different kind of woman, now," as Murrey phrased it.

Until Oct. 28, the policewoman in Washington was assigned to work on crimes committed by and against women. They were, more or less, social workers within the structure of the police department.

Of the 77 women listed Nov. 25 on police personnel records, 30 are still detailed to the youth division. The youth division is the name given to the former women's bureau, which was dismantled in 1967.

The remaining 47 are detailed to squads outside the youth division, but their work still centers on women.

Officer Romaine Powell, 27, is the first and only woman on the homicide squad. A graduate of Howard University who majored in sociology, Officer Powell has specialized in abortion cases for the past year and a half. She has been on the force since 1965.

"It (an abortion) is a very personal matter and a woman feels more at ease talking to another woman about an unwanted pregnancy," she said in an interview.

In the youth division, Capt. Frances McCall, the highest ranking woman in the police department and a 21-year veteran of the force, told a reporter that the gist of her division's work concerns juvenile delinquency, its causes and prevention.

Capt. McCall also spoke of the undercover work that policewomen have performed:

"A policewoman's work can be very dangerous," she said. They have been called upon to act as decoys when a rapist or mugger is at work.

"In one particular gambling raid, we found we had to have policewomen infiltrate when the suspects became suspicious of our undercover men."

Three policewomen work on the 24-officer sex squad.

Officer Dorothy Peppers, the mother of a 4-year-old son, told a reporter, "Most victims feel more comfortable discussing sex with a woman."

Officer Shirley D. Williams, 24, describes her work in the youth division as "being out on the street every day, getting exposure to what factors go into making a youngster a criminal."

A 1968 graduate of Howard in sociology, Officer Williams said in an interview that working with mothers and children makes her job "rewarding."

Coordinator of the police department's community relations division is Officer Carolyn Charity, who has been on the force since 1954. She represents the police department in American government classes twice daily at the U.S. District Court Building.

"This job is total fulfillment," Officer Charity told a reporter. "There's no boredom and I have the chance to reach young people every day. I work in the community doing work that needs to be done."

MSGR. RAYMOND PUNDA PULASKI DAY AWARD RECIPIENT

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor recently to attend the annual Pulaski Day banquet of the Milwaukee Society-Polish National Alliance. It was particularly a pleasure to be present at this auspicious occasion because the guest of honor and recipient of the Pulaski Day Award was a respected friend, the Right Reverend Monsignor Raymond A. Punda.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Pulaski Day commemorates the lasting contribution of Gen. Casimir Pulaski to our Nation. Fittingly, Monsignor Punda was chosen for special tribute because he, like General Pulaski, has so readily and selflessly served his fellow man.

At a time in history when we are confronted with trouble and violence, at a time when ideals and leaders are needed, at a time when to some more appears to be wrong than right—at times like this it is especially appropriate that we single out for distinction men like Monsignor Punda.

As a young and energetic curate, as an educator and principal of Notre Dame High School, as a devoted pastor of St. Stanislaus Church, and as a respected civic leader, Monsignor Punda has given exemplary service to his Church, his people, and his community.

In order to bring to the attention of my colleagues Monsignor Punda's efforts as an outstanding Polish American citizen, I am pleased to place in the RECORD at this point the addresses of the Most Reverend Alfred L. Abramowicz, auxiliary bishop of Chicago, and of the distinguished Dean of the Marquette University School of Speech, Prof. Alfred J. Sokolnicki:

TRIBUTE TO MONSIGNOR RAYMOND PUNDA

(By the Most Reverend Alfred L. Abramowicz)

I am honored by your invitation today. Bonds of priesthood and friendship have joined Monsignor Punda and myself for over a decade.

He has been to me a personification and an actual realization of what the American Pole should be—first and foremost an American—because this U.S.A., currently so troubled and fissured, is our native land, our fatherland for which we live and die. Under the Star Spangled Banner we have been guaranteed our dignity as a person, our opportunities for education and development, our freedom of religion and speech and a constitutional right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness.

As an American of Polish descent, Monsignor Raymond Punda has gloried in his rich Polish heritage and made his contribution to America from the inheritance he has received.

He is a Pole who does not merely render lip service to the land of his ancestors, but has sacrificed his time, talent and finances in Poland's dark hours of need.

He is a son of Generals Pulaski, Kosciuszko and Krzyzanowski, whose battle cry was, "For your Freedom and Ours," and wavered not to volunteer his service in World War II.

He is a Pole who sees his heritage not in a folk dance, "kielbasa and kapusta," but in the illustrious giants of science like Copernicus, who established the scientific basis for our Space Age and expeditions to the moon—Sklodowska, whose discoveries resulted in today's program of Cancer Research, and Funk, who discovered health-giving vitamins; international and immortal musicians like Chopin, Moniuszko and Paderewski; literary geniuses like Mickiewicz, Sienkiewicz, Conrad, and Reymont; freedom loving men like Paul Wlodkowicz, Andrew Frycz, Christian Post, who with their mighty pens fought for the dignity of the Jew, liberty of the Protestant and reform, abolishment of slavery and equality of all social classes.

Unfortunately, because of past American Anglo-Saxon prejudices or preferences, these names are not given the prominence they deserve in our American history books—nor are they sufficiently mentioned in our news media.

Nevertheless, such great men and women of Poland are a part of the man you honor today—Monsignor Rayond A. Punda—a great American—a great Pole—a great priest.

ADDRESS HONORING MSGR. RAYMOND PUNDA—OUTSTANDING MILWAUKEEAN OF POLISH DESCENT

(By Alfred J. Sokolnicki)

The Milwaukee Society of the Polish National Alliance deserves commendation for demonstrating one fine trait of the Polish character as it honors a clergyman and educator—the Very Reverend Monsignor Raymond Punda as the Outstanding Milwaukeean of Polish Descent in 1969, for his achievements, devotion, and outstanding leadership in Church, Civic, Educational and Cultural organizations and activities.

In Poland's historic tradition, men of the cloth have played a vital role in the religious, political, social, educational and cultural life of the people. Monsignor Punda's contributions in these areas continue and reflect this tradition in our modern age in our Polish-American community.

Polish priests have made outstanding contributions to the life of the church, country and learning. In honoring Monsignor Punda this evening, we also honor these great men from whose lives he has drawn a good example.

Father Jan Dlugosz, 15th century priest, was one of the first Polish historians. The 12th century missionary St. Hyacinth Odrowaz crossed Turkestan and Tibet to reach China preaching Christ's gospel on his way. Father Michael Boym, 17th century priest, brought back from China substantial knowledge of Chinese botany and medicine. Father Jude Thaddeus Krusinski, 17th century scholar, was the first known student of Persian culture and history. His book was translated into many languages. Through the initiative of Father Maximillian Ryll, who lived in the 19th century, the Central Asiatic Seminary of the Jesuits was founded in Syria. It was later transformed into a university.

Nicholas Copernicus, the famous educator and astronomer was a priest. Bishop Adam Krasinski and Father Hugo Kollataj were among the authors of Poland's famous Constitution of the 3rd of May, 1791. Father Augustyn Kordecki, superior at the Czestochowa shrine, is ever renowned as a staunch defender of that holy place during the Swedish invasions. Under Jesuit, Father Peter Skarga, eloquent orator and adviser to the Polish government, the unity between the Catholic and Greek Orthodox Churches was effected in 1596 creating the Uniate church.

While the list could be extended, we can recall other famous Polish distinguished priests, teachers, and saints as St. Stanislaus Bishop and Martyr, St. Stanislaus Kostka, St. John Kanty, and St. Andrew Bobola.

We are making history this evening as we honor an outstanding Milwaukee priest of Polish descent . . . Very Reverend Monsignor Raymond Punda—the second clergyman to be distinguished in this manner. In 1958, the first clergyman to be honored was our late beloved, Bishop Roman Atkielski.

Monsignor Punda, as the current pastor of St. Stanislaus—the first city parish for Polish speaking people in America, which founded the first elementary school under Polish influence . . . and the principal of Notre Dame High School, the only high school under Polish auspices in our city . . . deserves this honor and commendation.

Monsignor Punda exemplifies the basic motto of the Polish people—to serve God and country. He distinguished himself by volunteering his life to serve his Church, and also volunteered four years of his life to active service to his country when he was Chaplain in the Solomon and Philippine Islands.

Tonight's distinguished honor recipient was born on the northeast side of Milwaukee on February 19, 1913. He attended St. Casimir elementary school. His high school days were spent at St. Bonaventure High School in Sturtevant, Wisconsin from which he graduated with highest honors in the class of 1931. Evidence that he was destined for leadership throughout his life began here when he was elected class president, and editor of the school paper and school annual.

In 1931 he entered St. Francis Seminary and was prefect of boys there for three years. Archbishop Stritch ordained Father Punda on June 3, 1939, and a few weeks later appointed him as assistant to Monsignor Wenta, pastor of St. Stanislaus Church. The newly assigned curate did not realize that this was to be his only parish assignment as he has served at St. Stanislaus since then.

During the years 1939–1942, Father Punda was a teacher and athletic director at Notre Dame High School.

In the spring of 1942, he volunteered for military service as infantry chaplain. His service career took him to Fort Bragg, North Carolina, to the 42nd Rainbow Division at Camp Gruber, Oklahoma. He served with the 37th Division in the Solomon and Philippine Islands for two years. For bravery in action he was decorated three times being awarded the Silver Star and two Bronze Stars.

In 1942, at the request of Archbishop Kiley, Father Punda wrote a prayer booklet "Novena, to Our Lady of Victory for Victory and Peace." It was used as a weekly service in most campus and overseas stations and in thousands of churches. Over one million copies were sold as the booklet enjoyed the popularity of 13 printings.

In December of 1945, Fr. Punda returned from the service with the rank of Major. He remained in the active reserves for seven more years.

Returning to the active life at Notre Dame High School, Father Punda was appointed Principal in September 1946—a post he still holds for the 24th year. Pursuing advanced study he received a Master's degree in Educational Administration from Marquette University with a Straight A average in 1951. Exerting educational leadership, he was one of the co-founders and first president of the Wisconsin Association of Principals of Catholic Secondary Schools, in 1955. He served as president for two years.

At the beginning of the Korean War, Father Punda wrote a prayer booklet "Our Lady's Crusade for Peace," with a Homefront and Servicemen's edition. It was used during the war as a weekly prayer service. Over a million copies were sold.

The pastorate at St. Stanislaus was Father Punda's by appointment of Archbishop Meyer. In preparation for its centennial to be held in the fall of 1966, Father Punda began complete restoration and renovation of St. Stanislaus in 1959. In assuming this monumental task he felt the responsibility of preserving much of the original beauty of the church which was built as a monument to the great generosity of hard-working people whose meager means were sacrificed so that God's edifice would be the finest they could build. The renovation emphasized the basic beauty of the church . . . this was for the 20th and 21st century parishioners to appreciate the sacrifices, foresight, and devotion of the 19th century founders of the parish. The church is now regarded by many experts as one of the most beautiful in the midwest.

St. Stanislaus was selected as a National Historical Landmark by the U.S. Department of the Interior. A deserved honor for the Mother Church of our Polonia, which was the home of the first Polish bishop in Milwaukee—Bishop Kozlowski. It was at St. Stanislaus that Monsignor Roman Atkielski was an assistant when called upon to serve our archdiocese in the Chancery.

St. Stanislaus, with its two golden spires, stands out as a landmark and monument to our Polonia. It is there too that we find the world's largest mosaic of Our Lady of Czestochowa, as the enshrined Madonna looks down at passersby on Mitchell Street . . . some kneeling there to pray. In October 1967, Bishop Atkielski unveiled this inspiring symbol of faith, as many faithful men and women held lighted candles and sang and prayed. Busy Mitchell Street, and bustling South 5th Street came to a halt, because the faithful were honoring the Madonna!

During the 30 years at Notre Dame High School, Monsignor Punda saw 5,000 students from 125 parishes graduate. The schpol, which is owned by St. Stanislaus parish since its founding in 1932, always maintained the lowest tuition of all the Catholic high schools, and received no financial help from the diocese or any other parish.

In 1956 the entire high school building was renovated and modernized for the silver jubilee in the fall of 1957. The school received the National Freedom Foundation award for its outstanding program of student participation in school government and activities.

Monsignor Punda identifies with the land of his birth—the United States and with the land of his parents' birth—Poland. He traveled to Poland and met with Cardinal Wyszynski, the Cardinal Primate of Poland in 1959, and in 1967. He was at the special audience Pope Paul had for the Poles when the archbishop of Krakow, Karol Wojtyla became a Cardinal. While in Rome, Monsignor Punda also met Bishop Wladyeslaw Rubin, whom we remember from his Millenium visit to Marquette University and St. Stanislaus, when representing Cardinal Wyszynski.

There is a word in Polish for a true priest-evangelist—it is kaznodzieja. In these modern times one would think that this traditional, honorable, and faithful class of clergyman and leader of the flock would be extinct. Thankfully, in Monsignor Punda we have a "kaznodzieja."

Monsignor Punda has been honored by church and town. In 1965 he was invested a Monsignor by Archbishop Cousins.

He is a member of the Cudworth Post of the American Legion since 1946, and has served as chaplain of the post.

Academically, his credentials and accomplishments have merited inclusion in Who's Who in American Education.

He is listed in Community Leaders of America, again in recognition nationally, for his many endeavors.

In November of 1968, he was awarded the famed Citizenship Award of the Mitchell Street Advancement Association, "in grateful recognition of his untiring efforts and devotion to those ideas which contribute so magnificently to the betterment of our community."'

The most recent tribute to Monsignor Punda was appointment to a seat on the Children's Court Advisory Board, identifying him as an active member of his community working for the good of her citizens and their children.

Without fanfare, in his quiet way, Monsignor Punda has worked diligently for the good of his parishioners, the students at Notre Dame High School, and the citizens of his community. In visiting St. Stanislaus parish hall, one can find there at one time—the Mazur Polish Dancers presenting a mock Polish wedding—at another time special revues of Polish artists from Poland. Tomorrow evening, the Polish revue ESKULAP will perform there.

Monsignor Punda has lived up to the true Polish tradition of giving one's self to God and country. His excellent record of achievements as a parish priest, pastor, principal of a high school, and respected member of the community, eloquently attests to his devotion to his professions in religion, education, and good citizenship.

In this era of crumbling traditions, loss of respect for the authority of God and civil society, and defiance of tradition, we must look to such leaders as Monsignor Punda for good example, leadership, and inspiration. As a spiritual leader of a parish, as principal of a high school, as a respected citizen, he has used every opportunity to show his leadership in a quiet way. He has touched many lives, and because they have touched his, they will be better lives!

In this audience this evening are leaders of our society. Each of them is an influential person—each is involved in many profound and far-reaching activities. . . . Yet, all of these leaders pause tonight to honor Monsignor Punda because they know that he has earned their great respect and commendation.

Truly, Monsignor Punda exemplifies the traditional motto of the land of his parents, Poland—Polonia Semper Fidelis—Poland Always Faithful. So we say tonight—truly, Monsignor Punda is Always Faithful.

SURPRISE IN THE HOUSE: JETS FOR TAIWAN

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, the following article by Warren Unna appeared in the Sunday, November 30, 1969, Washington Post.

It gives the Members of this House some background on the $54.5 billion we authorized recently for Nationalist Chinese aircraft.

SURPRISE IN THE HOUSE: JETS FOR TAIWAN

(By Warren Unna)

Last week a surprise amendment to grant Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist China $54.5 million for a squadron of F–4D jet fighter planes was offered during floor debate and passed as part of the House's foreign aid authorization bill.

Few congressmen knew anything about the amendment. They assumed the Nixon administration was behind the request. So a small House gathering first voted the amendment through by voice vote and then, after it was challenged and a quorum brought in for a roll call vote, the amendment passed, 176 to 169.

The Nationalist China jet squadron was not in the administration's bill, and it still is unwanted by the White House, the State Department, the Agency for International Development and at least the official heads of the Defense Department.

Its passage so angered the House's dwindling coterie of foreign aid friends that the full aid bill nearly was scuttled in its entirety.

The final vote on the $2.2 billion bill was 176 to 163 and the close margin was attributed directly to the planes for Taiwan.

The bill still must be considered on the Senate side. The fate of the squadron for Taiwan will further hinge on foreign aid appropriations in the House and Senate. But the House action still was a considerable coup.

Rep. George Bush (R-Tex.) said later: "I wish I had known the administration was against it before I voted for it."

Pulling a rabbit out of the hat is not unknown in House floor maneuvering, but the Chiang Kai-shek squadron really started revving up just about a year ago.

Last November Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.), chairman of the House Foreign Aid Appropriations subcommittee, made his annual state visit to Taipei and was received by Generalissimo and Madame Chiang.

The United States had just granted South Korea an extra $100 million in military aid following increased activity by Communist North Korea that resulted in an assassination attempt against South Korean President Park, the capture of the U.S. spy ship Pueblo and stepped-up infiltration into South Korea. The $100 million included a new squadron of F-4 jet fighter planes.

Nationalist China's Chiang decided that with the improved Mig fighters Communist China was flying, he had as good reason as South Korea to get a new U.S. jet squadron.

"It was brought to my attention that they just felt that they should have a squadron and I'm a good listener," Passman said in an interview. "I think that whole part of the world is as hot as a firecracker. It was on that basis that I did some footwork."

Since the House Foreign Affairs Committee waited until this month to get the current fiscal year's foreign aid authorization bill on the House floor, Passman, understandably, had to do some running in place.

Meanwhile, another friend of the Chiangs, Rep. Robert L. F. Sikes (D-Fla.), a reserve major general and a key member of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee, made his state visit to Taipei last August. Presumably Sikes also was told about the need for new jets.

MORGAN PERSUADED

A third friend of Nationalist China, Rep. L. Mendel Rivers (D-S.C.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, recently persuaded Rep. Thomas E. Morgan, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, to quietly insert a small observation in his committee's foreign aid report.

It read: "There is danger that the number and quality of aircraft in the Nationalist China inventory may not be adequate to cope with the new and sophisticated aircraft now appearing in increasing numbers, in the armed forces of Communist China."

Then Passman, Sikes and Rivers, with their Pentagon connections, urged some high-level Air Force telephone calls to House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford (R-Mich.) to enlist his assistance.

"There must have been some help from the Pentagon because of Jerry Ford's role," Passman observed blandly. And then he warmed up: "I think the Congress must assume some responsibility. We're not supposed to be just rubber stamps on all the bureaucrats in Washington. When my country is at war, I'm going to support it. I think we should keep our muscle taut."

There still remained the matter of actually drafting the amendment. The day before the House's floor action, Rep. Sikes tried to have the staff of the House Foreign Affairs Committee do it. Rep. Clement E. Zablocki (D-Wis.), at that moment acting committee chairman, described Sikes' request as "a bit unusual since the matter never had come before the committee and Sikes wasn't even a committee member."

Rep. Passman then stepped in. Administration officials said he summoned some Pentagon officials to his office on the morning the bill was to be considered to help him draft the amendment which Sikes, later in the day, was to introduce.

"I asked them for some help if they believed in the amendment," Passman said later. "But not in the actual drafting. I knew all about that and just where to insert it in the bill."

Then, later in the afternoon debate, Rep. Sikes offered his amendment with these words: "If we have to give, let us give it to those who we know are with us. . . . In my opinion, Nationalist China is one of our best friends—if not our best friend—in that part of the world. . . . This is just a drop in the bucket compared to the amounts of money that they require for even a minimum defense of the Republic of China."

THE "NEED'" PARAGRAPH

In quick succession, Sikes was followed by Rivers and Passman and a platoon of their allies all "associating" themselves with the amendment. Rep. John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.) had the assignment of noting the "need" paragraph that Rep. Rivers had inserted in the House Foreign Affairs Committee report.

Rep. Passman, according to onlookers, then started whispering around the debating table: "If you want to save $200 million on the rest of the bill, you had better agree on this one."

Meanwhile, Minority Leader Ford also began lining up votes. Ford later said he had heard about the amendment only two days before—from Sikes—did some "independent checking of my own to very high-ranking responsible people in the administration" and became convinced that Chiang Kai-shek's jet squadron—which the administration hadn't sought—really was wanted.

Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa), who ranks himself with Passman as the leading foreign aid opponent in the House, then jumped up.

"I believe the record ought to at least show that there were no hearings, no justification whatever—before the Foreign Affairs Committee. . . . This is too much money to add to this bill without the slightest justification except the statements of the sponsors," Gross said.

Rep. Donald M. Fraser (D-Minn.), chairman of the Democratic Study Group, noted: "There is no credible evidence that the Communist Chinese have a capability of invading Taiwan. This free use of the taxpayers' money is the reason why our program gets into trouble."

After the vote in which the $54.5 million jet squadron authorization was approved—with no restrictive fixed-year for spending required—some of the Republican Congressmen in the Speaker's Lobby were advising a check with "the Watergate."

A Watergate Apartments penthouse is occupied by Anna Chan Chennault, widow of the Flying Tigers general and a Washington hostess who cultivates friends for Nationalist China.

"All I know was what I read in the papers, Mrs. Chennault said in a subsequent interview. "Congressman Passman was a very good friend of General Chennault's because they both come from Monroe, La., but I haven't seen him in many years. Our legislators develop their own judgment. I'm an American. Lots of people talk about Anna Chennault as a 'lobby for China.' I am the biggest lobby for America. I always try to bring about a better understanding."

For his part, Passman declared: "Mrs. Chennault? I didn't even know she was Vice President of Flying Tigers Airlines or living in Washington. She had no knowledge of this. Mrs. Chennault runs her business and I run mine."

The Senate reportedly will not go along with Chiang Kai-shek's jet aircraft amendment and, even if the matter should survive in conference with the House, the administration says it is determined to get around it.

But the implementing part of foreign aid is in the appropriations process, and this is where Rep. Passman for years has reigned supreme. He says the original administration request for $2.6 billion in economic and military aid should receive an actual appropriation of only around $1 billion. It is not clear whether his $200 million threat on the House floor meant adding or subtracting from his $1 billion target.

It is clear that the more that is added to military aid the less is available for economic aid.

Last year, Passman sent out word that the $30 million allotted to Nationalist China in military aid had better be raised by $6 million or the rest of the bill would be in jeopardy.

"We therefore did right by him and he did right by us in giving us the full appropriation on the military side," one government official disclosed.

This year, the Pentagon says it has no F4–D jet fighter squadron readily available, and doubts that $54.5 million would pay for one anyway.

But Passman said the Air Force's support "goes all the way to the top." The Louisiana congressman feels encouraged.

"I have the honor to chair a committee which gives me a little leverage," Passman said. "And even though I am a foe of foreign aid and voted against this overall bill as I always do, I'm going to do everything within my power for this little amendment."

A SPECIAL KIND OF BIAS

HON. PAUL J. FANNIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, Vice President AGNEW's journey into the sacred land of some journalistic opinionists has apparently pricked the ultrathin skin of some who pride themselves on being able to dish it out, but quake in the process of "taking it."

The Milwaukee Sentinel of November 21, 1969, has written an excellent editorial which makes a contribution to the discussion on this matter I consider most enlightening.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SLD BIAS

What is the bias that Vice-President Agnew called into question in his speech criticizing network television news?

Agnew didn't attempt to spell it out. We do. Specifically, it is socialist, labor and Democratic, in that order.

Contrary to what Agnew suggested, this socialist-labor-Democratic bias, hereinafter referred to as SLD, is not confined to a little group of TV editors and personalities. Instead, it is characteristic of that part of the nation's news media ruled by the Washington-New York axis.

Network television merely reflects—or, more accurately, casts the shadows in advance of—the SLD bias. The reason for focusing on TV, as Agnew pointed out, is because of its tremendous national impact.

SOCIALISTS WANT A RULE BY FEW

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that the socialist bias comes first. Too many of the people who gather and present the news in America are the products of colleges where they were brainwashed to love socialism and hate capitalism. The socialists are for government by the elite few, such as they have in the Soviet Union. They despise a free market, simply because it puts power into the hands of all the people instead of into the hands of those few who presume to know what is best for us common folk.

Therefore, the socialist conditioned reporter or commentator, whether wittingly or unwittingly, chooses the stories, words, phrases and expressions which tend to advance the collectivist cause and to impede the capitalistic system and free market economy. This attitude even leads them to be soft on communism and hard on Americanism.

How does the labor bias then come in? It comes in second because the socialist minded cleverly recognize that in labor they have the voting troops with which to exercise political power in the democratic process.

Labor enjoys a special privilege in the form of compulsory unionism which gives it the money and the muscle to wield extraordinary political power. Small wonder that socialism makes labor its ally.

Thus when the labor unions serve socialism's aims, as in domestic spending programs, the SLD biased news media work hand in glove with them. But when labor unions go against the socialist minded, as they did in voting in support of the Nixon administration on Vietnam, they are given the silent treatment.

As for the Democratic bias, this is so simply because the Democrats have been the party of the labor unions and, in the north, the friend of socialism. Democrats who don't please the SLD bias are given short shrift on publicity, while any Republican who does something to please the SLD can count on the fullest national exposure, at least on one issue. One has only to check the record on publicity given senators against the antiballistic missile system or against the confirmation of Judge Clement Haynsworth to the supreme court to see the SLD bias at work.

When anyone dares to charge this Washington-New York axis with bias, it turns on two defense mechanisms. One is to raise the specter of government censorship. The other is to invoke the right of dissent.

In doing so, the SLD biased news media divert attention from the issue of their bias. They should not be permitted to get away with it, especially considering, as the vice-president said, a form of censorship already exists in the axis' own operation. And as for dissent, the SLD biased reporters and commentators seem to take the position that it is all right for them, but not for anyone else who is so bold as to challenge their prejudices.

A FOURSQUARE SOCIETY FOR A BETTER AMERICA

HON. LOUIS C. WYMAN

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, occasionally prominent lay members are privileged to deliver the Sunday sermon in congregational churches across the country. Recently at my own Brookside church in Manchester, N.H., such an outstanding lay message was delivered by Mr. Carl Noyes, of Manchester, that I am including it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the interest and benefit of all citizens. It is a challenging, dynamic response to a sorely disturbed society.

As an example of interest to colleagues and others the following is an excerpt from Mr. Noyes' compelling address:

Other disturbing things have been happening. Non-books and non-plays are being thrown together and sold by non-writers who never bothered to learn how to write. Murky poems are being ground out by scraggily poets who have to sing them to their audience because they are unreadable. And non-actors have now confused acting with lewdness and nakedness. If you agree with these remarks, we will all definitely be branded as squares, but if we are so branded, remember that we will be in pretty good company, because our Christian world, and this country was discovered, put together, fought for, and saved by squares. It's easy to prove that Jesus Christ, Nathan Hale, Patrick Henry, Paul Revere, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin and almost anyone else you would want to claim as a hero were squares. You can prove it by thinking what anyone of them would have said if he had not been a square. For example—

Jesus Christ—What, me carry a cross up Calvary Hill so I can redeem mankind. Let them save their own souls!

Patrick Henry—Sure I'm for liberty first last and always, but let's be a little realistic. We're a pretty small outfit and if we start pushing the British around someone is going to get hurt.

Paul Revere—What do you mean—me ride through every Middlesex village and town? And in the middle of the night yet? Why pick on me? Am I the only man in Boston with a horse?

Benjamin Franklin—What we really need as an American Ambassador to France is a young man. I'm 70 years old. It's time a new generation took over.

Are you convinced now that your heroes were squares? And yet it's difficult at times for us to emulate them. The forces of conformity are still strong. Too many of us are sitting it out instead of sweating it out. Too many of us haven't got the guts to stand up straight and be square. Because the opposite of square is round and being round is so much simpler. Responsibilities and problems roll off nice and easy. Too many of us know the short cuts and too few know or care where the path leads. Too few of us dare to leave the path, because the path is always the easy way, the way most people go. But there is no path to the future, no path to greatness, no path to progress, no path to outer space or to inner satisfaction.

Think a little about this organization called S.O.S.—Society of Squares. It could have a secret handshake consisting of grabbing the other guys' hand as though you meant it and looking him straight in the eye. It would be in favor of participation, and against sitting life out, for simplicity and against sophistication, for laughter and against sniggering, for America and against her enemies, for the direct and against the devious, for education and against the pretense of learning, for building and against tearing down; for the honest way and against the short cut. Aren't you glad to be a square and wouldn't you like to join the S.O.S.?

Would that all across this great land of opportunity there might be 10,000 Carl Noyes to similarly urge Americans to stand foursquare for a better America.

The sermon follows:

We are living in troubled times. There is dissension in the ghettos, there are grave racial problems, there is unrest on the college campuses, there is great disagreement on national policy as it affects the war in Viet Nam, and people are staying away from church by the thousands because they think the church is either not relevant, or because they think the church is taking positions and stands which have nothing to do with religion. During troubled times such as these, allowing freedom of speech and permitting people to voice unpopular opinions can be a soul searching experience for any administration, whether it be in Washington, on the college campus, in the hierarchy of the church, or even in the home where the parent finds himself at odds with his teen age children.

You may be asking at this point—what has this got to do with the church budget and the every member canvass? The connection may be more apparent if I read to you a news item in the November 7th Union Leader which reported that the Trustees of the New Hampshire Conference of United Church of Christ voted to provide financial assistance to persons wishing to participate in the current anti-Viet Nam demonstrations in Washington, D.C. I quote from the article as follows:

"Charles D. Broadbent, Conference Associate Minister, announced that Dr. Robert Moss, President of the United Church of Christ will take part in the 'March against Death' set for November 13–15 in the nation's capitol. The Board of Trustees of the N.H. Conference has considered his invitation to other churchmen who share his concern to join with him in calling for the end of the hostilities in Viet Nam and believes it should pass on this information to our people in the state. The Associate Minister said the board also believes that it shall make possible participation by those who may need some assistance in travel expense. A modest amount of support has therefore been set aside for those whose Christian convictions lead them to participate in this particular activity."

Several of our members have voiced their objection both verbally and in writing to this use of church funds in a cause which many of us do not support, however much we may agree with their right to state their opinion. This article was the subject of lengthy discussion at the last meeting of the Board of Trustees of this church, both as to the effect it might have on our present every member canvass, and as to whether we should provide funds in our budget for the Christian World Mission of the United Church of Christ. We were told that only five Trustees of the N. H. Conference out of only nine present took this action over the objection of Dr. Everett Barrows, Executive Director of the N. H. Conference and that the repercussions have been such that a special meeting of the full board was called for November 14th to consider rescinding the previous vote. We also understand that six churches in New Hampshire have threatened to resign from the conference in opposition to this vote. I think all of us agree that the war in Viet Nam is a most unpopular war and we would all like to see it over with. There are many distinguished leaders, both military and civilian who question the wisdom of the United States being involved in the war. I have a draft age son and a college daughter to whom I am sometimes unable to give intelligent answers, and I confess to being bewildered at times myself. On the other hand, I do have faith in the democratic system by which we establish national policy. I don't believe in government by referendum, nor do I think national policy should be set in the streets. I think it is a shame that patriotism is considered to be old fashioned and I object violently to having church funds used to support what I consider to be an unpatriotic cause, that has nothing whatsoever to do with religion and the proper goals of the church.

What should we do? Should we secede from the United Church of Christ? I think not. I don't think we can blame Dallas for Jack Ruby, nor Memphis for John Ray nor can we blame Los Angeles for Sirhan Sirhan. Neither can we blame the United Church of Christ for a few idealistic crackpots on the Conference Board of Trustees. With all the troubles that beset us, I suggest this is when the church most needs our support. On the other hand, the trustees of this church do feel we should voice our disapproval in some tangible way. Accordingly, at our last meeting we voted unanimously to withhold all funds the current year's budget designated from the Christian World Mission pending some expression of opinion from the congregation at large. Unfortunately, there was not sufficient time to call a special meeting of the church for this Sunday which would comply with the By-laws of the church. I should also explain that the trustees are very much aware of the need to carry on a Christian Mission, but feel that for the time being we should perform our missionary activities in our own back yard—in places like the Goffs Falls Church and also for some of the deprived people in our own community.

At this point then I would ask you to stand if you support the action of the trustees in withholding funds for the Christian World Mission until further notice. Now, would those who oppose the action of the trustees please stand.

The Board of Trustees will be guided by the sentiments you have just expressed. While I sincerely respect the opinions of those who may disagree with us, I would like to pay those who agree with us the compliment of calling them loveable SQUARES.

A couple of years ago I heard a speech by Charles Brower, President of the advertising firm of Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborne, Inc. in which he advocated forming a new organization called S.O.S.—Society of Squares. I'd like to relate to you my recollection of that speech, which made a great impression on me.

Back a generation or so ago, square was one of the finest words in the English language, certainly among the top ten in any printer's hit parade. You gave a man a square deal if you were honest, you gave him a square meal if he was hungry, you stood foursquare for everything you thought was right, and square against everything else. When you got out of debt you were square with the world. And, that was when you could look your fellow man square in the eye.

Something has happened in the last 25 years both in the way some of the avant garde thinks and also in the meaning of the word square. Although we have always had our share of freeloaders in this country, it is only lately that non-involvement has become an accepted way of life. When we were poor we had to sweat it out. We couldn't afford detachment from the life and fate of our country. And one of the great dangers of both personal and national affluence is that it permits such detachment. The new generation seems to have bent the word square all out of shape. Prison convicts gave it the first twist. To them a square was an inmate who would not conform to the convict code. Today, everyone knows what a square is. He is the man who never learned to get away with it. He's the character who volunteers when he doesn't have to. He's the odd ball who gets his kicks from trying to do something better than anyone else. He's the boob who gets so involved in his work that he has to be reminded to go home. He's the slob who gets all choked up when the band plays "America the Beautiful" or when the choir sings the "Battle Hymn of the Republic". That's what a square is and he doesn't fit too neatly into the current group of angle players, corner-cutters, sharpshooters and goof-offs. He doesn't want to fly now and pay later. He's burdened down with old fashioned ideas of honesty, loyalty, courage, and thirft. Aren't you glad to be a square even though you may be on your way to extinction?

Teddy Roosevelt once said, "Far better it is to dare mighty things, to win glorious triumphs, even though checkered by failure, than to take rank with those poor souls who neither enjoy much nor suffer much because they live in the gray twilight that knows not victory nor defeat". End quote. In those days the United States was the greatest exporter of ideas the world had ever known. We sold abroad the idea of individual dignity, responsibility, and freedom. We created and sold the idea of government of the people, by the people, and for the people—and this idea is still being bought today. We exported the idea of freedom of worship, the idea of freedom of speech, and a free press—even the idea that those who are taxed should be represented. Lately, however, we seem to be importing ideas from countries that would like to do us in. We seem to have imported the idea of a strong government for a weak people. We have bought from abroad the idea of "Let Jack do it" and "What's in it for me?" We have even bought the gesture of the neatly shrugged shoulder.

Other disturbing things have been happening. Non-books and non-plays are being thrown together and sold by non-writers who never bothered to learn how to write. Murky poems are being ground out by scraggily poets who have to sing them to their audience because they are unreadable. And non-actors have now confused acting with lewdness and nakedness. If you agree with these remarks, we will all definitely be branded as squares, but if we are so branded, remember that we will be in pretty good company, because our Christian world, and this country was discovered, put together, fought for, and saved by squares. Aren't you glad to be a square and wouldn't you like to join the S.O.S.?

Let's be squares, let's meet our Christian commitments squarely, and let's show Manchester what kind of a job the Brookside Church can do when we all work together. Even if you shouldn't be a square, we still need your help.

Thank you.

A TRIBUTE TO VICTORIA POPKIN

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, in a time when the propriety of dissent is being called into question, we have more reason than ever to cherish the dedicated men and women who devote their full energies to guarding and protecting our traditional liberties. One such lady was Miss Victoria Popkin, who was the associate director of the Washington office of the American Civil Liberties Union. Miss Popkin died recently at the tragically early age of 27, and I rise to pay my respects to her memory.

A native of New York, Miss Popkin was a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Goucher College, and a graduate of Stanford University Law School where she served with both the Legal Aid Society and the Law Students Civil Rights Research Council. After completing her studies, she worked with the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee and the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, before joining the staff of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Miss Popkin dedicated herself to the preservation and full vindication of the civil rights and civil liberties of all Americans, regardless of their particular creed or convictions. Her devotion was not to any partisan cause or ideological position, but to the fundamental rights which we all should enjoy and jealously preserve. She will be deeply missed by all of us.

I should like to include at this point a resolution recently passed by the National Board of the American Civil Liberties Union. Those who knew her better and worked closely with her can speak of her much more eloquently than I could ever hope to:

RESOLUTION ON THE DEATH OF VICTORIA POPKIN

Victoria Popkin, Associate Director of the Washington Office of the American Civil Liberties Union, died on September 15th at the age of twenty-seven.

Miss Popkin came to the ACLU a year and a half ago after having worked briefly for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. She graduated from Goucher College, magna cum laude, and from Stanford Law School where she was on the Law Review.

Her slight frame contained a tough, analytical intellect that displayed itself daily in her job of preparing legislative testimony and legal briefs. All of her work was characterized by forcefulness, sense and clarity.

But Miss Popkin had more than a fine mind. She had the courage to disregard her infirmities, the insight and wisdom of people more experienced and older than she, and a quiet strength and humor that brightened the lives of all with whom she came in contact. In her all too-brief service for the ACLU she made a remarkable contribution.

The Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union extends sincere condolences to her parents, her brother and her sister.

FORMER CHIEF JUSTICE EARL WARREN

HON. HUGH SCOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, on November 19, at the New York Hilton, the National Urban League Conference honored former Chief Justice Earl Warren for "historic" contributions to the cause of human rights.

The National Urban League presented its Equal Opportunity Day Award for advancing the civil rights movement through landmark decisions on school desegregation, voting, reapportionment, and individual rights.

I ask unanimous consent that the tribute to Chief Justice Warren delivered by James A. Linen, president of the National Urban League, and the remarks of former Chief Justice Earl Warren before the Equal Opportunity Day dinner of the National Urban League, November 19, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO CHIEF JUSTICE EARL WARREN (RETIRED)

(By James A. Linen)

Years ago we first asked Earl Warren, the Fourteenth Chief Justice of the United States, to share this platform with us. But such were his own stern scruples while he was in office that Chief Justice Warren has never before allowed us the opportunity to pay tribute to his accomplishments.

So it is with immense pride that I stand before you at this moment. I am proud to represent the National Urban League on this occasion, and proud also to represent Time Incorporated. The law, Henry Luce once said, is "the place where order and freedom meet." Our late Founder's concern for the rule of law in national and international affairs was profound—and so was his respect for the United States Supreme Court. "If the Supreme Court were to abdicate tomorrow," he once said, "this nation would by its very nature be erecting another spokesman of our sovereign Constitution and the supreme law of the land."

It is a considerable challenge to try to sum up, in just a few moments, Earl Warren's immense contribution to our country. For the past sixteen years, he has guided the Court through a period of activity unprecedented in its history. I need hardly remind you of the great advances these exciting years have brought in school desegregation and voting rights, in the elimination of discrimination in housing, in advocating the one-man-one-vote doctrine, and in the development of a system of criminal justice that offers better protection for the individual. The Warren Court was not afraid to tackle these tough issues—issues that critically involve personal liberties and civil rights—and make firm judgments on them.

Earl Warren himself, in a statement last spring, best described the activist spirit of the Court over which he presided. He said, "I have heard a great many people say to me: 'Well, I agree with your opinions on these civil rights all right, but don't you think you are going too fast?' Of course, the answer to that is, 'We haven't anything to say about how fast we go.' We go with the cases that come to us; and when they come to us with a question of human liberties in them, we either hear them and decide them or we let them go and sweep them under the rug only to leave them for future generations. That has been done in this country not only long enough but altogether too long. There are problems facing us today which, if they had been solved a century ago or even a generation ago, we would not have to face today; or, at least, if we did, they would be of manageable size."

That was what Earl Warren said about his Court. He could have said the same about his own life. As a youth in Bakersfield, California, grandson of a Norwegian carpenter, he faced poverty by working as a newsboy, a freight hustler, a farm hand, and—I'm proud to say—as a cub reporter. From then on, Earl Warren was "going with the cases that came to him"—as a junior lawyer in San Francisco and Oakland, later as deputy district attorney and district attorney for Alameda County, California. In that job, though he quickly earned a reputation as a fearless prosecutor, he said he "never heard a jury bring in a verdict of guilty but that I felt sick at the pit of my stomach."

As a three-term governor of California, Earl Warren in the nineteen forties and early nineteen fifties solved problems that many states are only now beginning to confront. While California's population nearly doubled during his years as governor, Earl Warren nevertheless helped create one of the nation's greatest educational systems there. He also made long strides in health and highways. And he had much to do with the development of California's Department of Corrections, whose advanced ideas about penology have since been widely imitated throughout the country.

"Is it fair?" has been a question Earl Warren has repeatedly asked during his career. Long ago he came to the firm conclusion that America was not playing fair with her minority citizens. Soon after he took office as California's governor in 1943, Earl Warren let it be known that he would not tolerate racial discrimination in the state's various bureaucracies. He himself appointed Negroes to many key positions and saw to it that many inequities facing black and brown Californians were corrected. When Warren sought the Republican presidential nomination in 1948, and again in 1952, one of the key planks in his personal platform was "one law for all men and equal opportunity in life for all men."

With these and many other examples of his attitude toward equal rights already implanted on his record, Earl Warren went to Washington in 1953 to take over as Chief Justice. To those who had known him before, his firm and unflinching guidance of the Court came as no surprise. For they knew Earl Warren as a man of uncompromising principles . . . a man soon frustrated by avoidance of the issues . . . a man whose ability to grow from job to job destined him to achieve greatness.

So it is not only fair, but overdue, for the National Urban League to bestow on Chief Justice Earl Warren the honor we have long known he has richly deserved. It is a great privilege for me, on behalf of the Urban League movement as a whole, to present him with our 1969 Equal Opportunity Day award. Chief Justice Warren.

REMARKS OF EARL WARREN, FORMER CHIEF JUSTICE U.S. SUPREME COURT

I am very proud to accept an award from the National Urban League because I have been familiar with its work for many years—long before I had any thought of becoming Chief Justice of the United States. I remember this pioneer organization and the assistance it gave to me during my many years of political life in California. I am particularly happy that the Award should be your Equal Opportunity Award—not because I feel I have been particularly helpful in that area of activity, but because I know it is the cherished aim of the National Urban League. Some worthy people have organizations focus their activities on different phases of our social problems, but your organization has been known for all the years I have been acquainted with it with grass-root activities designed to bring opportunity to those who have been deprived of it principally because of racial discrimination.

In the hierachy of human rights, there are few to compare in importance with that of equal opportunity, because so many other rights are implicit in it—the right of human dignity; the right of education; the right to a decent home; and the opportunity to obtain a useful job which will enable one to feel that he is a needed member of society. It is hard to believe in this advanced stage of our civilization and the general standards of affluence that these rights would not be afforded to every citizen in accordance with the American ideal.

What is that American ideal? It is simply and precisely stated thusly in the Declaration of Independence—

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness."

This noble language, fortified by the implementing language of the 14th Amendment, makes the picture complete—

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

In seven years, it will be two centuries since the Declaration of Independence became the hope of the downtrodden throughout the Western world. It has been 101 years since the 14th Amendment made equality a mandate of the United States Government, and it was 106 years ago today that Lincoln delivered his Gettysburg Address in which he said that our Forefathers had "brought forth on this continent a new nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

Isn't it about time that it be made a reality?

But there are still thousands of public schools where black children cannot enter only because they are black and are relegated to inferior standards of education which should shock the conscience of all of us. There are thousands of voting places where a black person for the same reason is prevented from casting his vote and participating in his Government. There are many industries in which a man, regardless of his skill, cannot obtain a job or join a union to make an honest living for his family merely because of his color. There are millions of our citizens who are as confined to ghettos and the sordid conditions which exist there as though there was an impenetrable wall around them.

But what seems worst of all to me is that there are still thousands of churches in the Nation where a black person is not welcome to worship and in many where he or she would be jailed for trying to do so.

To our Nation's great injury, both at home and abroad, all of these conditions exist in defiance of the mandates of the Constitution and the laws of the United States. As a result, the domestic problems of our country have grown to gigantic magnitude. Many of them are at the crisis stage—some at the violent stage.

The causes of our problems are many and complex, and it would serve no purpose to review them in this company which has wrestled with them for more than a half century.

Our great cities, including this one where we gather tonight, have conditions that cry out for solution—solutions which are not forthcoming even under the leadership of a great public servant like Mayor Lindsay. Neither the financial resources at the municipal level nor the national commitment to the cause is available.

While many things must be done before our cities can be restored to a healthy condition, it is quite apparent that none of our major problems can be solved until race prejudice becomes a fiction of the past and we fulfill the promise of two centuries ago that all men are created equal and are entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Is this too much to ask? I think not. Can it be done? I believe it can. What does it take—adherence to the American ideal I have been speaking of.

Tonight our intrepid astronauts are walking on the moon because our Government, with the acquiescence of all of us, committed the Nation to this task. We regimented the scientific and technological forces of the Nation—tens of thousands of them with their supporting personnel—and we have spent, I believe, 25 billion dollars in accomplishing the mission. It has been a great accomplishment, and was possible only because there was national commitment to that end.

If we can do that, certainly we can commit our hearts and minds, as well as our finances to affording equal opportunity to every American.

Those who are not concerned with closing the gap between the profession of the American ideal and its performance employ the euphamistic saying that we cannot have both guns and butter. It is time to say to them, "If that is true, then let us just have the butter."

I do believe that the American people will awaken to their responsibilities to our cities and to the poor and neglected in our society, but it is very late in coming. And if this is going to be a great country for our children and their children, we must now have a massive national assault upon our urban problems, free from racial prejudice and from the last vestiges of slavery, the bill for which we are now paying in full.

I wish you continued success in your great labors.

FNMA REACHES A MILESTONE

HON. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, today, the Federal National Mortgage Association's president, Raymond H. Lapin, announced that the unique corporation of which he is head has passed a landmark point in its history. Mr. Lapin made public that he has been advised that his corporation has satisfied the essential requirement for the control of the corporation to pass completely into private hands. I am advised that Mr. Lapin will ask his board of directors to certify that one-third of the corporation's stock is held by individuals and companies involved in the housing and home finance business. This is the important test we set for total private control of FNMA to take place.

Mr. Speaker, when we included the legislation to allow FNMA to become entirely privately owned and controlled in last year's Housing and Urban Development Act, we all hoped that this transformation could be completed promptly. This was our hope because we recognized that a private FNMA—one completely free of the strictures of the Federal budget—could do more to help support the FHA/VA backed mortgage market. When we fixed May 1, 1970, as the earliest date at which the shift to private ownership could take place, we were setting a goal. The aim that we hoped FNMA could be ready for private status in 18 months. FNMA has surpassed that ambitious goal. They are now ready to assume their mandated role as a privately controlled corporation.

It would be well to consider why FNMA has reached this milestone so early. It has been successful in doing so because it has been able to channel an unparalleled flow of funds into the FHA/VA mortgage market. The stock has been placed in the hands of house and home finance industry people because they are legally required, as a condition to using the secondary market facilities of FNMA, to purchase FNMA stock. Because FNMA has been called upon to engage in unprecedented level of support for the FHA/VA mortgage market. It has been able to place its stock in the hands of the "qualifying owners" sooner than we could have foreseen. The stockholders have apparently decided to hold their FNMA stock: probably because the stock has proven to be such an attractive investment—its price has tripled since the authority was granted for FNMA to assume private status.

In my judgment, the record of FNMA over the last 14 months, is a testimonial to the ability of the private sector to operate in the public good. The two men most responsible for constructing this enviable record both have an admirable record of achievement in corporate leadership and public service. Both HUD Secretary Romney, and FNMA President Lapin, are to know and understand the importance of private corporation participating in programs which confer important public good. With the direction that excellent individuals have given FNMA during this formative period, I am sure that the privately controlled FNMA is on a well-fixed course of public service through support of Government-backed mortgages.

HIGH SCHOOL POLL ON VIETNAM

HON. JAMES A. McCLURE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. Speaker, the students of Lakeland High School in Rathdrum were polled by the school's newspaper on the subject of Vietnam. After a study and discussion of the situation in which our country finds itself, these young people overwhelmingly gave their support to the President's plan for ending the war. Some elements of the national news media would have us believe that most students throughout the country repudiate American policy in Southeast Asia and that they are particularly opposed to Mr. Nixon's efforts to bring the conflict to an honorable conclusion.

I think the poll of Lakeland High pupils illustrates a number of things. For one, it indicates that not all of today's youth are of the sign-carrying, anti-everything variety. It tends to substantiate the recent statements of Mr. AGNEW that the national press is selling us a piece of goods as far as the war is concerned. More than that, it is further proof that Mr. Nixon and his policies enjoy the support of the vast majority of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the students and the faculty of Lakeland High and include the results of their poll in the RECORD at this point:

LHS VIETNAM OPINION POLL

What should the United States' policy be in regard to its future participation in Vietnam?

Immediate withdrawal	19
Staged withdrawal combined with gradual Vietnamization of the conflict	163
Maintenance of current strength	12
Sudden, major escalation to include bombing	33

Should the U.S. aim for a—

Unilateral ceasefire	19
Mutual ceasefire	168
No ceasefire	37

Do you favor Pres. Nixon's approach to the war?

Yes	166
No	68

Should the U.S. try for a—

Strengthening of South Vietnamese government	181
Coalition between Saigon and Vietcong	38
Surrender to North Vietnam	4

Do you think the Paris negotiations will ultimately lead to a settlement of this war?

Yes	32
No	192

Do you feel that the Moratorium helped or hindered the cause of ultimate peace?

Helped	69
Hindered	159

What is your political preference?

FRANK SURACI, SR.

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, Frank Suraci, Sr., is a remarkable example of a fine American gentleman. Even more than that, he sums up in his life the story of what America has meant to so many people who were born on distant shores and who came to this country to build their own lives and to build this great Nation.

In 1906 Mr. Suraci left his home in Calabria in Italy and landed in New York at the age of 12. Eight years later, when the first rumblings of World War I started in Europe, Frank and his brother Anthony opened a very small cigar business with 10 workers in the city of New York. For 4 years they worked together in the business known as the Suraci Bros. until America was caught up in that war and Frank joined the American Army as a member of the 77th Division.

When the war was finished, he went back to the cigar business which continued to grow until in 1930 the brothers decided to move out of New York City. In their wisdom they chose to come to Pennsylvania, to the city of Scranton. In Scranton they became the manufacturers of cigars under the name of the "Parodi Cigar Co." There were about 75 people working for the company at that time. The business prospered in Scranton. Over many years the firm acquired the Denobili Cigar Co.; and Parodi and Denobili cigars have been the outstandingly successful Italian-style cigars sold in America. The brothers also acquired American firms and are literally producing hundreds of brands of American cigars, the best known of which is the Blackstone. Today their cigars are manufactured in three plants, all of them in the State of Pennsylvania in the Scranton area.

As the company grew, Frank involved himself in the growth of the community around him. He became a member of all of the civic organizations which worked so hard to build new economy in the city of Scranton. He became a leader in the Roman Catholic Church in the Scranton area. He has worked closely with the Elks Club, with the American Legion, in their many philanthropies. He has given generously to educational institutions, and has created the Suraci Museum in honor of his brother Anthony at Marywood College in Scranton, Pa. He serves also as board member of the community medical center and the Clarks Summit State Hospital.

Today the Pennsylvania delegation is holding a luncheon to honor Mr. Frank Suraci, Sr. After his long years as president of the Parodi Cigar Co., he has recently assumed the office of chairman of the board and chief executive officer. Anthony, Sr., his beloved brother, is deceased or he would be with us today. We are fortunate, however, to have Mr. Suraci's two sons, Frank, Jr., and Henry, as well as his nephew, Anthony, Jr. Robert Keating, president of Parodi Cigars and the husband of Anthony's daughter Flora, is also with us today, as is Mr. Ted Cott, president of the Cigar Institute of America. Amelia, his beloved wife, is home in Scranton and I know that she joins all of us in this tribute to a fine man.

It is my privilege to introduce Frank Suraci, Sr., to the Pennsylvania delegation. They will meet a man who came to this country as a small boy and who now, at the age of 76, has created a distinguished industrial name. They will also meet a man who never forgot the homeland from which he came. He has been the chairman of the committee for the relief of the orphans of Italy for the past 5 years. Perhaps some of those small children may follow in his own footsteps and may also find the same distinction he found among us in Pennsylvania.

We have all read about the American dream, of an immigrant boy coming to America to find fame and fortune in this land of ours. That dream lives in Frank Suraci, Sr. Because he came among us, the wheels of commerce spin just a little faster. Because he came among us, our cultural life has become richer. Because he came among us, many hands which reached for help received it.

If his own life has become a successful one through his choosing America as his home, so also America has become a finer Nation through his life. It is a memorable honor to salute such an outstanding citizen of this great Nation.

PINKVILLE AND THE PRESS

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, Lt. William Calley and S/Sgt. David Mitchell have suffered the ignominy of having all combat medals and awards revoked—as a result of unprecedented trial in the news media. With all their indepth reporting, the press has failed to mention that Sgt. Mitchell of Louisiana is a Negro, possibly because he was fighting for his county and not marching against it.

Most civilized countries accord an accused the humanitarian consideration of innocence until guilt is proven beyond reasonable doubt. Both these men had already faced death in Vietnam only to return home and find themselves sentenced by the communications media to a lifetime of digrace in the eyes of their countrymen.

One network, we now learn, has confessed to the buying of staged interviews to produce "news" for profit.

In legitimate courts, paid witnesses are regarded with suspicion—their testimony given strict scrutiny and even then regarded of questionable probative value. But trial by press offers no cross-examination, no rebuttal, nor explanation by either the accused or for the benefit of the jury, that is, public opinion.

The Pinkville massacre production follows earlier patterns of bias and contrivance to obtain an objective such as we have seen with the arranged "pot party," and the staged performance of CBS' "hunger" child. In this instance the objective is to get our forces out of Vietnam and disarm our military. Once again, the communications people have attempted to exploit the Pinkville incident and make the real defendant the military forces of our country.

The American people are daily becoming more aware that the news media is being used as a weapon of psychological warfare against them. With their credibility at an all-time low and by flaunting any pretext of ethics or truth, the national news media again prove Vice President AGNEW's report, and are courting a massive reaction by the people.

The theory of relative honesty was also a practice in new morality by Lenin, who believed anything is good if it advances the revolution.

I include three news clippings:

LOCAL SOLDIER STRIPPED OF MEDALS IN ALLEGED DEATHS

A St. Francisvlle soldier, Army S. Sgt. David Mitchell, 29, has had his combat medals revoked because of alleged involvement in the death of Vietnamese civilians.

He has been accused of assault with intent to commit murder in connection with an alleged slaughter of inhabitants of a South Viet Nam village.

Mitchell lost his two good conduct medals, Viet Nam service medal, Viet Nam campaign medal, National Defense service medal, and Combat Infantry badge. He is the son of a Baptist minister in St. Francisville, the Reverend Isiah Mitchell.

First Lt. William L. Calley, 26, of Miami, Florida, charged with premeditated multiple murder, also lost his medals and ribbons.

CBS ADMITS PAYING FOR MEADLO INTERVIEW

(By Jim G. Lucas)

CBS News admited today it paid an "undisclosed amount of money" to a group of free lance reporters for arranging its controversial TV interview Monday with a young Vietnam war veteran from Indiana.

The youth, 22-year-old Paul Meadlo, of West Terre Haute, asserted that he and his fellow soldiers shot 370 South Vietnamese civilians to death in an attack on Song My village last year.

Mr. Meadlo said he was following orders of 1st Lt. William L. Calley Jr., his platoon commander, whom the army has announced it will try for murder in the alleged massacre of the Vietnamese civilians.

"SUBSTANTIAL"

David Obst, general manager of Dispatch News Service (which only got around to incorporating yesterday), described the payment from CBS as "substantial" as did Michael Nussbaum, attorney for the news service.

"Now we have a little money to play around with," chortled Mr. Obst, a 23-year-old Chinese language student who studied in Tiawan and at the University of California at Berkeley. "We're on our way."

Both Mr. Nussbaum and Michael Silver, CBS news director in New York, emphatically denied that Mr. Meadlo was paid anything by CBS or the news service.

"It was stipulated in the written agreement . . . that none of the money paid would go to the interviewee," Mr. Silver said in a formal statement. "CBS news policy prohibits paying people for news interviews."

Mr. Silver said Dispatch News Service approached CBS first, and that it agreed to pay for the Meadlo interview because news service editor Seymour M. Hersh had "exclusive access" to him.

The Meadlo interview caused an immediate furore in Congress. His voice rising with emotion, Sen. Peter H. Dominick, R-Colo., charged an "ordinarily responsible network" had taken the position, apparently, that "anytime it is news one can dissiminate it regardless of an individual's rights."

Sen. Dominick charged CBS had jeopardized Lt. Calley's right to a fair trial and also had failed to warn Mr. Meadlo of his rights.

CBS News rejected this contention, saying it believes the free press-fair trial issue "does not apply in this situation inasmuch as Lt. Calley will not be tried by a civilian jury but by a board of professional soldiers who are disciplined to make their decision on the basis of military law." Mr. Meadlo was "entitled to make his story public if that was his decision," CBS News declared.

Meanwhile, at Dispatch News Service's office in the National Press Building, Mr. Obst, speaking for his "editor-in-chief," Hersh, first said it was "hard to say" how many reporters the service employs.

"We have groups of investigative reporters working all over the world," he said, but then specified four in Washington and 14 elsewhere.

Three in Saigon he named as Michael Morrow, Don Ronke and Dick Berliner. Among those in Washington he named Mr. Hersh, Derek Norcross, who, Mr. Obst said, "also writes youth notes for Parade" and Richard J. Barnet.

Mr. Barnet, a 32-year-old Harvard graduate and former director of research for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, recently visited Hanoi, where he said he had an "extended interview" with Premier Pham Van Dong. He recently declined to discuss his trip or interview because, he said, an account of it was being sold by Dispatch News Service.

While conceding that "we all have a point of view," Mr. Obst denied that Dispatch News Service is "antiwar, antiestablishment or antianything" or that it is "connected with any organization or group."

"It was tough the first two months," he said, "getting rid of the idea we were the Liberation News Service (which serves underground antiwar papers), and of course we never were. Now we are financially solvent. We are formalizing our staff relationships setting salaries and getting newspapers to publish our stories. We have established our credibility.

So far, Mr. Obst said, Dispatch News Service has no regular clients. But he said it had 36 "one-shot" takers on its first story by Mr. Hersh on Nov. 13, disclosing that Lt. Calley was under army investigation in the Song My massacre, 32 on its second involving a couple of sergeants who said they were involved in the shootings and many more on its third, an interview with Mr. Meadlo.

"We'll be around for quite a while," he predicted.

Kingpin of the news service obviously is Mr. Hersh, a 32-year-old former Associated Press Pentagon correspondent who served briefly as press secretary during last year's race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

A nervous, fast talking man, Mr. Hersh has written a book about germ warfare, and was writing another when, he says, he got a tip on the Song My massacre from a Pentagon friend. He got a $1,000 grant from the Phillip M. Stern Foundation for investigative journalism and began two months of traveling which eventually led to his initial story on the investigation.

LET'S NOT JUMP TO CONCLUSIONS

(By Ralph de Toledano)

Some of the more zealous of our citizenry have already tried and convicted the men accused of a "masacre" of civilians in My Lai, a South Vietnamese village. To be sure, the charges against First Lieutenant William L. Calley Jr. and the other defendants are specific enough to encourage conclusion-jumping. But comments in the press have gone far beyond this, and inflamatory photographs have contributed to the masochistic hysteria gripping some of the media.

There are, however, some dubious aspects to the case which warrant attentiton. For one thing, why did the Pentagon wait so long before it began investigating? The facts were known to the appropriate authorities and to members of Congress for many months. Obviously the military had looked into the circumstances surrounding the attack on My Lai. Is a panicky Pentagon now responding to a calculated propaganda campaign launched by anti-Vietnam groups?

I would hesitate to raise this point had I not heard Charles A. West, of Chicago, who served under Lieutenant Calley. His account differs drastically from the superheated stories now circulating. He has said, moreover, that he would testify for the defendants. People are being led to believe, for example, that C. Company, 1st Battalion, of the 20th Infantry, moved into My Lai with no opposition, rounded up old men, women and children, and wantonly shot them down. This, according to Mr. West, is not true.

According to Mr. West's eyewitness account, this was C Company's first combat engagement. Before moving in, the unit was read a "field paragraph" stating that My Lai harbored Viet Cong and North Vietnamese troops. It ordered C. Company to take and destroy the village—standard tactics in counterinsurgency operations. The "field paragraph" came from headquarters, which means that Lieutenant Calley and his immediate superiors had a hand in its authorship.

In moving on My Lai, says Mr. West, Charlie Company was badly bloodied—with soldiers killed and wounded by snipers and booby traps. The company was pinned down by enemy fire just outside the village and took shelter in a rice paddy. When it attacked, it was met by sniper fire. When the company entered the village, they found many dead as a result of artillery shelling and bombing from the air. The only firing into groups of old men, women and children he saw occurred when military age males deliberately ran among these civilians. Eventually, it was establishd that at least some of these were Viet Cong or NVA troops.

So much for the horrific story at My Lai was a peaceful village with no enemy forces in it, which was taken with no opposition. Charlie company went in shooting because it was being fired upon. "A whole lot of the kids and women were already wounded from the bombing," Mr. West said. "There were men in NVA uniforms. Our men killed some of those who were wounded. Sometimes it was a mercy, they were pretty torn apart."

In the attack, some of what Mr. West calls "yanigans"—young, raw troops—went crazy. Others, however, rounded up women and children and led them to the safety of the rice paddies. After the assault, according to Mr. West, "we rounded up everyone left in the village, and they, too, were sent to the rice paddies. The only men deliberately shot were military age males who had no South Vietnamese identification cards and who refused to answer questions. They were shot by a counter-intelligence unit—not C Company. Though he was with Lieutenant Calley for a good part of the time, he never saw him kill anyone.

Charlie Company's behavior, according to Mr. West's account: A group of men, never before tested in battle, see some of its own men killed. Acting in fear and burying that fear in anger, overreacts. There is nothing of "premeditation" to this. There is no comparison to the actions of the Viet Cong in Hue, for example, where thousands of civilians were forced to dig their own graves and then were shot or buried alive. There is even less comparison to the systematic murder of civilians by the Viet Cong in remote villages, in a strategy of terror.

The questions remain. Why did the Pentagon suddenly decide to bear down on Charlie Company 20 months after the My Lai battle? And why did that battle become a national issue at a time when public opinion on the Vietnam war demonstrated itself to be strongly in support of President Nixon's policies? The answer to these two questions will explain far more than any fevered rhetoric.

DANGER IN PERMITTING EXCESSIVE LUMBERING IN OUR NATIONAL FORESTS

HON. JOHN V. TUNNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. Speaker, the preservation of our precious natural resources for the use and enjoyment of present and future generations is a matter of urgent national concern. That concern is cogently expressed in a recent speech given by Michael McCloskey, conservation director of the Sierra Club, before Town Hall, a civic forum in Los Angeles. Mr. McCloskey cites the danger to our national forests in permitting excessive lumbering.

Our spiralling population needs expanded park and recreational facilities. National forest areas can help to meet this demand. We must be careful not to sacrifice public land to private commercial development, where that interferes with the priority of giving increased scope to leisure time activity and improving the quality of our environment.

Mr. McCloskey has given very thoughtful consideration to this problem. I include a summary of his speech in the RECORD:

THE THREAT TO OUR NATIONAL FORESTS POSED BY THE NATIONAL TIMBER SUPPLY ACTS

(By Michael McCloskey)

WHAT IS HAPPENING TO OUR NATIONAL FORESTS

The governing charter for these forests is the Multiple Use-Sustained Yield Act of 1960, which prescribes that various uses should be balanced, and not necessarily according to their highest economic values.

In practice, though, 90% of the national forest land has been allocated to lumbering and grazing, mainly the former. Only 10% or less has been allocated to recreation and non-commercial values.

Conservationists feel that at least another 5% should be allocated to recreational uses, such as wilderness, recreation areas, and parks.

The problem, thus, is that multiple use practices are already grossly over-weighted in favor of commercial uses of a local nature.

Examples of existing imbalance can be found in controversies on the Kern Plateau and the Siskiyou's in California, in the Cascades of Oregon and Washington, and the Rocky Mountains where frequently timber sales are subsidized.

What Industry Wants: it wants the remaining old-growth cut out in 15 years. Under current practice, the Forest Service had planned to ration this out for about 100 years. The industry is proposing the National Timber Supply Acts as an innocuous appearing vehicle to enable them to achieve this goal.

WHAT IS THE CONDITION OF THE TIMBER INDUSTRY

Consumption of wood products has been static since 1910.

Per capita consumption of lumber has been declining: from 219 board feet in 1950 to 170 board feet in 1968.

The pattern of new housing starts has been static for almost two decades: there was about the same number of new housing starts in 1967 as in 1947: 1.2 million starts; this year there will be only about 1.3 million.

New housing programs should be aimed at relieving problems of central core cities. These areas need mainly multi-family units, which use only two-fifths as much wood as single-family units. Multi-family units are satisfying an increasing share of the market.

In housing construction, there is also a growing trend to substitute metals, plastics, and concrete for wood products; these substitutes are rapidly displacing wood.

Private timber lands are being over-cut: whereas only 35% of the wood inventory of the nation is in private hands, some 61% of the cut is coming off these lands; much is being cut in excess of the rate of 1 or 2% of the inventory that may be safely removed each year.

Rather than there being a pent-up demand for wood, this country has been exporting an increasing surplus of logs and lumber: about 4 billion board feet this year; this rate has doubled in the last few years.

Despite an over-all surplus, over-cutting has created shortages of logs and stumpage in some West Coast localities among improvident lumbermen who have not kept reserves. As evidence of their improvidence, three-fourths of the mills in the douglas-fir subregion went out of business in the last two decades; 26 plywood mills have shut down in the last two years alone.

To the extent there are conservation problems in timber management, they consist of over-cutting private lands, of excessive soil erosion, and the need for re-forestation, principally on private lands, where 95% of the unstocked, and under-stocked sites are found.

WHAT DOES THE NATIONAL TIMBER SUPPLY ACT PORTEND?

These bills, H.R. 12025 and S. 1832, are now pending before the House and Senate Agriculture Committees. They are being urgently pressed by the timber industry, ostensibly to meet the housing shortage.

The proposal

The Act declares that there is a need to substantially increase the timber cut on the national forests.

It makes high-yield forestry mandatory on all commercial timber lands in the national forests; commercial timber lands are defined as consisting of all those lands, capable of producing commercially usable timber, which are not presently withdrawn for recreational purposes.

The Act directs that cutting rates be sharply increased—so that the old-growth will be quickly liquidated.

And the Act earmarks receipts from timber sales into a fund which will be used to promote highly intensive forestry, specifically to be used for such practices as advance road construction, fertilization, and reforestation. The object is to quickly bring back new crops of timber to replace the forests to be quickly cut.

What's wrong with the proposal?

The Act directs all the attention to the national forests, whereas the real problem is on private timber lands.

No clear need has been proven to vastly increase production of wood; in fact the industry is having to advertise heavily to shore up markets, and is expanding exports.

Of the commercial timberlands (97 million acres) that would be mandated for high-yield forestry, some 6 to 8 million acres of them should be withdrawn for recreational use and protection; this land, which has not yet been touched, would soon be decimated.

Cutting rates should not be substantially increased; more of the old-growth should be withdrawn for protection, and the rest should be rationed out so that only 10% of the forests are disrupted at any one time, not 20 to 40% as this bill would cause to happen. The other multiple values of the public forests will be badly damaged if this happens.

Not all of the high yield techniques have been proven, particularly fertilization and breeding of special stocks. If forests are treated as row crops, with reliance on even-aged stands of single species, unstable forests may result which will be disease prone; heavy use of pesticides and fertilizers may grossly upset the ecology of forests and watersheds.

The bill will inflexibly earmark federal revenue for timber production on economically marginal sites, often on a subsidized basis. Such monies could yield a higher return in other public programs.

What then do we advocate?

That the focus of remedial action be on private land. We need another blue-ribbon investigating commission, such as the Copeland Commission in the 1930's, to look at the status of forestry in the United States today. Perhaps its work will show we need a federal Forest Practices Act to regulate mismanaged private holdings.

We need true balance in the management of our national forests, which have already over-weighted their planning in favor of industry. We need fairer allocations, and forestry based on long rotations, mixed stands of all ages, and guidelines set by broad ecological principles.

We need an end to subsidies for uneconomic timber production on marginal sites in the national forests, such as in the Rocky Mountains.

Controls are needed over any special funding that is provided for intensive forest management on the national forests. If new funds are provided for intensive production, they ought to be usable only on lands that have been specifically identified as having their highest value for timber production (we concede there might be about 80 million such acres in the national forests), and these lands should be classified for such purposes only after public notice, hearings, and provision for appeals.

In other words, the planning and allocation process should be an open process inviting public participation, just as is provided for wilderness allocation. What is fair for one use, is fair for another, particularly as timbering is a highly disruptive use.

CONCLUSION

The National Timber Supply Act is a cloak for an effort by the timber industry to "raid" the national forests for more high quality timber—timber for which they hope to promote a new market under the guise of the Housing Act of 1968. The Act is not needed to meet the housing shortage, and it will badly impair balanced use of our national forests.

LAND REFORM IN SOUTH VIETNAM

HON. FLOYD V. HICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the following article, last in a series to appear in the RECORD from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer of October 5, 1969.

These informative articles were written by Mr. Frank Herbert, Post-Intelligencer staff writer who accompanied Dr. Roy L. Prosterman to South Vietnam where Dr. Prosterman was adviser to the Saigon government on the difficult problem of land reform.

U.S. MAY "BLUNDER" INTO TOTAL ABANDONMENT OF SOUTH VIETNAM

(By Frank Herbert)

The Vietnam War could be at some kind of turning point with the report that the U.S. may be attempting to work out a behind-the-scene accommodation with Hanoi.

If this fails, however, there are other factors. One, indicated to me in conversations with U.S. officials in Saigon, could be considered a dangerous political package for sale to the American voter.

Experienced military and political analysts in Saigon disagree strongly with the way the news from Vietnam is being "managed."

In general, the problem can be described this way:

Faced with an enemy possibly committed to a long war of attrition, the U.S. also could be digging in for a long war if all attempts for reasonable accommodation fail. But the U.S. government has been presenting the possibility of such a decision to the American public in questionable terms.

BLUNDER

Those terms, Saigon informants say, could blow up in our faces, forcing the U.S. into that ultimate blunder, a complete abandonment of Vietnam—the withdrawal of which the South Vietnamese are so fearful.

Vietnamese term such a withdrawal "bugging out."

The consequences of withdrawal would be bloody: Innumerable Vietnamese who have not supported Hanoi and the Viet Cong would die in the blood purges. And the U.S. position would suffer damage over the world.

At the heart of this political package is a three-point assessment of Gen. Creighton Abrams, our military commander in Vietnam, and by Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker and his aides.

They say:

1—A purely military victory is still within our grasp and we can safely ignore problems of building a secure political base among South Vietnam's rural population.

2—Our pacification program has 80 per cent of South Vietnam's population in a "C" security classification or better. ("C" indicates dangerous at night, relatively secure in daylight.)

3—The Viet Cong infrastructure has been cleaned out sufficiently so that the enemy no longer is able to mount a Tet style offensive.

Abrams and Bunker have asserted these points with great vehemence at the White House.

At the same time, the Abrams-Bunker package could be sugar-coated with a new draft law, a form of draft roulette more acceptable to U.S. students. It could be further sweetened by withdrawals of troops from Vietnam, perhaps even up to the 250,000 figure President Nixon currently uses.

Veteran observers on the Congressional staff feel these arguments have great appeal to Nixon—he could hand the U.S. the military victory which eluded President Johnson.

There is, however, substantial disagreement with the Abrams-Bunker assessments. The disagreements are voiced by U.S. line officers and former Vietminh intelligence officers who are in the field with South Vietnamese forces.

FLED

It must be remembered that the ex-Vietminh in South Vietnam today are those Vietnamese nationalists who fought beside the communists to defeat the French. They then fled south because they could not stomach communism.

The result, however, is that these Vietminh are among the most knowledgeable people in the world when it comes to communist tactics.

The point they keep making over and over is that Hanoi adapts its moves to shifts in U.S. internal politics much the way a judo fighter uses an opponent's strength against him. A slight push here, a feint there, a tap here, and the giant topples.

They emphasize what Hanoi knows—that a crucial U.S. election is coming up, with Nixon wanting his party to capture a decisive majority of the senatorial seats which the Democrats must hazard at the polls.

At the same time, they point out, Hanoi is well aware of the propaganda power in U.S. student unrest—some of which reputedly is communist inspired. It demonstrates the classic pattern of Marxist tactics—use of any disaffection to communist ends.

It's well to note that the increasing objections to our conduct of the war in Vietnam is creating extraordinarily strange bedfellows—moderate Republican congressmen and senators, as well as liberal Democrats, all of whom say they are ready to back a severe limitation on our Vietnam involvement. In addition are formerly neutral students who are enlisting in the militant anti-Vietnam cause.

You know we're in trouble when you hear a bank president's wife say: "When we first got involved in Vietnam, my grandson was only ten. He reaches draft age next year, and I'm worried that he may be sent over there to be killed. I ask myself: For what reason?"

Knowing these things, knowing the fragility in our assessment of the Vietnam situation, what are the communists likely to do?

We have a vital known fact to throw into our answer: The communists have at least two divisions of the North Vietnamese Army's main force in the Mekong Delta.

FAILING

This has been interpreted by our Military Assistance Command-Vietnam (MACV) as meaning the communist recruiting program is failing. They say Hanoi must bring in regulars because they no longer can recruit enough local force.

Bolstering their argument, MACV spokesmen point to recent captures of Viet Cong personnel who are only 16 years old, calling this "the bottom of the barrel."

Recent U.S. sweeps also have taken rice stocks which were carried from China. MACV says this indicates the VC no longer can depend on food supplies from South Vietnam's peasants.

But U.S. line officers and former Vietminh call these dangerous assumptions when dealing with an enemy whose plans invariably prove to be extremely long range.

For example, the former Vietminh say the VC has introduced "straw cadres" into many hamlets and villages, an infrastructure put there for U.S. pacification teams to remove without actually touching any real, hard core VC cadre.

U.S. line officers say we have been capturing young VC since the beginning of hostilities and that the numbers captured recently are not significant.

These officers also are worried by an old military axiom called "economy of force." North Vietnam's General Giap has committed only five per cent of his main force in the South. But this five per cent keeps 90 per cent of the U.S. force occupied.

The rice, they say, can be explained as a friendship gesture by the Chinese to their fellow communists in the South.

What is left?

SUPPORT

On paper, MACV can show they have removed much of the support the communists require for their operations—people to scout local and familiar terrain, porters to carry supplies and equipment, people to provide and prepare food and shelter, dig bunkers, to care for the wounded and the sick.

But let us suppose the ex-Vietminh assessment is closer to actuality. It's an assessment disturbingly supported by the poor quality of our field intelligence in many regions.

Local residents in vital areas are not supplying us with accurate information about the VC. This quality of local intelligence is a sensitive indicator of how well our civil operations programs are succeeding.

Given all these facts—political-psychological military—and keeping in mind the lesson of Dien Bien Phu where the Vietminh used porters to bring in heavy artillery to inflict a savage defeat upon the French—given all this, which nerve on the U.S. giant is Hanoi likely to push?

Suppose they mount an all-out attack on a vulnerable province capital in the Mekong Delta. This could be, my informants in South Vietnam suggested, a capital in the region south of Saigon around the provinces of Dinh Tuong, Kien Hoa, Vinh Binh and Vinh Long.

Why this region? Even on U.S. hamlet security maps, this is a region dotted by heavy concentrations of VC control. In addition to outright VC control, the region is also heavily pocked by communities rated "C" in the security classification.

NIGHT

This means they are under VC control at night. For purposes of secret VC operations, it means they are effectively in VC hands. No one is going to give us intelligence information in the day if he knows he can be killed for this action at night.

If the communists capture such a capital, many observers believe they will have a special hostage. Presence of civil population will make our artillery and bombers virtually useless.

It would be a house-to-house battle much as it was in Hue.

The communists' next move is obvious: Raise the Provisional Revolutionary Government's flag and call in the neutral and Iron Curtain press.

The fact that this would be a city under siege would insure maximum news coverage for the event all over the world, including our own press.

This is a fear voiced by Abrams, by Bunker and by many of our Embassy and Mission experts—but always in the context of too swift a U.S. pull-out from Vietnam.

It's a fear President Nguyen Van Thieu has voiced in relation to proposed partitioning of his country.

But make special note that MACV experts do not rate ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) forces in the delta very high. The 20,000 U.S. support troops scattered over the delta could be expected to carry the brunt of the counter-attack and our casualties would be high.

This is the effect Hanoi is after.

At this point, even if we recaptured the provincial capital, the political damage in the U.S. would have been done.

The weak fabric of the story we had been sold—successful pacification, military victory possible, no more Tets—would be exposed.

If this occurs at the time of the 1970 elections, it will be a major political issue here (just as Hanoi would want it to be) and it will be characterized as another costly U.S. blunder.

Given the present outcry for getting us out of Vietnam, projecting that political climate into such a 1970 election mess, we could get a Congress and an electorate which would leave the President no choice.

Nixon says he does not want to be the first U.S. President to preside over a military defeat, but he could be forced to quit the field in Vietnam, leaving Hanoi the victor, having been party to our ultimate blunder in a long tragedy of errors.

LET THEM EAT PROMISES: THE POLITICS OF HUNGER IN AMERICA

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, as people from all over the Nation gather in Washington this week for the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health, I believe it appropriate to call attention to the publication on December 1 of a book by Nick Kotz, entitled "Let Them Eat Promises: The Politics of Hunger in America."

Mr. Kotz, a Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register, has an outstanding reputation as a Pulitzer prize-winning journalist and the publication of this eloquent and significant volume will, I am sure, bring him increased stature among all those Americans who are concerned that there are so many hungry and undernourished people in our wealthy and affluent land.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in the RECORD I insert a description of "Let Them Eat Promises," which contains a biographical sketch of Mr. Kotz.

I also insert several comments on his book and two reviews of the publication in the Washington Star and Washington Post:

"LET THEM EAT PROMISES"

What happens to the human body—and to the human brain—when it is denied adequate nutrition during its most crucial period of development? Why do thousands of American children grow up stunted in growth, weakened in strength, alienated by hunger? Why do politicians, government officials, and legislators stand by as the richest country in the history of the world denies food to millions of its citizens? What is the truth behind the shocking phenomenon of hunger in America?

Let Them Eat Promises is the first book to explore in depth this crucial and complex problem. With the focal point on one issue—hunger—Nick Kotz explores the faults and fallacies in our country's domestic programs. With keen insight, he tells why we never even got to the battle stations for the War on Poverty. He reveals just who are the hungry people of America; what is happening to their minds and bodies as a result of their deprivation, and how two Presidents ignored secret reports warning of those consequences. He tells the story of how politics got the hunger issue going and how politics almost squashed it, and how—behind closed doors of the White House—warring forces at the top level of government are still trying to balance economy against humanity.

A fast-moving, dramatically presented indictment of public apathy and government neglect, Let Them Eat Promises reveals the hidden truths behind our number one disgrace. For the first time, here are all the secret bargains, the backroom political dealings, the broken promises and the political priorities which continue to leave millions of famlies hungry as America turns her back.

In awarding Nathan K. (Nick) Kotz the first Robert F. Kennedy Journalism Award in 1969, the judges cited his "continuing coverage of hunger and rural poverty in America—exposing the mismanagement of federal food programs." As a Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register and other Cowles publications, Kotz has won many of journalism's major honors: a 1968 Pulitzer Prize, a 1966 Sigma Delta Chi Award, and the Raymond Clapper Memorial Award in 1966 and 1968, making him the first two-time winner of this recognition for outstanding Washington correspondence. Born in San Antonio, Texas, Kotz, 37, graduated magna cum laude from Dartmouth College where he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. He attended graduate school at the London School of Economics, served as a Lieutenant in the Marine Corps, and became a newspaper reporter in 1958. He has been a Washington correspondent since 1964 and lives there with his wife, Mary Lynn, and son, Jack Mitchell.

"Hunger and malnutrition will be critical issues for years. By showing us the rocky road already traveled, Nick Kotz prepares us for the way ahead. His book should be read by all who enlist in this most humane struggle."—U.S. Senator Jacob K. Javits, Ranking Republican Member, Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs,

"The book is a gripping, upside-down detective story—a classic who-didn't-done-it to the malnourished poor. It is crammed with clues as to why hunger continues to exist in the United States long after everyone has agreed that not eating may be hazardous to your health. . . . If Mr. Kotz had his way, the solution would be simple and humanitarian. . . . It is unfortunate that he is not making policy instead of so fascinatingly describing its formation."—John R. Kramer, Executive Director, the National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States.

"The publication of Nick Kotz's book is a time for tears and outrage—tears for the suffering of the hungry millions whose helplessness he describes, outrage at the unbelievable fact that America still refuses to end their suffering. . . . But Let Them Eat Promises has a message of hope. . . . America must hear that message."—Charles Evers, Mayor of Fayette, Mississippi, and Civil Rights Leader.

"Nick Kotz has written an incisive and searing indictment of our number-one national disgrace—hunger. Let Them Eat Promises is by far and away the best treatment of this problem that I have seen."—U.S. Senator Walter F. Mondale, Member, Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs.

"Let Them Eat Promises is a story that every student of government should read, because it shows how our national government really operates. Nick Kotz's vivid and authentically detailed story explains how the needs of starving Americans were swept under the rug by the provincial autocrats who run Congress, and their allies, the faceless bureaucrats of government agencies. This revealing exposé shows how personal enmities and political maneuvers, extending from the White House to the courthouse level, can combine to kill even the most urgently needed social legislation."—Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm, New York.

A BOOK FOR TODAY—ON THE PLIGHT OF THE HUNGRY

(By Judith Randal)

This book, which is published here as 2,500 people arrive to attend the White House Conference on Food Nutrition and Health, is not the first about hunger in America. But "Let Them Eat Promises" differs from the others because it exposes the myths and the political realities that stand in the way of change.

The story begins in 1967 when Democratic Senators Robert F. Kennedy of New York and Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania, shocked by what they had seen on a trip to the Mississippi Delta, returned to Washington to report to Congress and the nation. As it quickly became evident that Mississippi was only one of many pockets of hunger and malnutrition in an otherwise affluent America, it was widely assumed that public opinion force the government to act. Nick Kotz has marshalled the record to show why this confidence was misplaced.

Kotz, a Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register and Tribune, is to be commended for an accurate and properly balanced account that is also extraordinarily moving. While it would have been easy merely to record the plight of the hungry, he has examined carefully and as dispassionately as possible the coalition of circumstances that have made a problem with as basically simple a solution so difficult to solve. And while he does not neglect statistics, he never forgets that what he is discussing is people.

Until the great depression, government did not concern itself with the welfare of either farmers or the poor. Then, as crop prices fell and one-third of the nation became destitute, Congress passed legislation which permitted the Department of Agriculture to pay farmers to reduce their productivity and to buy up the accrued surpluses for distribution to those in need.

The system made some sense in the 1930's. But a generation later it permits a large grower to collect vast sums in farm subsidy payments while thousands of his neighbors and millions across the nation go very nearly without. The surplus commodity program was never designed to provide a balanced diet and besides it requires each county to defray the administration costs, so that many have chosen not to participate.

The alternative—a food stamp program—at least has the virtue of giving people a choice at the grocery store. But the poorest of the poor cannot afford the stamps and the purchasing power they provide, by Agriculture's own admission, is inadequate. Thus, despite recent minor improvements here and there, both programs and the school lunch program, as well, work to the advantage of the farmer while perpetuating hunger and malnutrition at taxpayer expense.

When mechanisms as irrational as these take hold, an elaborate series of deceptions is needed to sustain them. Across these pages flash denials from local officials about the existence of hunger, charges of shiftlessness from conservative Senators and Congressmen—particularly from areas where there are feudal extremes of affluence and privation—and the conventional wisdom that ignorance, rather than poverty, is the villain in malnutrition.

"Hell, all people want is coke and potato chips," a food company official tells Kotz, trotting out the industry's traditional excuse for not enriching the products it offers the consumer. Citing government figures on who the hungry are and how they spend whatever food money they have, he shows conclusively how few of these allegations are true. "We are a nation of nutritional illiterates," Kotz quotes one professor as saying. "Yet we expect the poor to exercise some special discipline of nutrition knowledge that the rest of the country lacks."

One of the strengths of "Let Them Eat Promises" is that it places its heroes and villains in the context of their times, conceding the limitations imposed by people and events. Orville Freeman, secretary of Agriculture in the Johnson Administration, for example, bent over backwards to observe the fine print of the law, sometimes seeing in it constraints that did not in fact exist. Certainly no one except perhaps Freeman himself would have accused him of being a crusader in the cause of food reform. Still, Freeman had to answer to Congressional agriculture committees that were and are opposed to more equitable treatment of the poor, and Kotz fairly points out that President Johnson never gave Freeman his support—or indeed made any public pronouncements about hunger at all.

What of the Nixon Administration? The author makes no claim to clairvoyance. But he cites a revealing passage in what he says are the official minutes of a cabinet meeting at the White House on March 17. Asked by the incumbent Agriculture Secretary Clifford B. Hardin how far he could go in speaking for the administration and its posture on hunger, Nixon is reported to have said:

"You can say that this administration will have the first far-reaching attack on the problem of hunger in history. Use all of the rhetoric, so long as it doesn't cost any money . . ."

If this book does nothing else, it gives the lie to the notion that, once given the facts about injustice, this country moves quickly towards reform."

LET THEM EAT PROMISES: THE POLITICS OF HUNGER IN AMERICA

(Reviewed by Leroy F. Aarons, a reporter on the national staff of the Washington Post)

Nick Kotz has written a passionate book about an American scandal, as important in its dissection of government's inertia and indifference as was Ralph Nader's exposure of the automobile industry in "Unsafe at Any Speed."

Kotz's thesis is that at least 15 million Americans continue to go hungry in the United States because it is profitable for agriculture interests. These interests have been protected by powerful congressmen who have succeeded in intimidating the Agriculture Department, which, in turn, has failed to press reluctant administrations to advocate needed reforms.

The reason hunger has been discovered and dignified as an issue, Kotz makes clear in this fascinating book, is that a small group of concerned congressmen and citizens used publicity, research and politics to force it into the open. Thus the book's subtitle, "The Politics of Hunger in America."

Published on the eve of the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health, opening today, this volume, which will be circulated at the conference, should give the 3,000 delegates some disturbing things to ponder.

They will learn, for example:

That government food surplus programs in the South have been used to benefit farmers—by unloading surplus foodstock—rather than to help the poor.

That only one-sixth of the poor receive any government food benefits.

That the food stamp program forced a million poor out of the food program because, among other things, stamps were too expensive.

That the FBI was sent by the all-powerful House Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture to intimidate people giving evidence to hunger investigators.

That on at least 12 occasions Lyndon Johnson rebuffed efforts by his subordinates to push through a food reform package.

That as recently as last March Richard Nixon told his Secretary of Agriculture: "You can say that the administration will have the first far-reaching attack on hunger in history. Use all the rhetoric so long as it doesn't cost any money."

Some of these revelations emerged during the last three years as the hunger issue began to impose itself on a largely indifferent nation. Others, including many fascinating behind-the-scene insights, were dug out by Kotz, who is Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register.

Two chapters in particular deserve special mention. In one, Kotz, a Pulitzer Prize winner, traces the scandalous concentration of power in one man—Rep. Jamie Whitten, chairman of the agriculture appropriation subcommittee, whose very name causes brave men in the Agriculture Department (which administers food programs) to cringe.

The other chapter offers the best and most compassionate account I have read of the ill-fated 1968 Poor Peoples' Campaign, particularly the face-down scene between Ralph Abernathy, who knew the campaign had failed, and Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman, who knew he was powerless to promise the kind of food aid being sought.

UNO—FREEDOM BID DENIED

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, several years ago, U.S. citizens demonstrating at the United Nations Organization in New York learned the hard way that the UNO does not respect the right of peaceful assembly or free speech. The demonstrators were summarily placed under arrest and ejected.

This year, the unelected functionaries of UNO again displayed their callous attitude and lack of restraint. A group of Russians smuggled a petition to the UNO charging the Soviet Government with "repression of basic civil rights."

The UNO reacted speedily and in typical fashion. A directive was issued forbidding any UNO information center the world over to accept petitions from any group or individuals.

The hapless Russian petitioners did not gain a hearing nor any relief on their complaints. They were promptly conveyed to jails and mental institutions in Soviet Russia.

Those misguided liberals and moderates who have faith in the UNO and who idealize international government should be disenchanted by this latest example of UNO hypocrisy. Every day the UNO exposes its indifference to human rights and such basic precepts of freedom as petition by aggrieved individuals and groups.

An editorial follows along with a letter and petition to the UNO from the Women's Association for the Defense of Four Freedoms for Ukraine, Inc.:

[From the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader, Nov. 27, 1969]

ANOTHER U.N. FARCE

Those unrealistic citizens who worship the United Nations should perhaps consider the latest example of the loss of its integrity. It was brought out in the open the other day by a Dutch delegate to the U.N., Leopold Quarles van Ufford.

The Dutch diplomat complained indignantly about the recent executive order that had gone out from the New York headquarters to the various U.N. Information Centers located around the globe.

This order now forbids the centers to accept petitions by groups or individuals, a custom that had been rigorously followed for years.

The force behind this order, as could be expected, was the Communist delegates to the U.N. It seems that last June a group of 43 exceptionally brave Russians appeared at the U.N. Moscow office and asked that a petition charging the Soviet government with "repression of basic civil rights" be accepted for transmission to U.N. headquarters in New York.

The Russian in charge of the office kicked the delegation out—and later simply claimed that no approach had ever been made by anybody in the matter.

Later the Russian petitioners, unmindful of jails and mental asylums awaiting them, succeeded in smuggling out the complaint and having it duly transmitted to the U.N. in New York.

After the whole affair, Soviet Ambassador, Jacob Malik visited Secretary General Thant and put on the pressure.

So from now on the various U.N. offices around the world can no longer accept petitions by groups or individuals!

How any rational individual can have the least confidence in the U.N., which has not been able to keep peace in the world, and now will not even accept petitions by groups or from aggrieved individuals or groups, is hard to understand.

WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION FOR THE DEFENSE OF FOUR FREEDOMS FOR UKRAINE, INC.,

New York, N.Y., November 1, 1969.

Subject: Human Rights for the Ukraine.

Hon. CHARLES W. YOST,
U.S. Aambassador,
United Nations General Assembly,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: In keeping wtih the sentiments of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 20th anniversary of which we observed last year, and as we approach the year 1970, proclaimed by UNESCO as "Lenin Year" to commemorate the centenary of the birth of Vladimir Ilyich Ulanov Lenin, it is only fitting that certain historical facts be brought to the attention of the world body of the United Nations, in order to realistically evaluate what UNESCO calls "Lenin's humanistic ideas and activities on development and realization of economic, social and cultural rights."

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, one of the great documents of our century, which declares the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, combatting racial discrimination, social and economic injustice, national and cultural oppression, and the practice of genocide, was signed by the representatives of the Government of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialistic Republic on December 10, 1948, as an equal charter member of the United Nations Organization. However, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic is not, as many would like to have us think, a free and independent state of Ukrainian people.

After a short period of independence, Ukraine was invaded by Russian armed forces in 1919, under the leadership of dictator Lenin, and after three years of heavy fighting, was incorporated—by force—into the U.S.S.R. as "The Sovereign National Ukraine Republic". It is a captive nation, under the Russian imperial-colonial system!

Human rights are denied the Ukrainians by Kosygin-Brezhnev, just as they were by Lenin-Stalin-Khrushchev. Terror, arrests, deportations, forced atheism, police control of family and public life. are the order of the day.

About one-half million Ukrainian men, women, underage young people, and children, have been, and are being arrested (according to recent documents) and are being held in Lvov, Kiev, Odessa, Lutsk, Rovno, Ivano-Frankovsk, Zhytomyr, Ternopol, Kharkov prisons located in the Ukraine. There are also nearly one million innocents in chain concentration camps and hard labor camps such as Potma (36 camps), Kingir-Karaganda (16 camps), Norilsk-Dudinka, Ulan-Bator, Pechora, Vorkuta, Kulyma and Vladimir.

Over two million Ukrainian young people, as well as skilled workers are being deported to the "Soviet Virgin Land"—the wasteland of Kazakhstan—for permanent living and work. Many are being deported to the State of Mordovia, to work on Russian atomic fields. Hundreds of thousands of these have died and are dying from lack of proper living conditions, food, medical care, and from the hard labor and the climatic conditions.

Among the multitude of Ukrainian prisoners there is a high percentage of women who are serving, what in the free world would be, unbelievably high sentences, up to 25 years. Their "crime" is that they want to be Ukrainians! They want to read, speak and write in their own Ukrainian language, to preserve and enrich their native culture. They want to be—and have the rights of—Ukrainian citizens. Their punishment is unjust, illegal, and inhuman.

We respectfully call your attention to the recent destruction of irreplaceable Ukrainian architectural monuments, historical documents of Ukrainian statehood, and ancient cultural artifacts, perpetrated by deliberate Russian arson, as well as the planned, forced program of total Russification of Ukrainian daily life. These acts, together with the already mentioned terror, arrests, deportations, etc., are crimes against humanity that cry out to heaven for retribution.

We Ukrainians, the first victims of Red Army aggression under Lenin's leadership, the first victims on whom Lenin demonstrated his "humanistic ideas" such as the "development and realization of a new state economy" (the Kolhkoz System under which millions of Ukrainians died from famine in 1923–24), and "social and cultural rights" (under the terror of the CHEKA and GPU secret police), along with his closing of churches and educational institutions; the arrests, secret killings, and deportations by hundreds of thousands—this is the Lenin Era that the Ukrainians know and will never forget.

It is fitting as we approach the centenary of Lenin's birth, to recall his statement made in 1918 regarding domestic policy, namely: "As long as we do not apply terror with execution on the spot, we shall get nowhere." This quotation speaks eloquently for itself, and for Lenin's "humanistic ideas"!

It is a historical fact that Vladimir Ulanov Lenin, together with Josef Djugashvili Stalin, were the architects of the Soviet Union, and the Communist Party. Without them there would be no Russian Colonial Empire, no U.S.S.R. and Communist Party, to operate as an international instigator of intrigue and conspiracy, troubling the United States' security and the peace of the whole world.

Echoing the sentiments of 1968's observance of the 20th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and approaching the dubious occasion of the centennial commemoration of the birth of Vladimir Lenin—(the individual responsible for invading the Ukrainian State, forcing its incorporation into the U.S.S.R. and thereby enslaving the Ukrainian people)—We, the members of the Women's Association for the Defense of Four Freedoms for Ukraine, Incorporated, on behalf of the millions of voiceless women in the homeland of Ukraine, on behalf of the Ukrainian prisoners, and burned Ukrainian martyrs, appeal to you, Mr. Ambassador, to place on the Agenda of the United Nations General Assembly, the subject of the Russian invasion of the Ukrainian Nation, and the human rights of its people.

We suggest that a Special United Nations Committee be established for the following purpose:

1. To investigate the violation of the United Nations Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights as they pertain to Ukraine and the other Republics of the U.S.S.R.

2. To prevail upon the Soviet Government to ultimately release all political prisoners who are languishing for long years in Russian prisons and concentration camps without benefit of amnesty, and return them to their homes in the Ukraine with benefit of full citizenship.

3. To impose on the Russian Government the removal of armed and police forces from the Ukraine and the territories of other captive nations, so that truly free elections under the supervision of the United Nations can take place.

Only by establishing a sovereign Ukrainian State, free from Russian domination, can all Ukrainian citizens achieve freedom and be guaranteed their human rights. And only when all the Captive Nations succeed in achieving the restoration of their independence will Russian power diminish and the Communist threat to world peace and security be minimized.

We look forward to your kind consideration of the above matter.

Respectfully yours,

Mrs. Ulana Celewych,
Chairman.

Mrs. Maria Nesterchuk,
Secretary.

HOUSE PASSES BILLS TO AID POW FAMILIES

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am most gratified that the House of Representatives has passed unanimously my two bills, H.R. 9485 and H.R. 9486, to aid the families of prisoners of war.

At the moment there are hundreds of known American prisoners of war in Southeast Asia and almost a thousand other Americans listed as missing in action. Although these figures seem small compared with the staggering casualties of the war, we must not overlook the hardships these Americans are forced to endure in Communist captivity. Also, we must not forget the mental anguish suffered by their wives and families as they anxiously await the safe return of loved ones.

Last year I had the opportunity to meet with a group of POW wives who reside in my district of San Diego, Calif. Although our Government is doing everything possible within the bounds of existing laws to assist these families, certain inadequacies in these laws do exist and should be corrected. The purpose of the two bills, H.R. 9485 and H.R. 9486, before us is to correct the inadequacies of these laws.

In 1967 Congress approved a measure allowing prisoners of war and servicemen in a missing status to participate in the uniformed services savings deposit program which provides 10 percent interest on savings up to $10,000. What Congress failed to recognize, however, in approving this bill is that the American prisoner in Southeast Asia has no control whatsoever over his return from overseas. Thus, an American who is held captive for several years would accumulate deposits considerably more than $10,000—even after the necessary allotments for his dependents were deducted from his pay. H.R. 9485 would remove the $10,000 limit on deposits for any member of the uniformed services who is a prisoner of war, missing in action or in a detained status during the Vietnam conflict.

With regard to H.R. 9486, this bill merely gives the $30 family separation allowance to all prisoners of war with dependents. A good number of these men are enlisted servicemen with relatively low pay, and it is their dependents who suffer the most financially during their absence. Part of the economic hardship results from the fact that there is no man around the house to perform routine maintenance chores. The armed services have recognized this problem to some extent by providing a $30-a-month family separation allowance to servicemen, E–4 and above, whenever the serviceman's duties require him to be away from the home for more than 30 days—provided that his family does not live in military housing.

Under this bill, all prisoners of war and servicemen in a missing status—regardless of whether their families live in military housing or whether they are E–4 or above—would be entitled to the family separation allowance.

Now that the House has passed these bills, I hope the Senate may consider them and approve them before the end of this session.

HOW THE PENTAGON JUGGLES PROCUREMENTS

HON. OTIS G. PIKE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, there is an article in the current edition of the Armed Forces Journal which should be must reading for anyone who does not quite understand the mechanics of how, despite the clearly expressed will of Congress and the clear language of specific laws, major procurements running into billions of dollars can be juggled around for political purposes or at least for reasons having nothing to do with national defense. The article points out the clear language of the law itself as to procurements and clearly points out precisely how the military violates it.

The well publicized cost overruns on the Cheyenne helicopter, the F–111 aircraft, and the C–5A may, or may not, be attributable to the procurement practices which were followed in awarding those contracts. It is clear, however, that in each of those cases the law was ignored. In at least two huge procurements now pending, the F–15 and the AMSA, both of them involving billions of dollars, the law is not being complied with. What the result will be only time will tell but if the past is truly prolog, what time will tell us will be very sad news indeed. The full text of the article follows:

SOURCE SELECTION: WHAT THE LAW REQUIRES

Section 2271, Act of 10 Aug. 1956 Title 10, Armed Forces Act.

Design competitions; Advertisement; Selection of Winner—

[a] . . . To encourage the development of aviation and to improve the efficiency of aeronautical war material for the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps, the Secretary of each military department, before procuring new designs of aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, shall invite the submission of new designs thereof in competition, as follows:

[c] . . . The department concerned shall furnish to each applicant identical detailed information as to the conditions of the competition and the features and characteristics to be developed in the design, listing specifically the measures of merit expressed in percentages, that are to be applied in determining the merits of the design. These measures of merit shall apply throughout the competition.

[d] . . . The announcement of the results of the competition shall state the percentages awarded to each feature or characteristic of each of the designs submitted and the price named for design and each feature thereof, if separable.

The law cited above is the most explicit and unambiguous of several on the books that express the will of Congress on ground rules under which aircraft design competitions will be held. But it isn't being followed.

Contractors, bidding on the Army's AAFSS, the TFX, and the C–5A, for instance, were not given the detailed criteria (weightings, or "measures of merit expressed in percentages") by which their proposals would be judged. Nor were the same weightings used throughout the source selection process on these programs.

And in each of these three programs, findings of the principal evaluation groups on the relative merits of various contractor proposals later were overturned. In the case of the C–5A, for example, a 23 September 1965 Air Force memorandum shows that an evaluation board headed by two Air Force major generals and two brigadier generals unanimously recommended that the Boeing entry be picked.

That recommendation was overturned by a three-fourths majority when the Air Force Chief of Staff, the Commander of AFSC, the Commander of Military Airlift Command, and the Air Council cast their votes.

Nor were the weightings spelled out above given to firms competing for the Navy's F–14 and S–3A. The three companies bidding for the F–15 don't have them. And they weren't provided with the recent AMSA (B–1) Request for Proposals.

As Senator John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) told us when The Journal discussed source selection procedures with him—he cited the law above during the TFX contract investigation—"So far as I know they haven't complied with the law. Apparently, it's just being ignored. I think the law should be applied."

In fairness to DoD and the Services, we have to point out that they aren't necessarily "ignoring" the law. The problem is that there are different laws on the books, and some are contradictory. In a sense, how DoD competes is a question of "dealer's choice."

DoD's General Counsel's office told us that the 1956 provision cited above is "permissive, not mandatory"—a stand we find somewhat difficult to understand given the repeated use of the word "shall." DoD points out that the 1956 law is simply a codification of earlier statutes, that the specific provisions we cite here were laid down as part of the Air Corps Act of 1926, and that "it hasn't been used since World War II." (We still haven't found out why Congress bothered in 1956 to "codify" the 1926 requirement if they didn't intend for the original law to be followed.)

DoD's top expert on procurement policy, John Malloy, told us he was not "personally familiar" with the 1956 provision, and had never heard it discussed as an issue.

The legal basis which DoD and the Services use not to give industry the specific weightings by which new aircraft designs will be judged rests in Section 2304(a)(11) of Chapter 137, Title 10, U.S. Code, laid down in 1947 as part of the Armed Services Procurement Act. This 1947 section spells out 17 exceptions—all quite broad and general, compared with the very specific language shown above—by which DoD need not formally advertise for bids (thereby circumventing or negating the rest of the language we've quoted from Section 2271, Chapter 135—the chapter's title: "Encouragement of Aviation"—of the U.S. Code).

There's a real question, however, of how applicable the exception which DoD cites is to design competitions like the F–14, the F–15, and S–3A—systems DoD clearly intended or intends to put into production. The exception (to the requirement for formally advertised bids) reads: "If the purchase or contract is for property or services that he [the head of a Military Department] determines to be for experimental, developmental, or research work, or for the making or furnishing of property for experimental, test, development, or research."

As one senior Air Force officer told us, giving prospective contractors the detailed weightings by which their designs would be evaluated would make it difficult later to apply any "corporate judgment" in picking the winning contractor. He has a good point. But following the 1956 law would give industry a better idea of what design attributes the Services really felt to be important, and more energy could be spent on those. More important, perhaps, the 1956 law would make it awfully hard to award contracts on other than straight merit—a goal well worth shooting for as the Pentagon and Congress try to restore public faith in the integrity of DoD's procurement process.

HAZARDS CAUSED BY BLOWING SAND

HON. JOHN V. TUNNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. Speaker, at a time when citizen participation in politics seems to range between the extremes of apathy and violent confrontation it is very gratifying to deal with people who are willing to work through legitimate channels to achieve their goals. Yet due to lack of action their patience is being strained. It is a pleasure for me to represent a group of individuals who share common problems and who are united by a desire to work together to find solutions to these problems. I am referring to the people of Coachella Valley, Calif. The problems of an area like the Coachella Valley are so complex and so numerous that they cannot be ignored. As an agricultural region, as a tourist center, as a growing metropolitan area, the Coachella Valley, like so many growing communities in California demands continued efforts to make it a better place for living, working and visiting.

I would like to address myself to one particular problem which I think indicates the type of concerted effort needed to improve conditions in this area. I am referring to the attempts being made to alleviate the hazards caused by blowing sand.

The combination of high winds and loosely packed soils has presented a problem in this region for a long time. But a report prepared by the U.S. Soil Conservation Service in 1967 indicates that blowing sand has become increasingly serious in recent years. This has been due to new residential and highway developments in the area. The sand has become more loosely packed, the wind has continued to blow and more people are endangered by it. In 1963, committees from the California State Senate and State Assembly conducted public hearings on the problem in Palm Springs. The effect was to call public attention to the costs and hazards involved to transportation facilities and vehicles, but no positive action to alleviate the conditions has resulted. Thus a legitimate citizen concern—a deteriorating environment—is not being alleviated.

A number of local citizens have devoted much time and effort toward achieving a solution to the problem. I have closely followed the progress of these efforts for the past 3 years, providing whatever assistance I could. Today I would like to to introduce legislation to increase Federal participation in the quest for a lasting solution to this problem and with problems of financing such a solution.

I have studied many Federal programs and have met with representatives of various agencies in order to discover some avenue of assistance open to the people of Coachella Valley and as a result to other communities faced with similar problems.

First of all, the Bureau of Public Roads and the State highway department are empowered to take measures to improve safety conditions along interstate highways. The possibility of undertaking such a project along Interstate 10 is now under consideration, and it is possible that windbreaks and other safety devices can be installed to provide some relief for vehicles moving along this important highway.

After talking with officials at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, it was suggested that there is a possibility of obtaining a grant for open-space acquisition and development. This grant could cover the acquisition and development of land for parks, recreation, or conservation. Representatives from the Soil Conservation Service have assured me that their continued technical cooperation will be available in planning stabilization programs.

It has, however, beome apparent to me that there is no single Federal program designed to alleviate the type of wind-erosion problem faced by Coachella and perhaps other communities.

Therefore, I am introducing a bill to attempt to coordinate Federal action in this area. The legislation authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture—acting through the Soil Conservation Service—in cooperation with the Secretary of the Interior—acting through the Bureau of Reclamation—and the Secretary of the Army—acting through the Corps of Engineers—to make a full and complete investigation and study of the wind erosion problems of the Coachella Valley.

Not later than 6 months after the date of enactment the Secretary of Agriculture would be required to report the results of the study to Congress together with his recommendations for those specific Federal actions or contributions which he determines to be necessary to alleviate, abate, and control such wind erosion problems including any necessary legislative recommendations.

It is important to revitalize our rural areas in view of the fact that over 600,000 people per year are leaving for urban metropolitan areas. Much of this migration is caused by the deterioration of opportunities in rural America. There must be increased public and private investment. People must be given encouragement and incentive to remain in rural areas. Industry must be encouraged to locate in rural areas.

Environmental deterioration such as blowing sand must be alleviated and a coordinated program of Federal assistance is required to accomplish this goal.

THE REVOLUTION'S SOUTHERNMOST BATTLEFIELDS

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, within the city limits of present day Jacksonville lies the site of the most southerly combat of the American Revolution, our War of Independence. And much of the terrain involved—forests, hammocks, swamps, marshes, creeks, and wildlife—is little different today from what it was on May 17, 1777, when the battle of Thomas Creek, the most southerly battle of the war, took place.

There should be created in these lands the Revolution's Southernmost Battlefields Park, not only for the unique historic aspects but also for wildlife preservation purposes and recreational values. The approaching 200th anniversary of our Nation makes it important that a project to accomplish this be launched promptly. The year 1976 will obviously be not only a time of maximum interest in our War of Independence but also an ideal time to have such a facility in the best condition possible for tourist enjoyment.

The 14th and 15th British Colonies in the Revolutionary War years were East Florida and West Florida. They were havens for Loyalists who fled from the other 13 Colonies. Some Florida inhabitants favored independence; but there were probably more Loyalists in Georgia than there were Florida inhabitants seeking independence from England. In any event, the three chief efforts to gain independence for Florida were launched from Georgia; and a major reason why they failed was that it was impossible to surprise the British troops in Florida because of information fed to the British by Loyalist sympathizers who lived in Georgia. Another major difficulty was that the Georgia Governors wrangled with their military leaders as to whether the Governor or the military should take command of the troops. Moreover, the Georgians never arrived in Florida with sufficient numbers to assure victory.

In 1776 the British were for a time pushed back from the Georgia border as far south as the south bank of the St. Johns River. Gen. Augustine Prevost, in charge of the British troops at St. Augustine, reported on September 9, 1776, to his superior officers as follows:

> The party which was on the St. Mary has been obliged by a strong one of the rebels to abandon that river and to retire on the south side of St. John's river. They took lately a serjeant and 5 men of the party reinforced to 100 men.

Gen. Charles Lee of the American troops in Georgia was never able to put into Florida the bulk of the forces he planned to use in an invasion that year. It remained for other leadership to make a better effort the next year.

In 1777 Georgia's President and Commander in Chief, Button Gwinnett, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, optimistically mounted a new campaign to capture St. Augustine and liberate East Florida: he decided to lead the forces himself, instead of allowing Gen. Lachlan McIntosh, the ranking military officer of the State to lead it. A dispute arose, partly based upon this affront to the latter, but more because of Gwinnett's accusations of disloyalty publicly made against the brother of the general. In any event, neither went to Florida in the expedition which was planned to rendezvous two separate elements at Sawpit Bluff, Fla., on May 13, 1777. This location is within the present city limits of Jacksonville and near the mouth of Nassau River.

Lt. Col. Samuel Elbert from Sunbury, Ga., embarked with one element, 400 Continental troops, to make the trip by water; and the other element of troops, 109 men of the Georgia militia led by Col. John Baker, marched overland to Sawpit Bluff. Despite combat with Indians who were loyal to the British and the difficult crossing of swollen streams, Baker reached Sawpit Bluff on the appointed day. He immediately sent out a reconnaissance troop, which discovered from an inhabitant that the British were well informed of the expedition and were preparing a strong resistance.

On May 17, having heard nothing from Elbert, Baker decided to place his own forces in a better spot for observation and possible retreat, knowing that a substantial British force was planned against him. While moving inland searching for easily fordable narrow headwaters of the creeks in the area, the Americans were surprised by Florida ranger, or scout, forces under Col. Daniel McGirth, these forces being inhabitants of Florida assisting the British regulars. A third element of the British forces was the Indian contingent. All three loyalist elements were present in the battle which took place near Thomas Creek, somewhat south of where it empties into Nassau River—on today's map this is west of and adjacent to Interstate Highway 95, where is crosses Nassau River. The main body of the enemy was led by Maj. Jean Marc Prevost—brother of the general—who formed his attack with three columns of 100 men each.

Surprised and greatly outnumbered by the British regulars and their allies, almost half of the men under Baker soon abandoned the fray. Subjected to heavy enemy fire, Colonel Baker was compelled to retreat with those who fought by his side. There were at the time of the disengagement only about 50 remaining with him. The Americans lost eight killed—including five massacred by the Indians immediately after their surrender—nine wounded, and 31 captured.

In the memoirs of Maj. Patrick Murray, who was present in this battle of Thomas Creek, we find the following comment:

> In April or May Major Baker's Georgian Dragoons made an incursion into the Province, drove our Rangers and Indians as far as St. Johns's River and had skirmish with the Black Creek Factor, in which 2 Indians were killed. Major Marc Prevost of the 2nd. Battalion, with Captain Graham of the 16th. Light Infantry, Captain Wulf of the Grenadiers 4th Battalion, and a detachment of the 2nd. and 3rd. Battalions—the whole did not exceed 100 men—crossed at the Cowford and advanced 11 miles to Rolfe's Saw-Mill, when in the night a Ranger brought the Major one of their horses' ears as a proof of where they were. At day-break they were found at Thomas's Swamp when the Indians began to skirmish with them as they were about to mount, and kept a bushy run of water between them, giving way until at Broadday the Major with his 3 Columns appeared advancing with fixed Bayonets, on which they fled to their horses and attempted to escape through a miry passage in the discharge of Thomas's Swamp but were fired upon by the Indians with Rifles, and attacked by the troops. About 30 of them escaped with Major Baker, about 40 with Captain Few surrendered; the remainder plunged into the Swamp leaving the Horses; and what became of them is not known. The prisoners were all put to death except 16, among whom was Captain Few, saved with difficulty by Major Prevost and the Troops from the fury of the Black Creek Factor.

Colonel Elbert did not arrive in Florida until May 19 and landed on the north end of Amelia Island on May 20. Elbert sent Captain More, Lt. Robert Ward and a detachment of Continentals to reconnoiter and secure the island by a march to its southern tip; but these Americans were driven back by a British detachment on the island; and Lieutenant Ward was slain in the encounter. Some of Baker's men who had escaped from the Thomas Creek battle joined Elbert, who decided that the force remaining under him was insufficient to subdue East Florida. So he retired to Georgia, as Baker had already done. Colonel Elbert's order book contains the following comments under date of May 25, 1777:

> On the morning of the 19th we were Joined by thirteen of Colo. Baker's then, soon after by two more, & two Days after by three others, who all agree in the account of that unfortunate Gentlemen being attacked on Saturday, the 17th, by a Superior Number of Regulars who were assisted by the Florida Scout and a Number of Indians.

Somehow the British at St. Augustine had been well informed of the size of each of the approaching elements; and precautions had been taken by the British in sending troops to Amelia Island and a detachment of artillery to defend the battery at St. Johns Bluff. Also an armed schooner and sloop had been sent to defend the inland passage between Amelia Island and the mainland. Elbert concluded that, in view of the inability to preserve secrecy, any movement against Florida in the future should be more adequately manned. This is the thrust of what he wrote General McIntosh on May 26, 1777, in a letter which contained the following comments:

I am Just now favored by a Letter from Colo. Screven, wrote at your Desire: I lament the Behavior of Colonel Baker's Men, but it will always be the case where Subordination is wanting; this little Success will make the Enemy very Impudent, particularly the Indians; I think from every Information we can get that the Enemy are at present on their Guard, that little can be done, unless by a formidable Invasion, which I Judge to be rather too much for Georgia to undertake till her Forces are put on a more respectable footing, and therefore would recommend confining our Operations intirely to the defencive till a more favorable opportunity; we have too many Secret Enemies amongst us who Keep up a regular correspondence with our Florida Neighbors, and until they are put a Stop to it will be impossible for us to enter Florida without their having timely notice of our approach.

In a protesting letter written from Cumberland Island, Ga., on May 31, 1777, by Colonel Elbert to Major Prevost the following was said:

That Humanity with which you mention our people taken by you have been Treated, is what Americans can never depart from, but Sir, it hurts me, as I am sure it must you, to be informed that some of the unfortunate men of Colo. Baker's Detachment who fell in your hands, were cruelly Butchered by the Savages, in cool Blood, and in the presence of some of your people; if Savages can't be restrained, why are they Employed?

On May 16, 1777, the feud between Button Gwinnett and Gen. Lachlan McIntosh came to a tragic conclusion as the two men met in a duel at Savannah on that day. Gwinnett died on May 19 from the wound received in the duel, a duel precipitated by a challenge by Gwinnett when the general called him a scoundrel.

On July 14 General McIntosh summarized his feelings about the 1777 Florida expedition as follows in a letter to George Walton:

Our late Don quixot Expedition to Augustine proved abortive as I expected. Our late president & council conferred the command of it on Colonel Elberte which I allowed for peace sake. He went by water to St Marys with three gallys & about 400 men in Craft of various kinds and Baker with his Horse by land & returned again, without being able to affect any one thing after an amazing expence.

After being tried and acquitted on a murder charge for Gwinnett's death, General McIntosh, at the suggestion of friends, consented to leave Georgia for the time being and take command in the western districts of Pennsylvania and Virginia. It was almost 2 years later before he returned to Georgia with new military assignments in his native State of Georgia.

In the meantime in 1778 a new Georgia Governor, John Houston, and a new military commander, Gen. Robert Howe, heard rumors of an impending major expedition planned against Georgia from Florida. To them the time seemed ripe for a new patriot expedition against Florida, this time to be of sufficient size to achieve the conquest of East Florida. The estimates of the number of patriot troops that could be placed in such an expedition against Florida were between 2,000 and 3,000. The estimate of the enemy's regulars in Florida was 760 with no firm estimate on the numbers available in the Rangers and Indian allies.

On June 22, 1778, Gen. William Moultrie advised General Howe that it had been learned that the enemy in the number of 1,200 had marched out of St. Augustine to oppose the advance of the Americans. The British troops moved under Gen. Augustine Prevost to headquarters at Cowford—in what is today central Jacksonville—utilizing chiefly the more defensible southern bank of the river, as the Spanish had done previously at their St. Nicholas southside location.

Maj. Patrick Murray recorded in his memoirs that at that time "Gen. Robert Howe with about 3,000 men, of whom 1,200 were high up on the St. Marys" were advancing. He recorded that Col. Thomas Brown of the Rangers pushed on to the St. Marys from the St. Johns "with the Indians and Rangers and took post at Captain Taylor's house where he was surrounded" by the Americans who were "high up on the St. Marys; but he contrived to escape southward into Cabbage Swamp." Murray then recorded that Major Prevost was sent northward from his brother's headquarters at Cowford "with the Grenadiers of the 2d Battalion, the Light Companies of the 16th and 4th Battalion, and the South Carolina Royalists" and constructed a crude fortification at Alligator Bridge where the St. Augustine and Cowford stretches of the King's Road to Savannah crossed the narrow portions of Alligator Creek. This is believed to be near the central portion of today's Callahan, Fla., and was only about 2 miles north and 10 miles west of where the 1777 battle of Thomas Creek occurred. This is the way in which Murray described what ensued:

He took post at Alligator bridge 22 miles from the Cowford with about 450 men. The enemy took a position at Niel Rain's 17 miles from Alligator Bridge.

Major Prevost sent forward Major Graham of the 16th with 200 men with some of McGirth's rangers towards the cabbage swamp to relieve Colonel Brown. The Rangers scouted to the right and fell in with a Column of the enemy who fired upon their advanced men and then changed the direction of their route.

Major Graham continued his march until joined by Colonel Brown, when the whole encamped. The morning after Major Graham's advance there came into Major Prevost an inhabitant who had escaped from Nassau Bluff 17 miles to our right, and fearing to cross Mill's Swamp in the night, he informed the Major that Colonel White was there with 90 of the 4th. Georgia, and Captain Nash with 14 Dragoons. Major Prevost dispatched Captain Murray with 20 of his company, 20 of the 16th. Light infantry, and Captain York of the South Carolina Dragoons. As soon as the detachment had got through Mills and Thomas's swamp, Captain Murray sent forward Captain York to occupy the 2 ends of a Pond which formed a half moon projecting outwards; the 2 Points closing in upon the Bluff; but Captain York thought it prudent to keep his men together and took post at the farther end, upon which Colonel White judged it full time for him to get over Nassau; and Captain Murray with the mounted men pursued, but the last boat load of his rear went down the stream leaving a doctor and his 2 daughters who had joined the enemy, but as the 2 families of Royalists who had been prisoners at the bluff declared Colonel White had used them well, Captain Murray suffered the doctor and his family to depart with their baggage, not thinking it right to allow them to remain in the province.

Captain Murray, Lieutenant Calderwood 16th., Campbell 4th. Battalion and Captain York, South Carolina Royalists, made a hearty dinner at the Bluff upon roast Beef and fine Biscuit. Colonel White, having provided an ample provision for his whole detachment, our men fared sumptuously and towards evening we fell back to a swamp 2 miles in our rear for the night (this was on the 28th. June 1778 the day of the Battle of Monmouth).

At day break a large decked boat full of men appeared under sail in the Nassau passage, and made a signal for the Bluff, which not being answered, she put about and hastened down the rivers with oars. Captain Murray had notice of this by one of the Loyalists whom he had left there as a decoy and joined Major Prevost at 10 o'clock. At about mid-day when the men from the detachment were cleaning their arms and others washing in the creek in front of the camp the Grenadiers constructing a breastwork, — Major Graham's detachment had joined on the evening before, — while Colonel Brown encamped at a swamp in front about 10 miles to collect his men.

At mid-day a mounted Sergeant came to Major Prevost's tent to announce the Colonel being at hand with his Corps. The Major, by the Sergeant, desired Colonel Brown to come to his tent; presently we heard Whitfield the Drummer beating the Grenadiers' March, and the rangers filing over a bridge where he had a sub-guard. Soon after entering when the Ranger drum beat to arms, and the Rangers many of whom had lost their arms in the cabbage swamp, were seen flying into that in front of our camp, Captain Muller of the Grenadiers and his men running to the Camp for their arms, musket balls whistling over our tents while the enemy with sabres and rifles were shouting, "down with the Tories." Captains Smith and Johnston with a few of their Rangers bravely defended the Aligator bridge, till the regulars having got under arms and relieved them.

According to Capt. Hugh McCall's "History of Georgia," which was written in 1784 and published in 1816—and republished in 1902 at Atlanta by A. B. Caldwell—Col. Elijah Clarke was sent forward with 300 of the Georgia militia to pursue the enemy to Alligator Creek; and—at page 359 of the 1902 edition—the events are recorded by McCall as follows concerning the battle of Alligator Bridge:

An entrenchment had been opened round the camp, fronted by logs and brush, as a substitute for abatis: at first view the camp was considered assailable, and a detachment of mounted militia, under the command of colonel Elijah Clarke, was ordered to penetrate the camp on the weakest flank, and if practicable to throw the enemy into confusion, of which the main body was to take advantage by advancing quickly on the front. Clarke's detachment acted with great spirit, but their utmost efforts to pass the works were vain and unsuccessful; the horses were entangled among the logs and brush, and with much difficulty got through: when they reached the ditch, it was found too wide to leap over. Here they were met by the fire and huzzas of the enemy, to which the horses had not been accustomed; and they could not be forced to meet it. Colonel Clarke was shot through the thigh, and with difficulty escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. A retreat was ordered, and the American loss was three killed and nine wounded. As the execution of this part of the plan of attack had failed, the main body did not attempt to perform that part of the operations, which had been assigned to it. Finding that nothing could be achieved, and that re-inforcements to the enemy were at hand, the Americans retreated and re-joined the army.

Murray reported the loyalist losses in this June 30, 1778 battle as follows:

One man of the 2nd Battalion was killed and one of the 4th wounded; Captains Johnston and Smith with five of Brown's rangers wounded.

He also chronicled:

The horses being at pasture could not be collected during the short action, and Ensign Gigilighter of the South Carolina Royalists who wore yellow breeches were taken at the advanced guard and carried off. Mayor Prevost did not allow any pursuit.

Speaking of the patriot losses, he reported that two were left upon the field, neither named; but one was designated as an ensign and the other as "a black man."

The British retreated southward as Colonel Clarke and his troops rejoined the main forces of the Georgia militia.

As General Howe entered Florida his forces met with no resistance at the St. Marys River and at Fort Tonyn on the northern tip of Amelia Island; and from this island location he wrote to General Moultrie on July 5, telling of the difficulties he was having in assembling his troops and in the conflicts in authority being experienced, among which difficulties was one reminiscent of the 1777 expedition, the unwillingness of the new Governor of Georgia to relinquish authority over State troops to the military head of the expedition. The letter read as follows:

FORT TONYN.
5th July, 1778.

DEAR GENERAL.—I have been waiting for the galley first, and after her arrival, a tedious while for the Militia of this State and for the long expected coming of Col. Williamson and our country-men with him. In short, if I am ever again to depend upon operations I have no right to guide, and men I have no right to command, I shall deem it then as now I do, one of the most unfortunate accidents of my life. Had we been able to move on at once, and those I expected would have been foremost had only been as ready as we were, a blow might have been given our enemies which would have put it out of their power to have disturbed us, at least not hastily, and perhaps have been attended with consequences more important than the most sanguine could have expected. But delayed beyond all possible supposition, and embarrassed, disappointed, perplexed, and distressed beyond expression, the utmost we can now achieve will be but a poor compensation for the trouble and fatigue we have undergone, excepting we may be allowed to suppose (what I truly think has been effected) that the movements we have made have drove back the enemy and prevented an impending invasion of the state of Georgia which would otherwise inevitably have overwhelmed it, and also a dangerous defection of the people of both States. This good, I am persuaded, has resulted from it, and this is our consolation.

The enemy were 2 or 3 days since at Alligator Creek, about 14 miles from this place. Their forces, by all accounts, are at least equal either to the Governor's troops or mine, and we are on contrary sides of the river and not within 8 miles of each other. Ask me not how this happened, but rest assured that it has not been my fault. I believe, however, that the Governor will encamp near me tonight, and if the enemy are still where they were, which I hope to know tonight or tomorrow morning, we shall probably beat up their quarters.

Col. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, writing also from Fort Tonyn to General Moultrie, had this to say in his letter of July 10, 1778:

After we have waited so long for the junction of the Militia we now find that we are to have as many independent commanders as corps: Governor Houston declaring that he would not be commander; Col. Williamson hinting that his men would not be satisfied to be under Continental command or indeed any other command but his own: and Commodore Bowen insisting that in the naval department he is supreme; with this divided, this heterogeneous command, what can be done? Even if the season and every other military requisite was favorable (but that is far from being the case) the Continental troops have been so violently attacked by sickness, and the desolation made by it is so rapidly increasing, that if we do not retreat soon, we shall not be able to retreat at all, and may crown this expedition with another Saratoga affair in reverse. But the many reasons which ought to induce us to return I cannot now enumerate. Some of the principles I herewith enclose you. From thence you will learn that we have the strongest grounds to imagine that the enemy mean not to fight us seriously on this side of St. John's. Skirmish with us they may, perhaps hang upon our flanks, and harass our rear, and, if we would give them an opportunity, attempt to surprise us; but to fight on this side of St. John's would be the most imprudent thing they possibly could do, and all their movements show they have no such intention.

In 1778 it was almost impossible to see any way for there to be a patriot conquest of Florida. There was widespread and fatal illness among the troops. There was a lack of surprise in their operations against the enemy. Most important of all, there was a lack of unified patriot command. Governor Houston would not let his State militia be commanded by General Howe of the Continentals. Col. Andrew Williamson wished a separate command for his South Carolina volunteers. Commodore Oliver Bowen maintained that naval support, under his command, should not be subordinated to the army elements.

So on July 11, General Howe called a council of war at Fort Tonyn, on Amelia Island. Among the participants were Col. C. C. Pinckney, Col. Samuel Elbert, Col. John White, Lt. Col. John McIntosh, Maj. John Habersham, and so forth. General Howe put a series of questions to the council. One was "as driving the enemy out of Georgia, and demolishing Fort Tonyn, were the objects principally aimed at; have not these purposes been effected?" He received a unanimous affirmative reply.

Another question was: "Is the army in a situation to cross the St. Johns River, attack the enemy, and secure or retreat in case of accident, though they should be added by the militia men embodied under Governor Houstoun and Colonel Williamson?" This question was resolved unanimously in the negative; as were questions as to whether, since Governor Houston had denied General Howe the right to command the Georgia militia, and no junction had been achieved with the militia, it would be safe or beneficial to the common cause to pursue the combat further in Florida.

Capt. Hugh McCall in his "History of Georgia" wrote concerning the conclusion of these 1778 efforts:

Thus ended General Howe's expedition, on the success of which the fate of Georgia was suspended. He ordered the sick and convalescents on board of the gallies and such other boats and vessels as could be procured, under the direction of Colonel C. C. Pinckney, to proceed by the inland passage to Sunbury, and with the remainder which had been reduced by disease and death, from eleven hundred to three hundred and fifty; he returned by land to Savannah. Governor Houstoun and Colonel Williamson proposed a plan of proceeding with the militia as far as St. John's river, but this arrangement was fortunately abandoned, and their commands returned to Georgia and dispersed.

The 1778 operations did at least discourage substantial loyalist attacks in Georgia in that year; but 1779 was another matter. On September 11, 1779, Savannah was taken by the British; and although major Revolutionary War combat was still to be experienced in Georgia, this was never again to be so in Florida. At the end of the war, England transferred East and West Florida to Spain, which took possession in 1784.

It seems proper now that we plan a park at the site of our most southerly battlefield of the Revolution. The Thomas Creek location seems the most appropriate. Although we know that combat took place still further south on the north bank of the St. Johns at Cowford, the substantial nature of that combat is not known and the land is preempted now by high-rise construction. All we know of the 1776 combat at Cowford is to be found in the following quotation from a January 27, 1777, letter from Governor Tonyn in which he said:

The Indians by themselves forced back the Rebels when they had advanced as far as the Cowford, and had they not discovered men dressed in red at their fires in the night time, they would have surprised them, these were those cloathed in the Regimentals of the Soldiers taken at the Cowford, the Indians however pursued them until they passed St. Mary's River and I must acknowledge that they are very intelligent, and useful Spies in observing the movements of the Rebels.

Moreover, still further south, on August 30, 1778, a privateer committed depredations and carried off 30 Negroes from New Smyrna. But we are not advised of any armed resistance south of Thomas Creek and the best spot to commemorate this southernmost frontier of the Revolution is certainly the battlefield at Thomas Creek. I hope this commemoration can be done, and I have introduced H.R. 12424 to accomplish this by providing for a national park facility at the location.

TELL IT LIKE IT IS—ON BOTH SIDES

HON. ED FOREMAN

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. FOREMAN. Mr. Speaker, all Americans and decent citizens everywhere abhor the atrocity reported as allegedly committed at Pinkville by a few battle-weary soldiers in the Vietnam war last year. One of the sad and tragic facts of war is that people get killed—over 30,000 brave young Americans have died in a nasty, brutal war in Southeast Asia in an attempt to preserve freedom and halt the deathly spread of communism.

However, it is an affront to millions of honest, God-fearing, freedom-loving Americans for a sensation-seeking, so-called "news" service to portray the unselfish, dedicated American servicemen, in Vietnam and elsewhere, as inhumane, berserk murders because of an isolated incident that may have been committed by a handful of edgy, war-torn and battle-weary GI's.

My remarks are directed primarily at the Dispatch News Service, its two partners and a select few of the news media representatives who so eagerly paid out thousands of dollars for a sensational, off-color incident in an apparent sordid attempt to degrade and demoralize the U.S. Army specifically, and America generally. One of the warped-thinking "news" partners, David Obst, a 23-year-old school dropout, who departed the United States, "because I wasn't learning anything in school in this country," says he has been busy selling the story, telephoning newspaper offices in the press building—and tells that at one point he spent 18 consecutive hours on the telephone talking with editors. The youthful salesman boasts that Dispatch News Service has a left-of-center, anti-war tone.

The other member of this duo is Seymour M. Hersh, a 32-year-old Washington free-lance writer, who was brought up in Chicago's "front page" school of newspapering. Hersh, a fast-talking, fast-moving, job-to-job reporter—listed as a former campaign press secretary for Senator EUGENE MCCARTHY—is described by a London newspaper as a "left-wing nut."

Why have not these money-hungry, headline writing sensationalists written about the brutal Communist murder of thousands of innocent victims—men, women, children, and babies—in South Vietnam, in Hungary, in Czechoslovakia, and elsewhere around the globe?

Why have not they photographed and headlined the savage Communist deboweling and deboning and horrendous murder of thousands of screaming Vietnamese citizens?

Why have not these bleeding-heart pacifists written about the senseless slaughter of thousands of decent young American boys who have been ambushed, poisoned, gassed, bombed, burned and murdered by the godless Communists in Vietnam?

Could it be that they are more interested in condemning the Americans in the eyes of the world, than they are in telling the truth about the Communists? Could it be that they are more interested in "selling" and telling the story one-way—rather than reporting it like it is, on both sides? Perhaps.

Mr. Speaker, a story in the December 5 issue of Time magazine, entitled, "On the Other Side: Terror as Policy," is a sparsely publicized insight into the Communist terror policies that should be brought to world attention. I include the article as follows:

ON THE OTHER SIDE: TERROR AS POLICY

For shocked Americans, what happened at My Lai seems an awful aberration. For the Communists in Viet Nam, the murder of civilians is routine, purposeful policy. Terror is a part of the guerrillas' arsenal of intimidation, to be used whenever other methods of persuasion have failed to rally a village or province round the Viet Cong flag.

In a long war, no one knows just how many civilians have been attacked by the Communists. The U.S. has listed well over 100,000 separate incidents of terrorism against the South Vietnamese population since 1956. During the past eleven years, the Communists are known to have killed more than 26,000 South Vietnamese, injured hundreds of thousands, kidnaped at least 60,000 in their campaign of terror.

Many of the Communists' civilian victims died singly or in small groups, as the Viet Cong sought to exterminate effective local leaders loyal to the government in Saigon. In 1960, Father Hoang Ngoc Minh, a popular Kontum parish priest, was ambushed by Viet Cong who drove bamboo spears through his body, then machine-gunned him to death. In 1961, the Viet Cong shot and killed two Vietnamese National Assemblymen near Da Lat.

Many other South Vietnamese have been killed in the random violence designed to paralyze South Viet Nam and frighten its people into abandoning the government. Forty-three were killed and 80 injured, most of them civilians, when terrorists dynamited the My Canh floating restaurant in Saigon in 1965. Forty-eight farm laborers were killed and seven others injured when Viet Cong mines exploded under a bus and another vehicle on a road near Tuy Hoa in 1966.

Not all Communist terrorism is carried out at random. Thousands of Vietnamese have died in well-planned massacres. In 1967, Montagnard tribesmen, who had fled the Communists a year earlier, were set upon in their new home at Dak Son 75 miles northeast of Saigon. Six hundred Viet Cong, 60 of them armed with flamethrowers, invaded the village, setting fire to the huts and shooting the inhabitants as they fled their burning homes, then executing 60 survivors of the assault. Altogether, 252 unarmed Montagnards, nearly all of them women and children, were murdered, 100 kidnaped, 500 listed as missing.

The Communist slaughter of civilians was wholesale while the Communists held the old imperial capital of Hue during the 1968 Tet offensive. Working from house to house with specially prepared "blood lists," they rounded up all officials and people suspected of working with the U.S. and Saigon governments. Some were arrested, others shot on the spot. The magnitude of the massacre did not begin to become fully evident until after government troops had retaken the city and uncovered a mass grave with 150 bodies. Their find led to the discovery of more grisly caches: 19 mass graves in and around Hué have so far yielded more than 2,300 bodies, almost all of them civilians, many with their hands tied behind their backs. Most had been shot or bludgeoned to death; others had been buried alive.

OUR FOREIGN AID POLICY

HON. SHERMAN P. LLOYD

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, recent action by the House of Representatives in passing the foreign aid bill was taken in the face of widespread grassroots opposition which sometime simplifies our foreign aid program as that "foreign giveaway program."

Believing as I do that greater understanding of the program is in the basic national interest, I think widespread dissemination of a column written by David Lawrence and published in the December 1 issue of the Washington Star would be useful. That column follows:

FOREIGN AID ESSENTIAL PART OF POLICY

(By David Lawrence)

"Foreign aid" has become an unpopular phrase in America largely because its critics have spread the wrong impression—that the program is bigger than it really is and that the United States could better use the money at home. But Secretary of State William Rogers points out that the program, in effect, pays for itself many times over.

The administration asked Congress for an appropriation of $2.6 billion. The House cut it by $466 million. The Senate is being asked to restore this sum to the measure. Actually, the amount requested for the entire "foreign aid" program is less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the gross national product of the United States at present. Secretary Rogers feels that such a percentage is only a small part of America's capacity to befriend two-thirds of the peoples of the world.

"Foreign aid" is justified by the secretary of state not only for "moral" and "humanitarian" reasons but because it is "a very important factor in our foreign policy."

He declares that the cut will be viewed abroad as a backward step by America and will lead to a belief that the United States is beginning to turn away from aid programs for the underdeveloped countries.

He says that the effects would be felt in the next few years and that the American aid could have a lot to do with whether "the peaceful revolution in economic and social development now taking place in most regions of the world maintains a satisfactory momentum or not."

It so happens, incidentally, that much of the "foreign aid" given by the United States consists of products or services that are purchased from American companies. The net result, however, is to stimulate ways of building stronger economic systems in each of the countries aided.

The United States is regarded everywhere as a rich country and one able to help the underprivileged. No step has ever been taken in international relations which has won more acclaim for the American people than the "foreign aid" projects. Under the Marshall Plan, which was developed during the Truman administration, the countries hurt in World War II were given a chance to rehabilitate themselves through the use of American funds.

The record of the United States in canceling most of the loans made to the allied powers after both wars and in coming to the rescue even of former enemy countries is unsurpassed in world history.

It is most unfortunate that the same policy was not followed immediately after World War I. Instead, the German people were neglected and they became the victims of Hitler's fascism—an ideology that took advantage of the frustration of the people.

Today the situation is in many respects more acute. The Soviet Union has quietly been using a "foreign aid" device of its own, with large sums spent for military equipment given to North Vietnam as well as the Arabs. There has been some penetration, too, in Africa.

Of course, the example of a Communist-dominated Cuba, with bases for missiles made available to the Soviets, is a not-to-be-forgotten illustration of what can be done by our own potential enemies through the use of their kind of "foreign aid."

It's time the "foreign aid" rendered by the United States was explained fully so that American citizens will not be applauding those members of Congress who want to wreck it but will be warning them instead that the whole project is essential to the carrying out of a successful foreign policy.

The United States has a mission to perform in assisting the countries of Latin America, Africa and Asia to improve their economic facilities so as to be able to handle an ever-increasing population. America can certainly afford more than a quarter of 1 percent of the money taken in by all kinds of businesses and financial operations in what is known as "the gross national product."

Above all, "foreign aid" is a practical policy that could help to prevent another world war by aligning America with other nations everywhere which not only are free but may become strong enough to do their part in preserving world peace.

THE SAN FRANCISCO SUMMER HAPPENTHING

HON. WILLIAM S. MAILLIARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. MAILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, the city of San Francisco was indeed fortunate this summer. We did not witness the outbreak of violence which has marked previous summers in many cities in our Nation. I am convinced one of the factors contributing to a more productive summer for the youth of our city was a volunteer program organized by a coalition of business and professional men, and union and community leaders.

Calling themselves the San Francisco Summer HappenThing, this group of citizens joined together in May in response to the recognition that previous summers lacked coordination of the youth programs and resources for such programs. The Summer HappenThing issued a prospectus and enlisted the assistance of brokerage houses throughout the city; "shares" were issued for the contributions received. This group of community-minded citizens was able to raise nearly $100,000.

The activities of the Summer HappenThing were unusual in several ways. The organization avoided spending a substantial portion of its income on administration; no program was instituted by the organization, rather funds were contributed to existing organizations and groups with the young people themselves holding the majority position on the committee allocating funds to programs.

The public-spirited citizens behind the Summer HappenThing deserve congratulations. At a recent meeting of the board of directors, their chairman, Edward Scarff, president of Transamerica Corp., listed a number of accomplishments. I would like to cite some of these achievements with the hope that they will inspire other members of business and labor along with interested citizens to voluntarily organize to solve some of their communities' problems. Mr. Scarff reported that significant results included:

Transportation of over 15,000 young people from 94 organizations within the city and throughout the surrounding area.

Receiving of grants from $300 to $6,000 to support recreation and education among 35 different groups.

Distribution of funds by a program review committee, a majority of whose members were young people.

A comprehensive inventory of programs of youth-serving agencies was conducted which will aid in the creation and coordination of future youth programing in San Francisco.

Employment of 18 college students under the college work study program and participation by them in various aspects of the Summer HappenThing.

Providing of over 3,000 free tickets for circuses, plays, movies, and baseball games.

Spending of less than 8 percent of funds collected on administration.

The San Francisco media aided in making the community more aware of the need for summer youth programs and the way in which it might participate through numerous interviews, articles, and editorials.

I believe San Francisco's mayor, Joseph Alioto, accurately pinpointed the main reason behind the continued enthusiasm and interest generated by the HappenThing when he noted that "the most impressive 'success' of the Summer HappenThing was its willingness and readiness to involve youth in decision-making and to support programs designed and operated by young adults." We are all deeply appreciative of those who took leadership in this endeavor and who devoted their time, talents, and effort; San Francisco is certainly indebted to them.

KOREA VERSUS VIETNAM

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the doleful economic record, one that approaches negligence, being compiled under the duress of the Vietnam war, stands in stark contrast to the effective record compiled during the Korean war. This unenviable contrast has been forthrightly and clearly delineated by Dr. Alvin H. Hansen, formerly Littauer professor of political economy at Harvard University. At the same time Dr. Hansen quite properly points out that economic growth, including, of course, a low rate of unemployment is usually accompanied by a degree of inflation. I insert Dr. Hansen's article, published in the November 30, 1969, issue of the Washington Post, at this point in the RECORD:

INFLATION: KOREA VERSUS VIETNAM

(By Alvin H. Hansen)

Price stability and full employment are goals, which taken together, are not easily come by. Our record in the last decade is deplorable. For the seven-year period, 1958-64 inclusive, we did indeed earn a high mark for price stability, consumer prices having increased on the average by only 1.5 percent per annum. But the unemployment rate averaged 5.8 per cent.

This seven-year period comprises three Eisenhower years and four Kennedy-Johnson years. Each averaged a 5.8 per cent unemployment rate. The Eisenhower inflation rate was 1.7 percent while the Kennedy-Johnson inflation rate was 1.3 per cent.

The Council of Economic Advisers in the Kennedy-Johnson administration announced as an intermediate goal an unemployment rate of 4 per cent. In view of the 1958-64 record of 5.8 per cent, the announced goal could perhaps be regarded as ambitious. At any rate it was not easily reached. Four years of the new administration passed by and unemployment still stood as high as 5.2 per cent in 1964. Indeed the 4 per cent rate was not reached until 1966, nearly two years after the beginning of heavy involvement in Vietnam. It required the 1964 tax cut plus the sharp escalation of the war in 1965 to bring the unemployment rate at long last down to the hoped-for 4 per cent goal. Once this was reached, the price level began to rise.

Have we not by now reached a stage at which it might be of some interest to compare our methods of attacking inflation during the Korean war with the policies of 1965–69?

In the Korean war we acted swiftly and vigorously, employing a whole battery of anti-inflation weapons. The contrast between our action then and the tardy, ineffective policies of the last four years can perhaps largely be explained by the fact that the Korean war broke like a thunderbolt upon an unsuspecting world, while Vietnam stealthily and almost unnoticed crept up on us. In the Korean case the shock of a sudden eruption of war caused at once an intense rush of buying both on the part of consumers and businessmen fearful of a recurrence of war-time scarcities. The ensuing rapid inventory buildup which spread throughout the free world caused within the brief period of six or seven months a sharp 15 percent rise in prices, in all major industrial countries.

Fear of inflation induced firm action. The U.S. Congress quickly passed three tax laws affecting both corporations and consumers, but especially corporations. Wage and price controls were again introduced together with control of consumer credit.

The effect was striking. Inflation was quickly brought under control, though this was in part a natural reaction from the excessive inventory buildup. Consumer prices rose by only 2 per cent from 1951 to 1952 and by less than 1 per cent from 1952 to 1953.

The war quickly reduced unemployment from 5.8 per cent in 1949 to 3.3 per cent in 1951 and to 2.9 per cent in 1953. At the same time stiff taxes and controls achieved price stability. Moreover the growth rate was 5.2 per cent per year in real terms and the stiff tax program helped to sustain a low 3 per cent interest rate.

Rigid price and wage controls appear no longer to be politically acceptable. But might not a less ambitious control policy, such as a compulsory cooling off period, be feasible? In the area of administered prices, corporations might be required to announce a proposed price increase six months in advance, together with a detailed cost-price analysis justifying the proposed increase. This would give the government time to publicize its own analysis of the relevant cost-price data. An informed public opinion could possibly exert sufficient pressure to moderate price increases.

A profound shift has similarly occurred with respect to wartime taxes. In the Korean war, corporate profits after taxes actually fell to $20.8 billion in 1951–53 from $21.7 billion in 1949–50. In contrast, in the Vietnam war, profits after taxes have sharply increased from $32.5 billion in the prewar years 1961–64 to $51 billion in 1968. Indeed we have added fuel to an overheated economy by continuing the investment tax credit.

When corporate profits after taxes are abnormally high, judged from average past experience, labor unions can be expected to press hard for wage increases. Thus the wage-price spiral is started. Collective bargaining cannot be expected to stand firm against unjustifiable wage increases (i.e., wage increases in excess of productivity gains) if corporate coffers are packed full of abnormally high profits. During the Korean war the low level of profits after taxes brought substantial support to the government's efforts at wage price control.

If tough taxes (particularly on corporations) and control measures are unacceptable even in wartime, a compromise between consumer price stability and full employment becomes virtually unavoidable since there are powerful forces working against each goal. Our statistical knowledge of the relation between these two variables is far from being on solid ground. But such as it is, it seems to suggest that consumer price inflation of about 4.5 per cent per year is more or less consistent with a 3.5 per cent unemployment rate, while a 3.5 per cent inflation rate is roughly consistent with a 4.5 per cent unemployment rate.

A 4.5 per cent unemployment rate, while intolerable in terms of European standards, could possibly be regarded as acceptable in the United States if we sharply increased unemployment insurance benefits and broadened its coverage, while at the same time moving rapidly forward with a retraining and relocation program.

Would a 3.5 percent inflation rate be acceptable in the U.S.? In Western Europe the answer appears to be "yes." Western Europe has learned to live with what we appear to regard as unacceptable. In the 11-year period from 1957 to 1968 consumer price increases averaged 3.0 per cent per year in Western Europe (Germany, Italy, Holland and Britain). This experience appears to throw doubt on the popular view that moderate inflation inevitably accelerates into galloping inflation. The reasons in part appear to be that exceptional price increases lead to exceptionally strong government resistance of one sort or another, and so the tide is turned. Moreover, there are inherent in the cost-price system long lags that delay rapid escalation.

The period 1957–68 (and much the same record goes back to 1950) was one of unparalleled growth, prosperity and rising living standards in Western Europe. Indeed one may ask if such a degree of economic progress was ever achieved in any advanced country without a moderate inflation. When times are good there will necessarily be upward pressures on prices and wages.

In the U.S. we are perhaps a little too sensitive about moderate rates of inflation. History shows that we are not normally subject to inflation sprees. Highly important here is our demonstrated capacity to increase production sharply when put under pressure. One of the most prosperous periods in American history was that from 1897 to 1914. In this period of 17 years, prices rose by approximately the same percent as the recent average European rate.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

HON. WILLIAM L. HUNGATE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, in light of recent reports on the employment of public opinion polls as campaign tools, some large margins of error are indicated. As an example, in Mayor Lindsay's victory by some 7 percent, one poll had indicated a victory of 14 percent, and another indicated a victory by 18 percent. Perhaps the public reaction outlined in the following article has already begun:

LIARS OF THE WORLD

I have a great friend who runs a market research organisation and he's going to hate me for this. But considerations of personal affection must give ground to the need I feel to issue a clarion call to the nation. It is this:

If you are ever asked questions by opinion polls, lie in your teeth.

If you're going to vote Labour insist that you're a Tory, and vice versa. If you like the new enzyme washing powders, declare your undying loyalty to the carbolic that mother used to use. I know the market researchers claim to have ways of checking our truthfulness but if enough of us tell lies we are bound to get them down. Our's is an essential and noble mission.

What have I got against opinion polls? Well, for a start, they're too often right, and this is deeply offensive to the integrity of the individual. Can you think of anything more insulting than the fact that by questioning just 2,000 people, a pollster can tell how thirty-five million of us are going to vote in next year's general election?

It indicates we are just a bunch of sheep, and the sooner we start actively disproving the fact the better.

It's one thing to be a sheep peacefully cropping the pasture and whisking off flies with your tail. It's quite another kettle of algae when people keep shouting in your ear all the time that you are a sheep and that this is the way you are going to behave.

I tell you, for us sheep there's a dog's life ahead. Did you know that there are now five major polling organisations which between today and polling day will be making the air hideous with yeses, noes and don't knows?

Gallup, of course, has been with us for many decades and when it was in the columns of the dear old News Chronicle it seemed to be a mild and gentle exercise in liberal sociology. Now it appears in the upright and conservative pages of the Daily Telegraph and has taken on a much sterner mien.

In the early fifties the Daily Mail started its own survey called National Opinion Polls which soon managed to steal at least some of Gallup's thunder. It was NOP which predicted at breakfastime that the Liberals would run off with the first prize in the Orpington by-election that self-same day. All this was in the innocent years of the 1950's. In those days two opinion polls were enough for any one nation.

But next came a breakaway group from NOP. They formed an organisation called Opinion Research Centre which now carries out polls for the Sunday Times, the London Evening Standard, and sundry regional newspapers. Not to be outdone by its Sunday sister, the Times newspaper recently began Marplan which is also an opinion poll, not something you cover the kitchen floor with. And then there were four.

The Daily Express used to have a poll of its own but nobody took it seriously, least of all the Express. It would publish predictions but admitted it was doing so merely "as a contribution to the gaiety of our readers." But now even the Daily Express has lost its sense of humour. At a cost of tens of thousands of pounds it has signed up the Lou Harris polling organisation of America and is now publishing its findings with a desperate sobriety.

So Britain goes into the 1970's—and the next general election—with five major opinion polls. To paraphrase James Thurber we have opinion polls like other people have mice.

But, you may ask, what harm do they do apart from sapping our faith in our own individuality? The answer is that the technique of opinion polls can pasteurise the process of decision-making by our institutions as well as by individuals. A nightly check on a few hundred homes tells television chiefs what we are all watching on the box. But what if those chiefs could be brought to the point of not trusting "the ratings"? Then they would have to start using their own judgment, and I'm sure an improvement in programmes would result.

The political implications of the polling business are far worse. Both main parties use market research all the time and secretly, and what they do with the information they get is not exposed publicly. But we do know how far the use of polls in American politics has gone. When Robert Kennedy was campaign manager for his brother Jack he would send a market research team ahead of the whistle stops so that when the future President of the United States addressed a local audience he would tell them exactly what they wanted to hear. That was nearly ten years ago and today a Government policy can be pre-tested like an easy-to-spread margarine. The judgment of a statesman is replaced by the punch card and the computer.

The suggestion has been made that public opinion polls might be banned, or at least controlled. It is certainly difficult to discover what good they do, and it is possible that they are of direct harm to the democratic process. A survey published on the morning of polling day about what we're going to do when we get into the voting booth a couple of hours later is no value to man or beast, though, if we are sheep, it might persuade some of us to go along with the herd. In the recent West German elections the pollsters held off publishing their final surveys in case this "bandwagon" effect was created.

But the case is not proved, and, if we are fighting for the individual, we must defend the right of the individual statistician to do his little sums. But we have no obligation to help him.

In fact an encouraging trend is reported from America where, may they be forgiven, the whole polling business started. After the last Presidential election the pollsters went back to discover why their predictions had turned out to be a bit off. They found that one out of every ten of the people had voted for a different candidate from the one they had nominated in the pre-election survey. A very good start.

So now let us unfurl the banner of prevarication. Let untruth be our guide. If you're a Wilson man, plump for Heath. You may fancy Jeromy Thorpe but enter Enoch Powell in the space provided. I hereby name our movement Operation Spanner-in-the-works.

There will be those gentle ones among us who are reluctant to stray from the path of verity. When accosted by a part-time housewife earning a bit of money on the side and wanting to know which can of mush they feed their cats they will be tempted to answer truthfully. This admirable tendency must be resisted. For, after all, you will be lying in a good cause and, though I speak with no authority, I am confident that the Lord Above would, in this instance, forgive.

FORT DIX STOCKADE

HON. W. C. (DAN) DANIEL

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. DANIEL of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of this body a newspaper account of comments attributed to a colleague, MARIO BIAGGI, after he toured the stockade at Fort Dix, N.J., on October 24, 1969. A news conference was held afterward outside the post.

As a member of the Special Subcommittee To Probe Disturbances on Military Bases, I made an official visit, accompanied by Congressman JOHN HUNT and Counsel Bill Cook, to this particular stockade on November 1. While there, our group interrogated administrative personnel and several prisoners under oath. We also inspected the physical plant. As a result of our interviews and investigation, we found much of the press information attributed to Mr. BIAGGI to to be in error.

Therefore, I take this opportunity to set the record straight.

In the October 25, 1969, edition of the Philadelphia Enquirer, Congressman BIAGGI is quoted as having said:

> There are about 300 attempted suicides at the post, in and out of the stockade, each month.

Sworn testimony before our subcommittee indicates approximately 300 suicide gestures at Fort Dix per year, not per month. The men who attempt suicide are examined immediately at the emergency room by both a physician and a psychiatrist. A most significant fact is that there has not been one successful suicide within the past year in the stockade.

The record reveals that there is a turnover of about 75,000 people every 3 months at Fort Dix. Thus, this post has an annual population of about 300,000 people. This figure includes all soldiers, permanent cadres, and civilians.

The newspaper article noted that the Congressman saw a "prisoner suffering from withdrawal from heroin use" and, also, that heroin was "readily available at Fort Dix." Our information suggests that "narcotics on Fort Dix is no more of a problem than it is anywhere else." Also, the prisoner who was allegedly suffering from heroin withdrawal was, in actuality, recovering. This soldier obtained his first heroin from nearby Wrightstown. Some, he admitted, was available from soldiers on base. However, it is available at a price that servicemen can rarely afford. Thus, some who are "hooked" go a.w.o.l. in order to supply their requirements. After going absent without leave to discuss the problem with his family, this particular soldier returned voluntarily to the Army to seek medical assistance. The patient was given a shot of methedone, examined by hospital physicians, and checked each succeeding morning during recovery. According to the soldier, the Congressman who had visited in October had not questioned him about the availability of heroin on the base nor about his treatment. He was only asked how much of the drug he was using.

The newspaper article revealed our colleague's distress over the "disciplinary chow." First of all, it should be noted that this diet is prescribed only for prisoners (who are) unresponsive to discipline in the stockade. No one is put on this diet if he has a psychological problem. Likewise, this restrictive diet would not be given to any prisoner with a serious illness or any similar medical history. The following regulations safeguard the health of men on this diet:

First. The diet contains a minimum of 2,100 calories a day.

Second. A balanced portion of the food is served, but without meat, dairy products, or dessert.

Third. The diet is chosen from the regular menu.

Fourth. No man is kept on this diet longer than 14 days at a time.

Fifth. A physical examination of each man is conducted before placing him on the diet.

Sixth. The medical officer examines these men daily.

Seventh. A man exhibiting good behavior may receive regular diet before the 14-day period is completed.

The newspaper quotes our colleague as having stated that he observed prisoners who had lost "40 pounds during their period of incarceration." The record shows that the prisoner who claimed this 40 pound weight loss had been on the restricted diet for only 48 hours. When the man was asked why he told the Congressman that he had lost 40 pounds, he replied, "I was only kidding."

Our subcommittee was curious about the "so-called political prisoners" mentioned by the press. After an investigation, I can only assume that the term referred to the defectors returning from foreign countries and assigned to Fort Dix. Some of these were involved in a major disturbance at the post on June 5, 1969, and some are awaiting trial on these charges.

Conditions at Fort Dix are not perfect by any stretch of the imagination. However, they are not such as to justify a blanket indictment as suggested in the Associated Press article of October 25. Under very trying circumstances and with limited personnel and inadequate facilities, the administration is, in my judgment, doing a responsible job.

A 13-YEAR-OLD VIEWS SEX EDUCATION

HON. MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, the teaching of sex education in the schools has become a subject of intense debate in many communities throughout the country. At this time, I would like to place in the RECORD a letter I received from a 13-year-old girl in my district. I feel it is a thoughtful letter on this issue, expressing concern with many of the problems facing youngsters today. The letter follows:

Hon. MARTHA GRIFFITHS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. GRIFFITHS: This is my first time writing to a Congressman, and I'm not to sure on going about it. I was told by my Civics teacher to first state the problem on which I was speaking about. So I think it's best that I do.

There are so many problems in our nation, sex education is just one of them. After reading that last sentence I bet you thought it was a deep subject for a kid to be talking about. Well, I think it's time a "kid" said something about his own education materials. I've heard and read controversy about sex education from teachers, parents, churches, doctors, and psychiatrists, but never "a" kid. By the way I'm for sex education.

The real problem with sex education is trying to convince organizations, such as the John Birch Society, that sex education is anything but harmful. If it does anything, sex education should help.

In convincing opposed organizations we could bug them to death to at least to try different methods in teaching sex education and see what happens. If they pointed to Anaheim, California we could tell them that it was only one method.

There would have to be many debates and conferences, with many more facts brought up. Schools would have to try and find different methods. Anything that could help would have to be done.

It is very hard for a thirteen year old to come up with the right solution, but all I know is that something must be done. Just look at the statistics:

At least one teenage girl in every six, it is estimated, today becomes pregnant out of wedlock.

Illegitimate children are swelling the welfare rolls all across the nation, and in dozens of American cities, special schools, tutoring or night classes have been established for unwed mothers to-be.

There's been a startling rise in teenage V.D.—an estimated 200,000 to 300,000 infections yearly.

A recent public school health education study of some 18,000 children in 38 states: it revealed an appalling ignorance.

It seems ignorance is the major cause of these increasing rates. However, other reasons such as wanting someone of her own are in many cases of the illegitimacies.

These reasons are a "must" for sex education in schools. It is the obligation of the parents to teach sex to their children, but many are embarrassed or may not know all of the facts themselves. So they turn to the school or church for help, but a lot of people do not attend church.

Even if sex education is not the answer I still think it should be taught. We are the highest of being and reproduction is a life process. I've been taught how to eat, talk, read, write, and go to the toilet, but never have I been taught about sex.

Thank you for reading one of the many letters that you receive. It sure would be nice if sex education was introduced as a bill and I'm sure after reading this letter from a thirteen year old girl who has never had any sex education and is in need of it. That you would probably approve the bill, if introduced.

Sincerely,

——— ———.

VIETNAM

HON. WILLIAM S. MAILLIARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. MAILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues know, I have stated my support of the President and his efforts to deal with the complex and difficult situation in Vietnam. I do not, however, feel we should close our eyes and minds to new ideas. It is for this reason that I am inserting the following open letter from Dr. George Lerski, professor of government at the University of San Francisco, which appeared in the university newspaper, the San Francisco Foghorn:

Dr. Michael Lehmann deserves the gratitude of the Faculty's silent majority for his bold warning that the increased "political activism on campus will destroy the scholarly work." For identical reasons I feel compelled to voice my serious dissent with the amazing appeal of the thirty-two Faculty dissenters, although I sincerely respect most of the signers as charming colleagues and fine scholars.

One can well understand the moral indignation with the tragic and unnecessary war in the far away tropical jungle of an artificially divided Southeast Asia country, but I deeply deplore the emotional urging "all students in the University to join . . . to demonstrate in whatever way we can our outrage . . ." For instance, are you all ready to "resort to violent confrontation" or to use "sticks and stones" as recommended on our campus by Dr. Carlton Goodlet, the hero of the "Bloody Days Ahead" editorial in the last issue of the San Francisco Foghorn?

It is indeed high time to stop the nonsensical half-hearted war for the Seventeenth Parallel in Vietnam, but not through strikes and further radical agitation on American campuses which may lead to a complete standstill of academic life, as happened in Japan.

As for stopping the Vietnam war, this writer would like to submit a "Wilsonian" peace formula to be simultaneously proposed through all available channels for consideration of the U.S. government.

The origins of the so-called containment policy can be traced back to the fatal decisions of the Teheran, Yalta, Potsdam and Geneva Conferences with their disregard for the natural rights of smaller states for territorial unity and national self-determination. The inhuman divisions of those unwilling countries along the Iron or Bamboo Curtains, Curzon Lines, Thirty-eighth or Seventeenth Parallels were bound to perpetuate misery, tensions, and "limited" wars in defense of those artificial borders. Before those conflicts escalate into a major world confrontation, it might not be too late to try to solve the Vietnam calamity by constructive implementation of the following seven steps:

(1) Complete withdrawal of all foreign troops and of foreign military or police advisors from the entire region of the former French colonies in Indochina, including Cambodia, Laos and both Vietnams.

(2) Total demilitarization and neutralization of both Vietnams, similar to the 1955 detente in Austria,

(3) Abolition of the Seventeenth Parallel border drawn across the living body of the Vietnam nation,

(4) Free the unfettered secret elections in reunited Vietnam under the impartial control of the United Nations,

(5) American recognition of the outcome of such elections regardless of their political result,

(6) International guarantees of the borders and independence of a united but disarmed and neutralized Vietnam by the major powers, including Mainland China,

(7) Our economic assistance to the war-torn population of united Vietnam and readiness to give political asylum to the rejected leaders of any of the belligerent parties.

I have reason to believe that any such disengagement formula for peace without surrender if implemented by our government may gain the support of world opinion. Perhaps it is still not too late to convince the irresponsible hardliners both in Hanoi and in Saigon that it is better to negotiate for real peace than to face the tragic alternative of nuclear smashing of the cities and ports of their country increasingly advocated by equally irresponsible American hawks on one side and radical hotheads such as Eldridge Cleaver on the other.

It is exactly that explosive polarization of American society—and of its academic microcosm—our own university community—which may bring about the catastrophe.

A FOURTH-CLASS ANSWER TO A FIRST-CLASS MESS

HON. JERRY L. PETTIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. PETTIS. Mr. Speaker, approximately 1 month ago, on November 3, I told our colleagues about one of my recent personal experiences with our inept mail service. It involved a special delivery, airmail letter which was delivered to my office in the Cannon Building 4 months after it was dispatched in San Bernardino, Calif.

Well, the Post Office Department, having been apprised of my remarks, elicited a certain amount of concern over the matter and undertook what appeared to be a painstaking investigation of the incident. Here I was all prepared to commend the officials involved when lo and behold comes an official explanation from the Postmaster General's congressional liaison officer which is utterly extraordinary.

Let me quote a couple of pertinent paragraphs from the letter and then add some additional comment:

Our request of the Washington, D.C. Postmaster produces information that the Special Delivery Messenger assigned to that particular delivery trip on July 10, has since retired from the Postal Service and cannot be asked for specific details of his performance . . . However, Special Delivery Messengers working from the Main D.C. Post Office are not expected to have the information needed to deliver accurately mail that is incorrectly addressed.

If, in this case, the messenger arrived at 1517 Longworth Building at some hour after most offices had closed and found the door locked with nobody in the corridor with whom to consult, he would have delivered the letter in the mail slot adjacent to the door.

Of course, the supposition is totally unrealistic and unsupportable. If the postal investigators had checked carefully, they would have found out that the mail slot at the former office was, and has been since I vacated the office last March, sealed closed with cardboard and tape. The premises are currently shared by two colleagues who use the room for utility purposes. But there have been cases when mail addressed to me was slipped under the door and in every instance it has been promptly forwarded to my present quarters.

So here we have the great monolithic Post Office Department letting some anonymous retired postal worker take the blame for the whole deplorable episode.

Clearly, the Post Office Department is assuming a fourth-class attitude in a first-class mess.

TIME WILL PASS ON FOR HIPPIES AS IT HAS PASSED ON FOR US

HON. E. Y. BERRY

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, the Daily Market RECO carried a cute article by Elmer Roessner which should be made available to the Members by insertion in the RECORD:

(By Elmer Roessner)

NEW YORK.—A pair of hippies, the girl carrying a baby, shuffled through the rain along a park. "Isn't that terrible?" I asked my companion. "Look at that couple, wasting their lives away, hungry and clad in rags, fighting some vague establishment. And look at that poor baby, likely to catch its death of cold in this weather. Isn't that a tragic, criminal sight?"

"Not at all!" said my companion, who builds houses and small apartment buildings. "It's a wonderful picture. You may see it as the end of a miserable life. I see it as the beginning of a new life, with satisfactions for that bearded hippie, pleasure for that bedraggled, slack-hair wench and food and fun for that little kid."

"Are you dreaming?" I asked.

NO PLACE TO GO

"No. I'm not dreaming. I'm simply seeing again what I have seen dozens of times before. You are seeing a beautiful picture but you don't recognize it. That tattered family there is the future of America."

"The hippies are going to take over?" I asked.

"Nonsense," my friend replied. "Those people are simply at the end of the trail. There is no place to go but up.

"If the wind turns a little colder, they are within an hour of abandoning their life of protest. They will be forced to realize that there is no revolution tonight. It will hurt them to the marrow of their bones, but they will realize that one phase of their lives is over.

"Tomorrow, even tonight, that fellow is going to start looking for a job, not a job of washing dishes but a job that will take his family in out of the cold. He'll even shave that funny growth off his face if necessary to hold down the job and get along with the establishment.

HOOKED FOREVER

"The girl will primp up a bit and as soon as they can afford it, she'll get some new clothes and, if she can find a baby sitter, start looking for a job.

"From time to time the couple will mutter about how they are trapped by the establishment, but they'll never try to get out. And as they make a little money, they'll start thinking about a house in the suburbs, where the growing child can get some fresh air and try to catch frogs.

"Eventually, the girl will join a P-TA and the young fellow—well, he won't join the Republican party but he'll vote for the men he thinks will keep unshaven bums out of his corner of Suburbia."

"You build houses," I said. "Why don't you be the first one to give them a builder's card?"

"That might spoil it," he replied. "I'll let God and the weather work on them for a little while."

"How do you know all this?" I asked.

"When I was a teen, I was a member of the Young Anarchists Society. We met in a cellar and talked about blowing up Union Depot and the Court House.

"But we never had any matches and we became interested in jobs, and grabbing off a girl for keeps, and buying or renting a house somewhere and, before we knew it, we were grown up and making money and calling for outlawing of young anarchists' leagues and demanding that the government finance new businesses for young people and shooting off firecrackers on the Fourth of July."

Anyhow, I stopped feeling sorry for the hippie, his girl and their baby alongside the park.

CONGRESSMAN BRAD MORSE URGES ADOPTION OF A COHERENT URBAN POLICY

HON. WILLIAM O. COWGER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. COWGER. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Republican task force on urban affairs, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the thoughtful and perceptive statement concerning Federal urban policy made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MORSE) to the New England Merchants National Bank 11th annual New England municipal conference in Boston on November 17, 1969.

In his statement, Mr. Morse demonstrates an acute awareness of the underlying social, economic, and political forces that have shaped urban life and are today causing rapid and deep-seated changes. As a former mayor of a large city, I am particularly impressed with the gentleman from Massachusetts' analyses of the problems which result from the failure to provide municipal governments the authority and fiscal resources commensurate with their responsibilities.

As he so ably points out, the proliferation of Federal programs, particularly between 1960 and 1969—the number of Federal programs rose from 45 to 435—an increase of almost 400 percent in this period—have certainly not met the problem. There is, indeed, a gap between the number of categorical aid programs issuing forth from Washington on the one hand and the degree of social satisfaction that has ensued on the other.

As Mr. MORSE and Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the President's adviser on urban affairs, point out, a spate of "programs do not a policy make." We lack any coherent and unified urban policy. To quote my colleague from Massachusetts:

> What is necessary is a national urban policy which establishes goals and which can then form a framework within which to formulate programs for the accomplishment of those goals.

In his statement to the New England Merchants Bank municipal conference, BRAD MORSE has provided us with not only a thoughtful perspective on current urban problems but with suggestions concerning what our urban policy goals should be. We desperately need a coherent urban policy. I therefore commend his statement to my colleagues and insert it in the RECORD following my remarks:

ADDRESS BY F. BRADFORD MORSE

Christopher Morley once wrote: "All cities are mad but the madness is gallant. All cities are beautiful but the beauty is grim."

In 1965, Watts burst into flame and burned for three days. In the ensuing years, countless numbers of cities across the country experienced similar violence and destruction—Chicago, Miami, Detroit, Nashville, Buffalo, Rochester, Washington, D.C.—the list goes on.

There was nothing very gallant nor very beautiful about those events. Certainly there was much that was grim.

But while much was destroyed in the process of these violent upheavals, something else was created—a new concern and a new awareness. Watts, and the subsequent rioting and violent destruction that engulfed so many cities, riveted the nation's collective attention on problems it had too long neglected—and the so-called "crisis of the cities" became a national crisis.

The problems themselves, of course, have been with us for a long time. Indeed, the problems of our nation are the problems of the city: transportation, housing, airports, schools, employment, sewage disposal, water and air pollution, recreational facilities and conservation, to name a few.

These already severe physical problems have been compounded by social problems—millions of people—black people, poor people, young, old, unemployed—feel oppressed, alienated and left out of the system.

As the same time, our present social and political environment exacerbates our difficulties further. We live in a time of profound revolution—and I choose that word with care—and we do not fully understand what new pressures are being generated. We are worried and we are even frightened by the rapid and deep-seated changes that are taking place around us.

Our society has been undergoing a steady polarization—hawk against dove, young against old, black against white—that is increasingly isolating citizens from each other. Where we seek community we find fragmentation. Where we seek order, we find chaos.

And now, when it is most crucial for the city to respond effectively to the increasing demands being made upon it, the city itself, the community itself, is virtually immobilized.

What has happened?

How did we come to the present impasse and where might we—must we—go from here?

We are a nation of cities in spite of ourselves.

The American tradition has been built upon the values of the rural, agrarian life—independence, self-sufficiency, hard work—and democracy itself, so the theory goes, flourishes best in an agrarian setting. Our Constitution and our political institutions reflect the essentially rural character of an earlier day.

But cities are the natural outgrowth of a growing country and an increasingly industrialized economy and so they sprang up, early in our history, and they have been growing ever since, until today the vast majority of Americans live in cities.

That is not to say that most Americans live in big cities—they do not. Too often we tend to think only of such places as New York, Chicago, Detroit or Los Angeles when we hear about the "urban crisis." As a matter of fact, in 1960, only 9.8 percent of our people lived in cities of 1 million or more. On the other hand, 98 percent of the units of local government have fewer than 50,000 persons.

But this fact does not mean they are any the less urban. More important, they represent conditions of living and problems of government profoundly different from those of our agrarian, rural, small town past.

It is a simple enough matter to relate the basic facts underlying today's urban crisis.

In the early period of our history, the growth of the city was primarily a predictable economic development. Cities sprang up in response to two factors: first the economic interest, and second, the need on the part of people for a feeling of community.

The political jurisdiction of the city more or less covered the areas of intense economic development, that in turn more or less defined the area of most dense settlement. Under such circumstances municipal government could—and largely did, deal with the process of governing. Though in some cases people might quarrel with the methods used—for example by the political bosses of the old city machine—nevertheless, they got the job done and they governed.

In the last thirty years, however, economic incentives and social desires have combined to produce a fractionating process that has made it ever more difficult to collect sufficient power in one place to provide the rudiments of effective government.

Part of this fractionating process is inherent in the structure of municipal government itself and should not be underestimated as a cause of today's crisis in the cities. Much of this crisis is in fact a crisis in governing—an inability to perform the most essential functions of government because of a lack either of authority or resources or both. We must add to this, however, another consideration—that much of the crisis is also due to the increasing isolation of large segments of the population.

We have lost two things—we have lost the viability of our municipal structures and we have lost our sense of community.

As a result of these forces, and as a part of the process of fractionation, the central area of the cities ceased to grow and began to decline. The core began to rot.

Additional special circumstances compounded this problem. First, the extraordinary migration of rural people, mostly southern blacks to the northern city brought vast numbers of largely unskilled and often unemployable people into the central city. Second, a postwar population explosion—90 million babies were born between 1946 and 1968—combined with the influx of other citizens to place immense pressures on all municipal services.

Understandably, the municipal services have not been up to the challenge and many middle class whites have moved to the suburbs, seeking escape from the rapidly changing, rapidly declining, central city.

Third, both resulting from and contributing to this process, more and more industries have moved from the cities to areas where taxes are lower and the environment more favorable.

As a result of all these factors, the economic stagnation of the inner city became desperately exacerbated by the problem of racial tensions. In the course of the 1960's, tension turned into open and violent racial strife.

The present immobilization of city governments in the face of these demands and tensions is not the result of lack of effort. On the contrary, city governments began to respond to what the President's Advisor on Urban Affairs, Pat Moynihan, has called "the onset of economic obsolescence and social rigidity," a generation ago. But, they found their fiscal resources strained beyond capacity in no time at all.

As all of you know too well, the cities are severely limited in their sources of revenue. As countless municipal officials have pointed out, many cities are strapped by the limitations imposed on their corporate charters by the state legislatures. In many cases they do not have the right to levy any except limited forms of taxes, mainly sales and property taxes which hit hardest on those least able to pay.

Today, with the new demands and intensified requirements for services for additional people, the cities are confronted with financial problems that they simply do not have the capability to solve.

Let me pause here to mention a subject which I know is of great interest to you—the provision in the House-passed tax reform bill which would levy a tax on interest earned from municipal bonds. As you know, this is a subject of considerable controversy and the House action itself, while it was not yet a law, was enough to cause a significant drop in the sales of municipal bonds.

As you may know, the Senate Finance Committee announced last month that the bill it will report to the Senate will not subject State and municipal bond interest to Federal income tax.

Beginning in the postwar period the states, to a limited degree, and the Federal government on an escalating scale, have become involved in urban programs. In this decade especially, considerable resources have been channeled from Washington to the cities and this trend will doubtless continue and probably increase.

But is this enough? Does the solution of our "urban problem" really lie in spending more and more money, almost purely for the sake of spending it? That is what many—and I must include state and municipal officials in this group—would have us believe. Certainly it is the assumption behind most of our federal grant-in-aid programs to the states and cities.

But has our success been such that we can confidently say that a continuation of these policies will eventually bring a satisfactory solution?

I do not think so. This assumption, and our whole approach to the so-called "urban problem" bears careful and critical scrutiny.

The cities are in the grip of a cruel paradox. Where people are is where their needs must be met. Most Americans live in cities. And so the responsibility for meeting our society's cast needs in the areas of social services, jobs, welfare, housing, transportation, and the quality of life—this responsibility has fallen on our cities. But the fact is that of all the units of government in this country, the city is the least equipped and the most poorly structured to deal with these problems.

This is a fact at least as fundamental as the social and physical problems of the cities themselves. Until it is solved, all the resources we may pour into the cities will not bring the results we seek.

The impasse in municipal government today I believe results from a combination of these social and physical factors. First, as Moynihan suggests, "the sense of general community is eroding, and with it the authority of existing relationships." Second, and at the same time, there is a "powerful quest for specific community emerging in the form of ever more intensive assertions of racial and ethnic identities." Third, the authority system within the city is so divided, so fragmented, that effective action is virtually impossible. The city lacks authority commensurate with its responsibility for governing.

Much of the crisis of the cities arises from the interaction of these new demands on the one hand, and the relative inability of the urban social and political system to respond to them on the other.

We cannot be sanguine about the future. We can foresee a time when, if trends continue as they are now, most industry and other income-producing activity will have moved out of the city, taking with them their employment and their wealth. Their place will be taken in the inner city by the poor, black and white. The outer ring of suburbia, largely white and middle class, will become ever more protective and defensive. The inner city itself will become more riddled with difficulties and the potential for conflict and violence will be immeasurably increased.

How do we meet this problem?

I am convinced that the very future of our democratic system lies in the balance. The upheavals and the polarization that are paralyzing our society are a direct challenge to its viability. We have been nurtured on a consensual system of authority—and the people will continue to consent to that authority only so long as it continues to meet their legitimate needs.

What, then, are we to do to prevent the apocalypse which so many fear is imminent?

First, I believe we must take steps to make our cities governable, pure and simple. We must devise systems of municipal government where the authority to do is commensurate with the responsibility to do. We must overcome the fragmentation that immobilizes local governments and reconstitute them in a more naturally organic way.

The metropolitan area of Minneapolis, for example, comprises some 1.8 million people—certainly not one of the giant cities when compared to New York, Chicago, or Los Angeles. But within that metropolitan area there are over 400 different units of government operating—from police departments, to school districts, to the office of the Mayor. It is a wonder that any cooperation or coordination is accomplished in such a situation.

That circumstance is duplicated, perhaps not to the same degree, in every municipal government in the country. We must begin to give serious consideration to the possibility of totally reconstituting local governments along area or regional lines—perhaps metropolitan government is the answer—where a regional government has jurisdiction over the entire area which encompasses its problems.

The problem of water pollution is a current and very illustrative example. If a city—let us say my home city, Lowell—wants to do something about the pollution in the Merrimack River (which is severe as I am sure you all know), it can spend millions of dollars to build treatment plants and sewage disposal facilities and be the model of action in the fight against pollution. But unless the other cities along the same river do the same thing, then the City of Lowell may as well have dumped its money into the river, along with its sewage. It is in the nature of the pollution problem that it cannot be successfully attacked piecemeal.

For years I have been urging, on both the Federal government and local governments, the application of systems management techniques to the problem of pollution control on the Merrimack River as well as to other nondefense public problems. In order to meet that problem it will take the concerted, cooperative efforts of all the towns on the river—and that means in New Hampshire as well as in Massachusetts. That is a fairly simple proposition. But years and years have gone by with little or no action. And the reason is also fairly simple. There is no one unit of government with the authority to demand and enforce compliance with pollution control for the entire Merrimack River Basin.

I do not mean to suggest that this is all the fault of our presently constituted system of municipal government. Certainly I do not mean to suggest that metropolitan government alone would solve this problem because clearly it would not.

I do suggest, however, that this situation points out an important factor in the future effectiveness or ineffectiveness of local governments.

Clearly, if a Basin wide authority for the Merrimack Valley were to be established, each of the municipalities along the river would have to relinquish some of its sovereignty to that central authority. That is the basis of our federal system. Each of the states gives up something in sovereign authority in the expectation that the rewards of union will be greater for all than the sacrifice each makes. The same is true in this instance. Each of the municipalities along the river will have to relinquish some of its sovereignty if all of them together are to benefit from a clean Merrimack river. As yet there is not the political will to take that step.

Unless we overcome the parochialism which characterizes municipal governments across the country, we will not begin to solve our problems. Parochialism is not only a problem between governments—it plagues the city with hundreds of different units of government—remember Minneapolis—with specific authority over limited areas of concern. Cooperation is minimal. The result is chaos in local government and I do not think we can tolerate its effects for very much longer before the entire system is irretrievably damaged.

While the problem of structure is not nearly as exciting nor as publicly interesting as poverty or hunger or pollution, I suggest to you that its solution must accompany the others.

Of course structure is not enough. You must have programs to move through the structure—programs which speak meaningfully to the unique needs of a polarized mass society in the 1970's that is seeking, more than anything else, a sense of itself.

We have had a proliferation of federal programs in recent years, however, and they have not met with much success. In the period between 1960 and 1969, the number of domestic programs of the Federal government rose from 45 to 435—an increase of almost 400%. But it is clear to even the casual observer that there is a gap between the number of categorical aid programs issuing forth from Washington on the one hand, and the degree of social satisfaction that has ensued on the other.

Clearly there is a need for something more—perhaps I should say something different. That something different has been suggested by Pat Moynihan.

Moynihan suggests, and I agree with him, that "programs do not a policy make." What is lacking is any coherent and unified logic behind those programs—what is necessary is a national urban policy which establishes goals and which can then form a framework within which to formulate programs for the accomplishment of those goals.

Much that takes place in municipal government comes as a result of policies established by the Federal government. Municipal governments often adopt policies and plans in such a way as to qualify for available Federal money. In effect this is an incentive system, much like that of profit in private enterprise. But as yet, the Federal government has not found an effective incentive system to shape the forces at work in urban areas in such a way that urban goals are in fact attained.

Too often, municipal officials adopt policies only in response to initiatives from Washington. They have, to far too large a degree, abdicated their leadership role to the Federal government. City priorities are being established by the Federal government.

I think that the President's proposal for sharing revenue with the states and cities, modest though it is in the beginning, is an important way to bring much needed revenue into the hands of state and local governments for use in meeting their own priority needs.

What should be the objectives of a national urban policy?

There are several goals which I suggest are matters of urgency and importance and which must be dealt with. First, and most important, we must attack the social isolation of the several groups in our central cities. Until we do we will not be able to eliminate the source of violence and disruption in our urban life. This is not to say that we must destroy the sense of specific community among members of racial and ethnic groups of which I spoke earlier. It does mean that we must establish channels of communication and cooperation which will in turn generate a restoration of that general community which we are so sorely lacking today.

Second, federal programs which affect urban areas, and there are few which do not, must take account of the balance which does not, but should exist between economic and social forces in urban areas. Imbalances in industry, transportation, housing, social services, and other elements or urban life, have become more rather than less pronounced in recent years. We must take account of this balance and structure programs in such a way as to create and maintain an equilibrium among these forces.

Third, and this goes back to my major point regarding structure, Federal programs should be structured in such a way as to stimulate the reorganization of local government in response to the reality of metropolitan conditions.

Fourth, a primary object of a federal urban policy should be to restore the fiscal vitality of urban government and to assure that local government have sufficient revenue sources to meet their own problems on their own initiative.

Federal urban policy should seek to equalize the provision of public services among different jurisdictions in metropolitan area. The residents in the inner city should receive, dollar-for-dollar, the equivalent of those in more prosperous and more prospering areas, insofar as that is possible. While we may not be able to guarantee equality of achievement, we must at least guarantee the equality of opportunity for which we have traditionally stood.

These are only some of the ingredients of a national urban policy. Perhaps equally as important as its content, however, is the realization by all of us of the necessity of thinking about our approach to this crisis. We need to ask ourselves the most basic questions. Perhaps the city as we have come to know it is no longer a viable institution for living, working and governing in the 1970's. Perhaps we will have to devise totally new systems of grouping people to meet the evolving nature of a future America. Whatever the answer may be, we shall not find find it until we begin to ask these questions.

For until we establish a national commitment, every bit as deep as that to our own security, to a basic set of goals for urban America, and then take the proper steps to implement those goals at all levels of government, the "crisis of the cities" will intensify.

And if the cities die, America will die with them.

LOS ANGELES MUSIC AND ART SCHOOL

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an organization in my congressional district which has joined in the efforts to combat juvenile delinquency and the school dropout problem in a rather unique way.

The Los Angeles Music and Art School, which I visited recently, is a nonprofit organization located in the heart of East Los Angeles—an area in which a large amount of poverty exists among the residents, who are overwhelmingly composed of Americans of Mexican descent.

In 1944 the school was founded by Pearle Irene Odell, has now reached an annual enrollment of 700 pupils, and has recently moved into a new $350,000 home which has facilities for 3,000 pupils.

Some pupils pay no tuition whatsoever, and the school is run on an entirely nonprofit basis. A staff of 40 of the finest and most dedicated professional teachers comprise the school staff.

The purpose of the program is not to develop professional musicians or artists, however, but to give the student a sense of achievement which encourages him, through proficiency in some facet of the arts, to complete his formal education and to become a taxpayer instead of a recipient of relief funds. Many former pupils have won scholarships to universities and have used music as an avocation.

According to school records, no pupil from this school has ever become a juvenile delinquent.

The Los Angeles Music and Art School receives no government assistance of any kind. The $100,000 annual budget of the school necessitates private fundraising efforts. The list of trustees, sponsors, and other officers of the school boasts a number of well-known responsible and concerned citizens from throughout the Los Angeles area.

TOP JOB FOR THE U.N.: THE LANGUAGE OF PEACE

HON. JAMES J. DELANEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, as most are aware, there are a great many obstacles which must be overcome before we can expect to have lasting universal peace among nations. According to a number of experts on international affairs, one of the major barriers to a peaceful world is a lack of understanding among peoples of the various countries.

In this regard, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an editorial in a recent issue of Columbia magazine which urges that member countries of the United Nations take action to adopt, in addition to their native tongue, a world language, such as Esperanto, for use as a medium of international communication.

Those who analyze the U.N., estimate that at least 10 percent of its budget is spent on translation and interpretation. It is anticipated that adoption of a universally acceptable second language would result in significant savings in this budget item, and at the same time greatly improve understanding among nations.

Under leave to extend my remarks, the article is inserted at this point in the RECORD:

TOP JOB FOR THE U.N.: THE LANGUAGE OF PEACE

World attention again is focused on the United Nations General Assembly as that international body of diplomats tries to cope with the many thorny problems that lie astride the path to universal peace.

The multitude of frictions between nations will be reflected in the speeches and deliberations: the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Vietnam war, the border tensions between the Soviet Union and Red China.

The General Assembly in its three-month session each year cannot solve all these complicated issues. At best it only can hope to "cool" them and keep them under control.

The fact is that most of these difficult problems cannot be resolved by any surface decision of the General Assembly because they are too deep-rooted and often imbedded in the outlook and state of mind of the peoples and nations involved. For instance the dispute between Israel and the Arab countries goes far beyond the question of territory and frontier demarcation. Basic to the issue is a deep-rooted attitude of intolerance and unacceptance.

The purpose of the United Nations, according to its charter, is to maintain international peace and security and cooperate in establishing political, economic and social conditions under which this task can be achieved. Its efforts so far have been devoted largely to snuffing out or at least controlling the smoldering fires of war. Under the preoccupation of constant threats to peace the international body has not been able to concentrate on promoting the political, economic and social conditions which foster and protect peace.

But it must be realized that genuine peace, at least among the democratic countries, is more a people-to-people than a nation-to-nation issue. This means that unless some understanding, sympathy and empathy exists between the peoples of different countries it is difficult and sometimes impossible for the politicians to steer a course which always veers to the side of peace. National sentiments often have more impact on a country's policy than the cool-headed assessments of its leaders.

Consequently one issue to which the United Nations should give serious attention is the matter of creating climates of understanding among the peoples of the world.

But before the world's peoples can understand and trust each other they must be able to communicate with each other. Significantly technological advance enables easy world-wide communication through the printed word, radio, telephone, motion pictures and even by live television. But the sad after effects of the tower of Babel still lock out people from each other. There are hundreds of languages spoken throughout the world. But very few people are gifted with enough tongues to speak to all others.

Here is an area in which the United Nations could use its prestige and influence to assure that at least the generations of the future could understand each other and thus greatly facilitate mutual trust and cooperation.

The United Nations has five official languages: Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish—all widely spoken. On the working level it has gotten down to three languages: English, French and Spanish.

For obvious political reasons none of these can be chosen as a United Nations or world language. Consequently an effort should be made under U.N. auspices to prepare an artificial language or decide on an existing one which would be acceptable to the peoples of the world as a second tongue, could be taught in schools and eventually would become a world-wide medium of communication.

A number of artificial languages have been elaborated by linguists with a view to simplicity and easy acceptance by the world's major language groups. Among these are Esperanto, Interlingua and Volapuk.

The last named was established by Johann Martin Schleyer, a priest of Konstanz, Baden, Germany, around 1880. Esperanto is the creation of Lazarus Ludwig Zamenhof, Russian oculist and philologist who died in 1917. It is a simplified, regular language. Supporters have held international congresses and gained recognition in some countries. In the early 1960s an estimated 8 million people could speak and use the language. Interlingua is the creation of the International Auxiliary Language Association and has been used at international medical and scientific meetings.

The important issue is not which language is chosen but that a language be chosen and promoted as a world tongue. The selection or creation of such a language by the international body and its promotion as a world-wide medium of communication well might prove the greatest single contribution that the U.N. can make to world peace.

To a large extent an atmosphere for war evolves because peoples are sealed off from each other and develop concepts of history and of events which are completely contradictory. Most frequently the block to outside ideas and information results from an unfortunate failure by people to understand any language but their own.

Both by correspondence and direct conversation COLUMBIA has been in touch with U Thant, secretary general of the United Nations, urging him to establish an international commission to study this question and have it prepare recommendations to be submitted to the U.N. General Assembly for united action.

Thant has expressed agreement with the idea but insists that the question of a universal language is such a highly emotional issue that it would be difficult for the office of the U.N. secretariat to introduce it. Thant's hope is that member nations can propose the idea for discussion.

However difficult the problem may be it seems obvious that someone, possibly in concert with other interested parties, should start the ball rolling. It is an effort that will not pay off for at least two generations—which means 40 to 50 years hence—but it is an initiative which is owed to the future of mankind.

Every person genuinely committed to peace should contact his top government officials and his nation's representative at the U.N. to encourage such a move. The latter can be contacted easily by writing to the country's mission at the United Nations Building, New York City, U.S.A.

Here is where you can lay a stone for the temple of peace for which future generations truly will bless you.

ELMER VON FELDT.

WORK-STUDY PLAN CUTS DROPOUT RATE

HON. F. BRADFORD MORSE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, a unique program that was adopted by the Lowell High School in Lowell, Mass., in 1965, is meeting with considerable success 4 years later. The creation of Lowell High School's placement director, Christopher Mitchell, the work experience program matches students to work situations which fall within their related fields of study and interest. The program has twin aims: First, it is designed to help provide financial assistance to students. But, equally important—and this is where the program differs from most so-called work-study programs—this work experience program augments the student's studies in his selected area of interest. Thus the student is learning both from study and from direct experience about what most probably will later become his career.

As far as I know, this is the only program of its type. Most work-study programs merely provide the student with financial assistance, putting him to work at whatever kind of job the school can find for him to do. This work experience program makes sure that the student spends his working time at a job which will contribute to his learning and which will form the basis for future employment.

A recent article in the Lowell Sun explains the program in more detail and I commend it to my colleagues attention. So that Members of Congress may read about this important new departure, I insert the Lowell Sun article at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Lowell (Mass.) Sun, Nov. 23, 1969]

UNIQUE PLAN CUTS DROPOUT RATE

LOWELL.—An outstanding and unique "Work Experience Program" orginated at Lowell High School in 1965 currently is meeting with sufficient success to draw the attention of the Mass. State Board of Education and that of school boards and administrators throughout the state.

In contrast to the Work-Study plans which now are and have been in vogue throughout New England high schools for a number of years, the brainchild of Lowell High's Placement Director Christopher Mitchell assumes that participating students are matched to work situations which fall within their related fields of study and interest. In the Work-Study program, pupils simply work at anything the school can find for them to do whether the work be relevant to their studies or totally unrelated. The Work-Study plan in most instances exists purely to allow financially-distressed pupils to obtain extra funds . . . period.

Mr. Mitchell's Lowell High Work Experience Program on the other hand is aimed not only at financial assistance for participating pupils but also toward augmenting studies in their selected fields of interest . . . fields in which they may and in most cases will seek employment upon graduation. Regarding graduation; the Miller plan has become an insurance against a student's giving up the educational battle and joining the ranks of luckless dropouts. This year alone, the Work Experience Program has succeeded in enticing 17 potential dropouts into finishing school . . . full four years of high school while at the same time, being gainfully employed two to six hours a day in fields analogous to their studies and future careers.

As far as is known, no other such program hinges upon a student's being required to accept employment in and to do preparatory study in some area related to his part-time employment. One of the most valuable assets accruing to a student participating in the program is the fact that he, upon graduation, can apply for employment in a specific field and not only have his high school diploma as a credential, but added weight of proving he has had at least a year's experience . . . and successful experience working in that specific field. Potential employers seldom hand such an applicant a "don't call me, I'll call you" brush-off.

The entire Work Experience Program is geared to the so-called "gray area" high school pupil. He or she is the one who is headed for his diploma (barring becoming a dropout) so generally educated he isn't truly equipped for any speciality in the economic world which is increasingly dominated by highly specialized industrial complexes.

One of the strengths of Work Experience Program lies in its recognition that, to succeed, the program must enlist the co-operation of industry in on-the-job training. Industry with alacrity. It has become just what the program prospectus stated industry must: The laboratory for training and experience for participating students.

Not only has the State Board of Education approved of and lauded the program, industries which thus far have lent their support are equally enthusiastic. The young people who are accepted into the program, and who are trained on the job by these industries are considered by their employers as well worth their earnings, which are the minimum going salary for the particular industrial task being trained for.

EPISCOPAL DIOCESE OF CALIFORNIA SUPPORTS TITLE II REPEAL

HON. SPARK M. MATSUNAGA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. Speaker, it is heartening to know that freedom-loving and justice-seeking concerned citizens throughout our country are joining in growing numbers in the effort to repeal title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950—the infamous Emergency Detention Act.

As an indication of this growing concern, I am pleased to report that on October 21, 1969, leaders of the Episcopal diocese of California adopted overwhelmingly a resolution calling for the repeal of the Emergency Detention Act.

This concentration camp authorization law, passed over President Truman's veto in 1950, provides that upon the President's declaration that a state of "internal security emergency" exists in this country, the U.S. Attorney General may apprehend and detain any person as to whom "there is a reasonable ground to believe that such person probably will engage in, or probably conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage and sabotage."

In supporting repeal of title II, the delegates at the 120th convention of the Episcopal diocese of California expressed the view that the type of detention authorized in the act as contrary to the legal principles of constitutional government.

In order that my colleagues may read the resolution in its entirely, I am privileged to submit it for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point:

RESOLUTION SUPPORTING REPEAL OF TITLE II, 1950 INTERNAL SECURITY ACT—EMERGENCY DETENTION ACT OF 1950

Whereas the Internal Security Act of 1950 provides, in Title II, for the Emergency Detention, under circumstances declared by the President to be an "Internal Security Emergency", of persons believed likely to engage in or to conspire with others to engage in acts of treason or of espionage, and

Whereas this type of detention without a hearing is contrary to the legal principles of constitutional government, and

Whereas the experience of this country with such a measure in the internment of Japanese-Americans in World War II produced results that were less than desirable, and

Whereas at the present time Senate and House bills supporting the Repeal of Title II (Emergency Detention Act of 1950) are pending in Congress, namely S. 1872 and H.R. 11825, now, therefore,

Be it resolved that the 120th Convention of the Episcopal Diocese of California support the Repeal of Title II (Emergency Detention Act of 1950), of the Internal Security Act of 1950, and

Be it further resolved that this Convention urge the people of the Diocese to write their legislators in support of the House and Senate bills (S. 1872 and H.R. 11825) to repeal the Emergency Detention Act of 1950.

Note: This resolution was passed by the Department of Social Relations on September 9, 1969 and by Diocesan Council on October 21, 1969.

TWO MARYLANDERS KILLED IN VIETNAM

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, WO John H. Whittington and Sp5c. Mark F. Tearl, two fine young men from Maryland, were killed recently in Vietnam. I wish to honor their memories by including the following article in the RECORD:

TWO MARYLANDERS, WHITTINGTON, TEARL, KILLED IN VIET ACTION

The Department of Defense yesterday announced that two Maryland Army men, one of them from Baltimore, were killed in "nonhostile" action in Vietnam.

The two men were:

WO 1 John H. Whittington, 21, 3044 Arunah avenue, in Baltimore.

Army Spec. 5 Mark F. Tearl, 22, 309 Oak street, in Edgewood, Maryland.

Mr. Whittington died Monday in an Army hospital in Yokohama, Japan. He was injured October 28 when the helicopter he was piloting crashed.

He had been in Vietnam six months, according to his mother, Mrs. John H. Whittington, of Baltimore.

CITY COLLEGE GRADUATE

He was a graduate of City College in 1966 and attended Morgan State College for a year before enlisting in the Army. While in high school, Mr. Whittington was on the wrestling and cross-country teams and played trumpet in the school band. He also was a member of Kappa Alpha Tau fraternity.

Funeral arrangements are incomplete at this time.

Mr. Whittington is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Whittington, of Baltimore; his paternal grandmother, Mrs. Clara Whittington, of Baltimore; his maternal grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Norman Spriggs, of Baltimore; and three brothers, Norman, Aaron and Alan Whittington, all living at home.

SECOND VIETNAM TOUR

Specialist Tearl died November 17 in Vietnam when the plane in which he was flying crashed.

He was finishing his second tour of duty in Vietnam and was scheduled to return to Edgewood next January 29.

Specialist Tearl was born in Wilmington, and moved with his family to Edgewood, Md., when he was a boy. He attended high school there and was active in football and baseball.

He also attended Harford Junior College briefly before enlisting in the Army.

Funeral arrangements are incomplete at this time.

Survivors include his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen J. Tearl, Sr., of Edgewood; a brother, Lawrence Tearl, who lives at home; and three step-brothers, Stephen J. Tearl, Jr., of Edgewood, Arthur Tearl, and James Tearl, of Wilmington.

SPEECH ON PATRIOTISM

Hon. PETER H. B. FRELINGHUYSEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, recently the history classes of the Washington Township School in my congressional district sponsored a school assembly program in observance of Veterans Day.

One of the student speakers during the program, Doris Schumacher, delivered a speech on patriotism and what it means to be an American.

I feel that Miss Schumacher's comments deserve the attention of my colleagues in the House and would like to include her comments in the RECORD at this time:

SPEECH ON PATRIOTISM

(By Doris Schumacher)

Many of us who have lived in a free America for a long period of time do not know what real patriotism is. Here is one story about a man who came from Europe. He had been persecuted in his own country during the war because of his race. After the war, he had been pushed about from one place to another. He had no home and no country, but he had a dream—somehow to reach America, the land of liberty. His son in America had finally located him and arranged for him to come to this country.

When the old man arrived, he was full of fear. He especially feared policemen because their uniforms resembled the soldiers who had ordered him about. At first he was afraid to talk freely, even to his own son! When he finally realized that he was not being spied upon, he whispered over and over again, "I want to be an American citizen". The man gradually lost his fear and gained the citizenship that he had once dreamed of.

Americans who have always lived in freedom sometimes take their precious liberty for granted. Stories like this one make you realize what a wonderful thing it is to be able to live our lives without fear, to speak freely, to take part in our government, to look in any man's eye as an equal, and just to be an American. You know that there are many people in the world today who do not have the liberties we have and who live more like slaves than like free men.

America was founded on the idea that human beings are entitled to live in freedom. We believe that our Democratic government and our way of life mean more liberty and happiness to more people than any system of government. You should be proud and thankful to be Americans.

Patriotism means unselfish service. Every American worthy of the name loves his country and respects the flag. But, Patriotsm is more than a feeling. It is willingness to serve America, to put the Nation's welfare above our own. Our history is filled with stories of American Patriots who devoted their lives to their country.

Everyone knows such loyal patriots as George Washington, Ben Franklin, and Abe Lincoln. But there are many other patriots who have not gained such world recognition as Horace Mann, who believed citizens should pay taxes in order to support public schools. This was a very unpopular view in his time. But his campaign proved successful and new and improved schools sprang up all over the country.

Today, many public schools have pictures of Horace Mann to honor him because he worked hard to give every American child a chance to get an education.

A more recent patriot is Martin Luther King, Jr. He led a new kind of struggle for American Negroes civil rights. He was a trained minister so he was an inspiring speaker and showed Negroes how to protest actively, but peacefully. He believed that American Negroes had just as many rights as white people and set out to prove his point. In 1964 Martin Luther King won world recognition for his leadership of American Negroes and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize and as most of you know he was assassinated in April of 1968.

An even more recent patriot is Private First Class John Lindaberry of Middle Valley who graduated from this school system not too many years ago. He fought for his country to restore peace and freedom in Viet Nam. He also gave his life so that the land he loved would remain free.

As I have given this speech many of you may have wondered, "What can I do in order to be a Patriot in my country?"

There are many things you can do, for example, you can display your flag on National holidays, be proud that you are an American, take part in Civic holidays, or just serve America by being good citizens day by day. And as you grow older you will have many more duties as a citizen like voting for the candidate of your choice, and as citizens of this great Democracy, you owe America your wholehearted loyalty and service!

A MINISTER SPEAKS FOR THE MAJORITY ON PROTEST

HON. LOUIS C. WYMAN

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, in a time when more and more members of the clergy address themselves to secular issues, often with compassionate rather than practical orientation, it is interesting to read a sermon cast in the latter context. Such a sermon was delivered on November 17, 1969, by Dr. Raymond J. Bean of the First Baptist Church in Manchester, N.H.

I commend Dr. Bean's sermon to the thoughtful consideration of all readers of the RECORD:

THE SILENT MAJORITY

(Sermon by Dr. Raymond J. Bean)

"I tell you, if these were silent, the very stones would cry out." These words from Jesus are usually a part of the Scripture lesson read on Palm Sunday but I think they are most applicable to our day. It is obvious, of course, that stones don't cry out literally. Like the expression concerning the trees clapping their hands, or the stars singing for joy, I interpret this passage in a poetic sense. When the Pharisees, the religious leaders of the day, urged Jesus to make His disciples remain silent instead of acclaiming Him as the Messiah, He refused and uttered those words concerning the stones crying out if they were silent.

It is dangerous to assume that there are always real parallels between our day and any that has preceded us and perhaps even more so to talk about our generation in terms of our Lord's disciples. But while I recognize the differences, that is exactly what I want to do this morning. I want to talk about the silent majority, to use a phrase employed recently by President Nixon and often quoted in the days since his speech.

I realize that there is no unanimous agreement as to just how our generation should be likened to the disciples of our Lord. Are His present-day followers to be found among the minority who are so much in the headlines by their protests? Or are they in the silent majority? Or, perhaps, in both?

It is a fact that a good many clergymen have been making the headlines by their protests. Sometimes these have taken form of a sermon or a written article, sometimes it has been by an act to illustrate how they feel. They have indicated, for example, that they are opposed to the American participation in the War in Vietnam. There is a sizeable organization that has been going for some years which seeks to enroll ministers and get them to speak out against our involvment there. They seem to be in general agreement that we made a mistake getting into Vietnam and it is better late than never to think about getting out. They seem certain that if we make some meaningful gesture toward peace, it is bound to be followed by a similar one from the other side. Some of these clergymen were among the leaders who wanted us to stop the bombing, arrange cease-fires and now insist that we ought to withdraw even though no concession is made by the enemy.

A few of these men have carried their protest beyond the pulpit and the printed page. They have been arrested for involvement in such things as obstructing the orderly process of the Selective Service system and even for attempting to destroy the records of those who are enrolled. One also hears of them, from time to time, as being among the people who oppose R.O.T.C. on our campuses and object to the military research being carried on in our universities.

It is quite hopeless for the average person to attempt to reach or reason with such individuals. They seem sure that their actions are motivated by the same purity that caused Jesus to drive the money changers out of the temple. They protest our involvement in a society that is all too ready to make war not peace and to hate rather than to love.

This is an area where I have not been silent and if you have, I sincerely hope you will be silent no longer. While I am willing to believe that such ministers and priests are sincere in what they believe, I cannot but feel they are terribly wrong and are being used by others. Of course we would expect a minister to be opposed to war, against the slaughter of women and children. But I think we have a right to expect that spiritual leaders have a realistic approach to the age in which we live.

It is all too obvious that bombing pauses and cease-fires have been a terrible mistake. When a minister, or someone else, points out that we have had over 40,000 killed in Vietnam already, I remind him that such a total would not exist if we had pursued the war differently, if we hadn't assumed that the other side would play according to our rules. Big-hearted America kept trying for peace and in the process enabled the enemy to increase his military potential at a terrible cost in American lives as well as South and North Vietnamese ones. How can we put any faith in the suggestion that we pull out of that unhappy land even if we have to do it alone? Does any serious student of world affairs honestly believe that would bring about peace? It would only result in a complete Communist takeover of South Vietnam with the execution or mutilation of the leadership of its villages and cities. This has taken place over and over again already—is there the slightest reason to think it would not take place again—especially when there was no chance of punishment for the murderers.

As I think of the situation in Vietnam, I am reminded of the parable of the Good Samaritan. There are those who would have us be like the priest and the Levite and turn away from a nation that is wounded and fighting for its life. No amount of oratory from the anti-war crowd will ever convince me that we do not have a duty as Christians, as Americans, to help preserve freedom in that part of the world. In so doing, we should realize, too, we may be making a great contribution toward its continuance everywhere. I have sometimes added this thought to the parable of the Good Samaritan: I think Jesus would have said that if the man who helped him had come along at the time the robbers were beating him, he ought to have done what he could to help him beat off the robbers—not merely wait to bind up his wounds later.

On the issue of Vietnam and the war, we have been silent too long. Those who have made the most noise are not in the majority. Let's stand up and be counted. Before we leave the subject of Vietnam let's remember that every demonstration in favor of abandoning the South Vietnamese, every speech in that direction by an American Senator makes the enemy feel a bit more confident that we will one day accept his terms for surrender and withdrawal. This has been made abundantly clear over and over again by the words which have come from Hanoi and its delegation at the so-called talks in Paris. It would be wrong to say that all those people who oppose President Nixon's policy are Communists or fellow-travellers but it is true to say that they are giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Another area in which the silent majority are concerned is that of our colleges and universities. If education was once classified as the 3 R's it is now nearer the 3 D's—Disruption, Disobedience, and Demonstration. In a day when it is being urged that academic barriers should be lowered, to permit more of minority groups who cannot meet rigid standards for admission to be permitted to enter our institutions of higher learning, some of us would prefer to begin with an emphasis on harder standards for those who are already there—harder in terms of things academic and also in matters of discipline. Those students who do not measure up to the requirements in terms of grades or conduct should be dismissed without any hesitation.

It goes without saying that I belong to the old school of thought. It is my conviction that the faculty should decide what is going to be taught and the trustees should administer the program of the institution. If the students don't like it they can go somewhere else or go to work. This is not to say that they shouldn't have a voice through a student senate or some similar organization: it is to insist that they should not have the veto power or make the rules on faculty appointments or course requirements.

Apparently students find it quite easy today to drop their books at any time and take part in any kind of demonstration in any part of the country. A moratorium march, or a demonstration is sufficient reason to forget classes and take part in doing one's thing. If those of use over 30, that segment of the population that the youngsters can't trust, don't quite understand the reason that prompts such action, it may be that we don't understand the vocabulary of the day. It is quite apparent that some words must have taken on completely opposite meanings to those they knew in our day as students. Take two examples that are common today:

The first of these is the expression "nonviolent". This term was common to Mahatma Ghandi and to Martin Luther King. For both of these men it meant just what it seems to suggest. As a result of Dr. King's work, there was organized the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Any similarity between the original and the modern meaning of the title would be impossible to discover. Students involved in this organization have had no hesitation about resorting to violence against anything and anyone who did not see things their way.

The second organization is the so-called Students for a Democratic Society. It's a lovely title but it certainly doesn't mean what it suggests. Undoubtedly many have been taken in by the assumption that this is a body that seeks to build a society in which the will of the majority will prevail but that rights of the minority will be respected. The Students for a Democratic Society seem only interested in trying to have their point of view prevail—no matter what has to be done to insure that end. What they want is just the opposite of a democratic society. The will of the minority—themselves—is the only one that matters to them. They have made this abundantly plain by their demonstrations and their refusal to permit any other point of view when it could be avoided.

Our universities are supposed to be the ground in which liberal spirits can grow but when a little group of students is able to prevent a distinguished lecturer from speaking, as occurred recently at Dartmouth, one has to wonder what has happened to the idea of "liberal" which really means "free".

What arrogance it is for college students to assume that they are the authority for what courses should be taught, what political decisions should be made by the government, what contracts should be undertaken by the great industrial concerns of the nation and so on and so on.

I have minister friends who defend these young men and women who do such things. They see them as the finest generation of young people, filled with a genuine concern for the good of the land. I see them as spoiled sons and daughters of a permissive generation which has gratified every whim and has too often given them everything except a sense of purpose and a willingness to do their part in improving society. They condemn the establishment that their parents have provided but they offer no constructive suggestions for making it better.

A third area in which the silent majority is concerned is that of law and order. Last Thursday night Vice President Spiro Agnew pointed out that the American public can be given a false impression of what is happening because we are so dependent on television and that industry is controlled by only a few individuals. A handful or two of men determine what will be seen and heard and thus present the news from their point of view. It may even be said that they make the news since many people will have only the impressions they received from the lighted box. This, he illustrated by reference to the Democratic National Convention in Chicago. The television cameras were focused on the police and their seemingly harsh treatment of young college-age youth who wanted to protest. Viewers saw clubs being swung and youths being herded off in arrests but the cameras never did record the provocations that brought on the police response. It was easy for some to assert that it was police brutality but the provocations have seldom if ever been equaled in American history.

But that incident was only one in a long series of attacks on law and order. We have seen the attitudes expressed as college students sought to take over the buildings on their campuses to try to enforce their opinion; in the sought-for confrontations with the police so the law enforcement officers would be charged with brutality. It is a simple sequence which is followed. People refuse to obey the officers and make it as difficult as possible for the men in blue to remove them. If they are required to use force or to drag them, they are accused of being brutal.

No more cheap and vicious attack on law and order has been witnessed than that which took place recently in a Chicago courtroom. Outside a crowd battled the police and inside the defendants sought to ridicule the American system of justice. Bobby Seale, 33, leader of the Black Panthers continued to refer to Judge Hoffman as a fascist and a pig. Some of the language he used was so bad the papers wouldn't print it. In spite of continued warnings from the judge, he kept on until he was bound and gagged. What a commentary on America, that a defendant has to be gagged to maintain sufficient quiet in the courtroom to enable the trial to take place! Seale was one of eight being tried for their part in inciting the riot in Chicago. Most Americans will not feel that Seale's sentence of 4 years is too heavy.

These are some of the areas in which the silent majority are vitally concerned. Others can be added but they are closely related to one or more of these. Gradually the silent majority is beginning to speak and to make its point of view felt. Why should it sit idly by and see its campuses destroyed by those who are less interested in learning than destroying?

Less concerned with the search for truth than in presenting their own juvenile viewpoint? Why should the American public continue to give vast sums to higher education if radical groups are permitted to disrupt the classes and take over the buildings? Why shouldn't we urge our judicial system from top to bottom to consider the rights of the majority as well as those few who want to destroy our way of life?

Who would you say are the Americans who most merit your respect this morning? Perhaps you would reply the astronauts on their moon journey. I appreciate their work and pray for their success. But my choice this morning would be two individuals: one an educator and the other a politician. Neither is the best known man in his field but, for me, at least, they speak the message that Americans need to hear and obey. The first is Dr. Hayakawa, the little Japanese American on the West Coast. He is a renowned authority in the field of literature and by accident he came to be the acting president of an institution where the radicals threatened its very existence. He brought to his task a courage and a common sense that the administrators of all our schools might well copy. The other man is vice-president Agnew. Vice-presidents traditionally live in the shadow of the president and this is to be expected. But Spiro Agnew is covered by a clear light rather than shadow as he speaks his mind on such acts as moratoriums and law and order. He is speaking for me and, I believe, for the great majority of Americans.

Yes, we have been silent too long. Let's have the courage to speak out on behalf of what we believe is right, the right way of life for Americans and for followers of our Lord. Jesus said "if these were silent, the very stones would cry out." I ask . . . if we are silent who else is going to cry out?"

INFORMING THE PUBLIC: TWO CASES IN POINT

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the recent anti-Vietnam war demonstrations in Washington illustrated the urgent necessity of alerting the public concerning radical and subversive involvement in causes and programs aimed at garnering large-scale public support. When the New Mobilization Committee To End the War in Vietnam was identified as having Trotskyites and Communists of various types in its leadership, a number of supporters had the good sense to disassociate themselves from the effort.

Fortunately, progress is being made in providing authoritative information for use by the public in this area. The much-maligned Subversive Activities Control Board has received from the Justice Department during this administration a total of 15 cases of individuals who have been identified as members of the national or local committees of the Communist Party, U.S.A. The Board, a quasi-judicial Federal agency, will hold public hearings in which these individuals have the right to cross-examine Government witnesses and to dispute the evidence presented. If the Board so judges, the individuals will be declared members of the CPUSA, and the public record will be available for the information of the public. Granted, 15 cases is but a modest beginning, but it is hoped that this listing will include organizations in the near future.

In all fairness it must be stressed that the SACB is not a self-starter agency, but is wholly dependent on the Justice Department for the cases which it receives. In the past unjustified criticism has been leveled at the Board for inaction when the Justice Department should have been the target of the protests. While the 15 cases cited above leave much to be desired, the determination to use the Board in the capacity for which it was created is heartening.

Earlier this year added publicity accompanied the Board's activities when Otto F. Otepka, the former security officer at the State Department, was appointed as one of its Commissioners. It will be remembered that his monumental fight with State extended over a 5-year period in which bureaucratic skullduggery and chicanery reached an all-time low. Fortunately for the record, the scheming, malicious efforts on one powerful Federal department to break a solitary Government official is spelled out in "The Ordeal of Otto Otepka" by William J. Gill, former UPI correspondent and coauthor of "Suite 3505: The Story of the Draft Goldwater Movement."

Like the press coverage given the Otto Otepka case itself by some segments of the communications media, the publication of this important account has been a well-kept secret—the book reviewers have not exactly rushed to appraise its contents for the public.

The publication, "Best Sellers," a semimonthly review of current books, carried an objective appraisal of the Gill book in its November 15 issue. Published by the University of Scranton at Scranton, Pa., "Best Sellers" first opened shop in 1941. The review of the Otepka case by Robert B. Nordberg, professor of education at Marquete University is far from being totally favorable but does not prevent the reviewer from making this significant comment:

> Yet, the book leaves one sorely troubled. It is an important document, deserving the attention of every American citizen. No library should be without it. (I have not said that often.)

At this point in the RECORD I include the Nordberg review of "The Ordeal of Otto Otepka," followed by an item of the Baltimore Sun of November 21 reporting on the latest cases forwarded to the Subversive Activities Control Board by the Justice Department:

THE ORDEAL OF OTTO OTEPKA

(Gill, William, J. Arlington House, Oct. 18, 1969. 505 p. $8.00 (1))

Walt W. Rostow was said by President Johnson to have the most important job in the White House next to the President's. Yet, he had thrice been denied security clearance because of a long history of close association with Soviet espionage agents, a negative CIA evaluation of him, and a judgment by Air Force intelligence that he was a security risk. So we read in this book by a free-lance writer, formerly a correspondent for UPI and a contributor to many well known publications. Mr. Gill is co-author of "Suite 3505: The Story of the Draft Goldwater Movement."

The book is about Otto Otepka, former Deputy Director of the State Department's Office of Security, who was subjected to an almost incredible campaign of frame-up, lies, and cover-ups. Why? Because he tried to enforce the laws and regulations on security that he was paid to enforce. Mr. Gill's purpose, obviously, is to acquaint the public with this incredible series of events. He documents a 1960 meeting of Dean Rusk, Robert Kennedy, and Otepka, at which Otepka was (in effect) asked to clear the thrice-rejected Rostow and declined to do so, or at least insisted on an adequate review. Henceforth, it seems, the New Frontier was out to get Otepka, although it took them years to do so. President Nixon appointed Otepka to the Subversive Activities Control Board, a vindication but not of the sort he had been led to expect.

What is William Gill saying? That Otepka was harassed and persecuted shamefully? He makes a convincing case for that. That Dean Rusk was an active if invisible participant in what was done? He makes a case for that, too. That the security system all but crumbled under Kennedy and Johnson, with very serious results for the national interest? He also makes that case. But, he hints at more. Is he also saying that Dean Rusk and Walt Rostow were conscious agents of the Communist conspiracy? He is much closer to affirming it than to denying it. He even seems to suggest that John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson while basically loyal to the United States, operated under the delusion that the Soviet and Chinese leaders were moderate, rational creatures, and thus did incalculable harm to freedom throughout the world.

At times, Mr. Gill is quite convincing. Unfortunately, his work is marred by two serious flaws. First, he often uses prejudicial language, in exactly the same way that infuriates him when his adversaries do it. Second, he seems unable to be objective, at least on this subject. With very few exceptions, his Washington is divided into saints (Otepka and his supporters) and devils. He is quick to impute the darkest motivation to those who were in any way against Otepka. If one of them did not see military service, for example, it could only be because he "ducked out" of it. There is a one-sidedness to the book. One feels that he cannot possibly know the truth until somebody has presented another side of the story. This is a polemic, not a history. Otepka probably recognizes that since he is presented as a moderate, cautious man. His one fault, Gill complains, is a stubborn refusal to call a spade a spade. Perhaps it is more nearly the case that Mr. Gill is inclined to call it a steam-shovel.

Yet, the book leaves one sorely troubled. It is an important document deserving the attention of every American citizen. No library should be without it. (I have not said that often.) The shameless cynicism of Joseph McCarthy in exploiting the Communist issue seems to have had the ironic result of making many people in very high places falsely conclude that the issue is something of a joke, despite Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Kim Philby, etc. It is too bad that Mr. Gill leans to over-statement and one-sidedness, because that weakens his presentation of what is undoubtedly one of the major developments of the 1960's. The enormity of what happened helps one to excuse him for going overboard here and there. Read it, by all means! (69–16946)

MITCHELL LABELS 10 PERSONS REDS—ASKS SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES CONTROL BOARD RULING

WASHINGTON, November 20.—John N. Mitchell, the Attorney General, asked the Subversive Activities Control Board today to declare 10 persons from 4 states members of the Communist party.

Such a finding by the board carries no penalty, however, and may be appealed to the courts.

Mr. Mitchell identified all the individuals as members of national or local committees of the Communist party.

They included: A. George Dawson, of Los Angeles, a national committee member; Leo Baefsky, of Monterey Park, Calif., a southern California district committee member; Shirley Kessler, of Monterey Park, of the same unit; Hans Richard Leuchtag and his wife, Alice, Indianapolis, of the Indiana Communist party; Ira Cohen, Gary, Indiana Communist party; James Rufus Fisher, of Wilkinson, Pa., Western Pennsylvania Communist party; Joseph Carl Fabrizio, Jr., Freedom, Pa., Western Pennsylvania unit; Jo Anne Elaine Gerber, Pittsburgh, 1968 educational director of the Western Pennsylvania Youth Club, and Frank I. Kinces, Philadelphia, Eastern Pennsylvania Communists party.

The board now must hold public hearings, after which an order could be issued declaring persons to be party members.

OUTSTANDING SCOUT GETS GOD AND COUNTRY AWARD

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, Richard E. Snyder, a fine young man from Maryland, was recently awarded the God and Country Award. I wish to honor his achievement by including the following article in the RECORD:

OUTSTANDING SCOUT GETS GOD AND COUNTRY AWARD

Sunday, November 23, meant further achievement for Richard E. Snyder Jr., when presented his God and Country Award during church service by Rev. Julian A. Tavenner at the Havre de Grace United Methodist Church.

Scouts and Leaders from Boy Scout Troop No. 967 of the Havre de Grace United Methodist Church turned out in uniform to honor and witness his receiving the award.

One of the 12 Scout Law states "A Scout Is Reverent." All Scouts show this by being faithful in their religious duties, but some go further and give special service to their Church or Synagogue. This may qualify them for a Religious award. Such an award is not a Scouting award. It is conferred on the Scout by his Religious Leader. Working toward this goal for the past year and 10 months with Rev. Tavenner, Richard Jr. adds this achievement to his Scouting career. He is 16 years old, a Junior in high school taking data processing along with the academic course in preparation for college. He likes dramatics as well as all Scouting activities.

Having reached Eagle over a year ago, he didn't stop earning rank as he went on to earn the Bronze Palm, Gold Palm, and presently has earned Silver over Bronze Palm with earning 41 Merit Badges (almost twice needed for Eagle). Having held an officer's position in almost every phase over the past 5½ years as a Boy Scout (Asst. Patrol Leader, Patrol Leader, Troop Scribe, Troop Quartermaster, Troop Librarian, Asst. Senior Patrol Leader, Instructor), he is currently serving as Jr. Asst. Scoutmaster. He served as Den Chief with Cubs for a year, and has served in numerous community activities. He served as staff discussion leader in the fall a year ago, and this fall as leader of the Staff Scouts for Junior Leader Training for Harford District. He is an active Brotherhood member of the "Order of the Arrow." He was one of the three delegates and discussion leader for the National Order of the Arrow conference at Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., during Aug. 1969 among 4,500 Arrow-members from all over the U.S.A. that meet every other year. He has earned, in addition to all Rank awards in Scouting, the 50-miler award, Historic Trails award, Scout Lifeguard, 2-mile Swim, Interpreter's (spanish, which he is taking 3rd year of in school) stripe. He has been nominated as a candidate for "Report to the Nation" during February, 1970.

He has been a member of the Havre de Grace United Methodist Church for several years, and is a youth representative member of the Church board. He served as President of the United Methodist Youth fellowship (with over 60 members) during 1968–69 year, and is presently serving as Chairman of Worship.

THE VIETCONG IS LOSING ITS GRIP

HON. CHARLES E. CHAMBERLAIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, as we consider today House Resolution 613, affirming the support of the House of Representatives for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, I call the attention of my colleagues to two very timely and related articles appearing in the December 1969 issue of the Reader's Digest.

The first is a fresh assessment of the position of the Vietcong by the well-known columnist, Joseph Alsop, who recently completed his 18th journey through Vietnam since 1953. His report, which contains much encouraging news, concludes as follows:

The real key to the problem . . . is nothing more or less than the degree of resolution that will be shown by the President and the people who chose him as their leader. For the first time, it can be said with some assurance that if we want an honorable peace, we can get it by being resolute, and without over-long delays. But shall we? Who can tell?

At this point I include Mr. Alsop's article, "The Vietcong is Losing Its Grip", together with a succinct and reflective Reader's Digest editorial entitled, "Patience!":

THE VIETCONG IS LOSING ITS GRIP

(By Joseph Alsop)

(NOTE.—Since World War II, when he served under Gen. Claire Chennault in the 14th Air Force in China, Joseph Alsop has covered every war of serious interest to the United States and its allies, ranging from Korea and Malaya to the Middle East. He has visited Vietnam, always for extended periods, no fewer than 18 times, so that he knows the provinces and the people, both Americans and South Vietnamese, with real intimacy. Very few reporters have the background to make the kind of before-and-after comparison that Alsop has equipped himself to make.)

Before many months pass, there should be mighty few communist guerrillas, as well as mighty few people under Vietcong control, in the war against the VC in South Vietnam. The unreported process that is producing this dramatic and unforeseen result is the chief discovery that I made in Vietnam this September. It is an important discovery. For the progressive erosion of the whole Vietcong structure in South Vietnam—which is really what is happening—is bound to aid President Nixon greatly in his patient quest for an honorable peace.

It is simplest to begin with the way I made this discovery, vastly to my own surprise. This was my 18th visit to Vietnam since 1953. I spent most of my long trip going from district to district, quite literally from the DMZ to the Point of Ca Mau, always trying to find out what was happening in the crucial rice-roots war.

I specify the rice-roots war because two quite different, though related, wars are in fact being fought simultaneously in South Vietnam.

There is the big-unit war, in which the ARVN (South Vietnamese) and American and other allied troops fight mostly against North Vietnamese (NVA) battalions and regiments. And there is the rice-roots war, in which the true VC—the native communist South Vietnamese who serve as hamlet or village guerrillas, or as soldiers in the local-force companies—are the enemy. In this war the main burden is carried by the South Vietnamese "territorial" forces: the little Regional Force companies and Popular Force platoons, and the thousands upon thousands of villagers who have now joined the People's Self Defense Force.

Populated districts, rather than remote and empty base areas, are the scene of the rice-roots war, and district chiefs are in effect the frontline commanders. Since they are fighting the VC around the clock (and hardest of all, at night), the district chiefs and their American advisers know their enemy rather intimately.

THE RICE-ROOTS WAR

To start getting a feel of the countryside I first visited Cu Chi district, in Hau Nghia province. For many years Cu Chi had been celebrated as a VC mini-fortress. The able and courageous South Vietnamese district chief, Maj. Nguyen Xuan Sanh, had administered this little patch of rural Vietnam, with its tens of thousands of hardworking people, for more than a year and a half. I asked him for a before-and-after comparison.

"When I came here," Major Sanh answered, "it was very different." In this one district, the VC had at its command the Cu Chi local-force battalion, plus four local-force companies, plus over-strength guerrilla platoons in every village, plus guerrilla squads in almost every hamlet—well above 800 fighting men, altogether. They fought hard, too. And although officially it was my district the VC party secretary for the district controlled most of Cu Chi."

And now? The answer was eye-opening. First, Major Sanh ticked off the units he no longer had to fight, beginning with the Cu Chi battalion. Since 1963 this had been a famously tough VC outfit, but in only seven weeks of 1968, it had lost four successive battalion commanders! The same hard fighting had also transformed the battalion's basic character; for there were no more recruits from the district to fill the terrible gaps in the ranks, and North Vietnamese infiltrators had to be used as replacements. Meanwhile, the North Vietnamese big units in the province were in just as much trouble. In the end, this battered VC battalion, so long deep-rooted in the soil of Cu Chi, was called out of the district to strengthen the 268th NVA Regiment.

For the same harsh reasons—heavy losses and near-zero recruitment—Cu Chi's four local-force companies had also dwindled, until only two were left. "And those two companies, with a combined strength of about 40 men, are more like platoons," said Major Sanh's American adviser, with marked satisfaction. Next, to my astonishment, the major and his adviser all but began counting the remaining VC in Cu Chi on their fingers. After knowingly reviewing the different situations in their villages and hamlets, they put the number of surviving guerrillas at about two dozen. In sum, this district—where only 18 months earlier the VC had some 800 fighting men—no longer contained more than a hunted remnant of around 60 armed VC. Most important of all, and in consequence, effective control of Cu Chi had naturally passed from the VC party secretary to Major Sanh.

The lesson I learned in Cu Chi suggested that the whole VC structure in Vietnam must be in deep trouble. This is a complex structure, exactly comparable to a clandestine government, with all the usual departments that any government must have. Yet its real strength in any district or province can always be measured with considerable accuracy by the numbers of armed VC. A VC village chief in refuge in deep jungle cannot function if he has no guerrillas to enforce his orders in his former village; and a province secretary hiding in the mountains, if he has no armed men to impose his will in the province's populated areas, is finished. All over South Vietnam, therefore, I asked the people in the districts, "How many armed VC do you still have to fight?" And what I learned in this manner is bad news for Hanoi—good news for our side.

NEW-FOUND PEACE

Our side should know, for example, that there are now whole districts, even whole provinces, where the VC structure has been entirely uprooted. These are still exceptional, but they are profoundly exciting. For in huge areas of this beautiful country, the industrious, long-enduring people are enjoying real peace for the first time in many years. The fertile coastal strip, which supports the entire population of Thua Thien and Quang Tri provinces, is a good example.

Except in two fringe districts still directly threatened by North Vietnamese troops, there are virtually no ARVN or U.S. forces in the long, rich strip. The regular troops are not there any longer because there is no enemy there any longer. The "territorial" self-defense troops stand guard, of course, against any attempted reinfiltration by the few hundred surviving VC, who have taken refuge in the mountains over toward the Laotian border.

Three of the less exposed districts of Thua Thien province are even being given a civilian administration—another first in Vietnam since the war started! And everywhere along the coastal strip, the people are tilling fields long fallow, heaping up new dikes to keep the salty sea tides from the land, rebuilding schoolhouses and roads and markets, and generally resuming the busy, cheerful, normal life of rural Vietnam in peacetime.

For the present, to be sure, this wonderful, new-found peace of the million people in this area squarely depends on the continuing presence of U.S. and ARVN troops, to the west and north. From base areas in Laos, and from above the DMZ, no fewer than ten North Vietnamese regiments keep trying to press into the two provinces. If they ever manage to break through the protective screen of U.S. and ARVN troops, these Northern regiments will carry fire and sword all up and down the coastal strip. This is therefore something that President Nixon has to think about, when he ponders thinning the protective screen by further U.S. troops withdrawals. But what Hanoi has to think about is the effective elimination of just about the whole VC structure in Thua Thien and Quang Tri.

Hanoi has other unpleasant things to think about. Take Hau Nghia province, where my district-hopping began. In 1965, this was the province with the largest number of armed VC in the whole of Vietnam—more than 10,000 of them. But in the last year and a half, the same things that happened in Cu Chi have also happened in the other districts of Hau Nghia, so the total of armed VC in the whole province has dropped to no more than 400. You cannot say that the VC structure has been absolutely uprooted: this wretched, always dwindling remnant still hangs on precariously in the province's populated areas. There is no peace in Hau Nghia, either, because North Vietnamese big units, like the 268th Regiment, are also hanging on precariously. But, as their captured documents tell us, the condition of the VC structure in Hau Nghia is now dreadful to contemplate. And there are a good many other provinces, such as Binh Duong, also in III Corps, or Go Cong, in the Delta, where the VC structure is in the same grave plight.

THE DAYS ARE NUMBERED

Finally, there is a third kind of situation, which I found in the provinces of lower I Corps, in big Binh Dinh province in II Corps, and in the VC's stronghold provinces in the Delta. In these places the VC's rice-roots strength, though still considerable, is visibly and rather rapidly declining. Everywhere the VC guerrillas and local-force soldiers are being killed or captured, most often by the government's territorial forces. In increasing numbers they are also defecting to the government, or fading into the landscape. And, everywhere, the VC recruiters are getting at best only one replacement—most often a woman or a little boy—for every three guerrillas they lose. Any structure suffering heavy and continuous losses, and unable to replace more than one loss in three, is obviously in trouble.

When I got back to Saigon from a trip to lower I Corps, I also got a crude numerical measurement of the erosion of the VC in the areas where they are strongest. Lower I Corps is one of these areas. The numbers of armed VC are still formidable but dropping conspicuously. I told what I had found to one of the most intelligent—and pessimistic—Americans in Vietnam.

"I've looked into all the facts," said my friend, glumly. (And no one had a better opportunity to know the rice-roots facts!) "You have to be careful not to exaggerate. After all, the VC in those provinces have lost only 14 percent of their strength since the end of May, although I admit that this rate of loss is likely to continue, and may even rise."

I answered, reasonably I think, that if I had lost 14 percent of all my worldly goods in three months, and were told I would go on losing indefinitely at the same rate, I should have to prepare for near bankruptcy before very long. That, so far as I can see, is what now lies ahead for the VC structure throughout South Vietnam. Even in those provinces where the VC as yet retain real strength, their days are numbered, unless President Nixon is finally driven to throw in the sponge.

In the big-unit war, one must always bear in mind, Hanoi has long been using North Vietnamese rather than VC as cannon fodder. Yet the new erosion of the VC structure, with its far-reaching and inevitable effects on the rice-roots war, has enormous significance; and it is important to know how it began to happen, and why.

The real turning point was the Tet offensive of 1968. Shockingly misreported in this country, Tet was in fact a disaster for Hanoi and a double disaster for the VC. The ablest Southern leaders of the VC, and the most seasoned of their soldiers, fell in vast numbers. And the ruthless brutality of the Tet attacks caused the fence-sitting masses in the cities and the countryside to turn bitterly against the VC.

After Tet, new, much more effective methods of government control of the countryside were adopted—which deserve a whole separate report. This control has now been enormously extended, and is still extending. It is crowding the VC out of more and more hamlets and villages, radically reducing the old VC recruiting base, and each month causing thousands of the more faint-hearted VC to go over the hill as defectors.

THE BIG-UNIT WAR

If the tide is turning in the rice-roots war, what of the big-unit war—the war fought with North Vietnamese troops in South Vietnam?

First, let's take a look at the massive numbers of troops that Hanoi has in fact sent to South Vietnam. This movement has not been infiltration so much as continuous invasion—and on a scale that most people will find hard to credit.

Imagine the United States sending off to a foreign war, in a single year and with little hope of return, all the able-bodied young Americans who reached draft age in 1965, 1966 and 1967. It is not easy to imagine, thank God, because we have never done anything like that. Yet that is closely comparable to what Hanoi did in 1968. To provide manpower for the Tet offensive and its two sequels, Hanoi in truth sent southward in that one year just under 350,000 men—despite the fact that in North Vietnam only about 125,000 able-bodied youths annually reach military age.

And this was merely the climax of a long process. At least 400,000 had already been sent off to the war in the South before the year of Tet began. Hence, when the Hanoi war planners studied their balance sheets after the dire failure of the third of the 1968 "victory" offensives, the first item on the debit side was the sacrifice of six entire "year classes" of North Vietnamese young men!

Any government not completely irrational would be inclined to stop, look and listen, after throwing so many of its young men down the drain to no good military purpose. And this is just what Hanoi did. The numbers being sent off to the South were sharply cut back, from an average of 29,000 a month in 1968, to 10,000 a month in the first six months of 1969, and to only about 3500 a month since July. The cutback was not a "signal" but a practical response to the cruel pressure of hard facts; and one may be sure that the cutback was a belated victory for those in the Hanoi Politbureau who have always advocated "protracted war," against the advocates of the much more costly "big-unit" war.

THE STRATEGY PARALLEL

Protracted war is the Hanoi theorists' phrase for classical guerrilla war, fought with small units and with minimal losses. After Hanoi's frightful and fruitless manpower losses in the 1968 offensives, it was only natural for its advocates to get their innings at last. No doubt they were aided, too, by the argument that American public opinion would not stand for a war indefinitely protracted. And their new policy could perhaps work, if the people President Nixon calls the "bug-outs" finally prevail in this country.

But if the President means what he has rather grimly said, about refusing to become "the first President of the United States to lose a war," he can take comfort from the fact that reversion to protracted war, which might have worked well in 1965, is working horribly badly in 1969. Four years ago, the Saigon government and army had had no time to recover from the near-total disintegration of the whole political-administrative apparatus that followed the death of President Ngo Dinh Diem. Meanwhile, the VC firmly controlled vast areas of the countryside; they had large reserves of manpower, and everywhere possessed the high morale that the South Vietnamese army then lacked.

By the beginning of this year, in contrast, the Saigon government and army had been strengthened in many ways; the huge fence-sitting element of the masses had been decisively turned against the VC; the VC structure and manpower reserves had also been severely strained. Furthermore, the whole VC structure had come to depend heavily on big-unit support. From 1966 onward, in fact, there was a kind of rough division of responsibilities: while the VC structure controlled as much of the countryside as possible, the North Vietnamese in the big units bore the main brunt of the fighting. In these greatly changed circumstances, Hanoi then began to starve the big units of replacements. The support for the VC structure was therefore drastically weakened; and the erosion of that structure thereupon became serious.

This is terribly bad news for Hanoi, because the protracted war that Hanoi is now trying to fight is, basically, guerrilla war; and you cannot indefinitely protract a guerrilla war if the number of guerrillas is continuously shrinking at a heavy rate. The rate of loss is such that, unless premature American troop withdrawals change the whole picture, the VC structure can be in ruins in most of South Vietnam by next spring. This constitutes a time problem for Hanoi, every bit as grave as the time problem President Nixon confronts because of American impatience to get the war over with.

Indeed, if you think about it, Hanoi's way of dealing with the war in South Vietnam has always oddly paralleled Washington's way of dealing with it. Both governments began in a small way, Hanoi aiding the VC, Washington aiding Saigon. Before U.S. intervention, Hanoi had in fact sent only two North Vietnamese divisions to the South, and the Hanoi Politbureau—which also controls the VC, of course—was counting on winning all of South Vietnam for this small investment of Northern manpower. Both governments then put in more and more troops, although, proportionately, the American effort was trifling.

For remember that the North Vietnamese sent off to the war in the South numbered close to 750,000 men by the end of 1968. Proportionately, because Vietnam is a small country, this figure is actually equivalent to about ten million Americans! Yet few of these poor North Vietnamese conscripts will ever come home again; and none at all have been sent home as yet, except for tragic thousands of hopeless cripples.

Both governments also responded in parallel to the bloody climax of the year of Tet. President Nixon's graduated withdrawal program is comparable to the Hanoi Politbureau's somewhat earlier decision to reduce greatly the flow of North Vietnamese troops to the South, and thus to transfer much more of the burden to the VC. To complete the parallel, picture what would have happened to the American effort in Vietnam if the Saigon government and army had fulfilled Hanoi's best hopes by collapsing under the impact of the 1968 offensives. You then get a rough idea of how unmanageable Hanoi's problems will be, if the erosion of the VC structure continues to the point of final breakdown all over South Vietnam.

IN SEARCH OF AN END

So we come back to the question: What can Hanoi do about it? I believe (or perhaps I should say, I hope with good reason) that we can rule out any prolonged return to the former dreadful level of expenditure of North Vietnamese manpower. If Ho Chi Minh were still alive, this would be less easy to rule out. But a viciously divided Politbureau, including at least four rivals for supreme power, and without the final arbiter of all decisions, is surely unlikely to be able to agree on resuming the appalling yearly sacrifice of three whole year classes of men of fighting age.

For the same reasons, however, it seems almost equally unlikely that this divided Politbureau will be able to agree on open admission of defeat. Seriously negotiating in Paris, on the basis of President Nixon's minimum condition of self-determination for the South Vietnamese, would really amount to that kind of open admission.

All the same, one must be careful to remember the difference between the two kinds of war, the Vietcong rice-roots war and the North Vietnamese big-unit war, that are now going on in Vietnam.

Unless—and it is an important unless—President Nixon withdraws too many U.S. troops too soon, it is hard to see anything Hanoi can do to avoid effective defeat for the Vietcong in the rice-roots war in the next six to ten months. What is happening at the rice-roots cannot even be much slowed down, in fact, except by the kind of North Vietnamese big-unit effort that would require Hanoi to invest manpower as ruthlessly as in 1968.

On the other hand, the Hanoi leaders are remarkably wily, obstinate and resilient. They can still use all sorts of tactics of delay to keep the big-unit war going at a low level, in order to wear out American patience. They can also assault American public opinion politically, by proposing the kind of fake cease fire that would permit massive North Vietnamese re-invasion of the South after American withdrawal. Or they can assault our public opinion even more directly, by mounting one or more spasm offensives—relatively low in cost, not really aimed to achieve solid military results, but sure, nonetheless, to increase casualty rates.

In sum, victory in the rice-roots war against the VC, which can now be hoped for, should in the end (but only in the end) be decisive, because, in the long run, it will create unmanageable problems for Hanoi. Yet most of the real fighting in Vietnam, above the rice-roots level, has long been done by Hanoi's North Vietnamese troops; and Hanoi still has various ways to drag out this other war, or even to change its character. At the moment, for instance, two of the North Vietnamese divisions that formerly threatened III Corps from Cambodian bases are apparently moving into the Delta, where there are no longer any U.S. troops.

Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, the brilliant U.S. commander in Vietnam, is reportedly confident that the resulting test between South Vietnamese and North Vietnamese big units will turn out very well indeed. Pray God he is as correct this time as he has been in the past; but the fortunes of war are never exactly predictable.

In any case, however, the real key to the problem in Hanoi is nothing more nor less than the degree of resolution that will be shown by the President and the people who chose him as their leader. For the first time, it can be said with some assurance that if we want an honorable peace, we can get it by being resolute, and without over-long delays. But shall we? Who can tell?

PATIENCE!

For nearly five long years our nation has been immersed in a bloody, baffling and undeclared war 12,000 miles from our shores. The immediate aim of the United States in this effort is to prevent the enforced communist domination of a people who ask only to be allowed to live in freedom. Seldom if ever in our history have we endured a more frustrating and traumatic experience.

Into the deltas and jungles of South Vietnam we have poured some 95 billions of dollars of our treasure. We have seen nearly 40,000 of our young men go to their graves. The American objective in this war has been clear and carefully limited. We seek no territory. We seek only to give the people of South Vietnam an opportunity to determine their own destiny. Our immutable bedrock position is that the communist enslavement of the nations of Southeast Asia must stop at the 17th parallel.

Four American Presidents have committed our nation to this position—in the belief that the defense of South Vietnam is a defense not only of one country but of all of Asia.

Despite the dimensions of the threat, the United States has conducted the most restrained war that any nation has ever fought. Now, at last, we begin to see the successful end to our efforts. The American and South Vietnamese troops, as well as the troops of other nations who have fought, bled and died in this cause, have brought the war to a point where it is impossible for the enemy to win it by force of arms.

As the following article by Joseph Alsop points out, the enemy is in serious trouble.

The Vietcong guerrillas control less and less of the countryside, and the North Vietnamese armies are feeling the heavy drain on their manpower. That the United States is able to order the withdrawal of 60,000 troops from Vietnam—with more to come—shows that our position is increasingly strong. The leaders of the communist world know that time is no longer on their side.

Why, then, do they continue to hold out? Where do they look for hope of victory? As they survey the scene of battle, the North Vietnamese leaders and their Soviet and Chinese allies do not yet despair, for they know there still remains one resource that can tip the scale in their favor.

The enemy's greatest hopes lie in the division that he has created in public opinion in the United States. This is why the enemy fights on. This is why the Soviet Union has continued to support him in Vietnam. This is why Hanoi holds out in Paris. This is why the enemy refuses concession after concession offered him at the conference table. He clings to the belief that the American patience will run out, that sooner or later the American people will persuade their President to run up the white flag of ignominious surrender.

This is the hope that keeps the enemy going. Were it not for this, the war would have ended before this. No one will ever know how many American boys have gone to their death because the enemy holds on, watching for signs that American resolve is weakening.

To the enemy the constant outcries in the United States must sound like so many bombs being dropped against our troops in South Vietnam. The anti-war speeches in Congress, the campus protests from students and faculty, the barrage of defeatist editorials in some of the most powerful newspapers, these are worth regiments and whole divisions to the enemy. He reads his newspaper, hears the broadcasts, rubs his hands and once more refuses to talk in Paris, refuses to call his invaders back from South Vietnam.

Where it not for his belief that the American patience will crack, the enemy would lose his reason to keep on fighting. It is a monstrous irony that the louder the protest is raised against the war, the longer the war will continue.

Most of those who oppose the war sincerely believe that they are somehow helping to save the United States from error. But against that minority belief must be weighed the cost to the nation. For these are the voices that are listened to in Hanoi—and these are the voices that prolong the months of battle. In the interests of peace, they should now be lowered.

The President of the United States has said that he will not be shaken from his resolve to honor our nation's commitment—and our dead—in Vietnam. In this resolve, he is neither blind nor willful. No matter how loud the clamor from critics in Congress becomes, he will hold his course. He knows the nature of the enemy, the nature of the enemy's designs in Asia and the world. Most of all, he knows the consequences of a craven act of surrender on our part in South Vietnam. The results would haunt us for years to come.

The first consequence would be a blood bath for our friends—the certain slaughter of tens of thousands of South Vietnamese whose only mistake was to have trusted the word and will of the United States. The communists would deal swiftly and unmercifully with these as they butchered their way to power. Lest there be any doubt about this, we have only to look at what happened in Hue, where several thousand South Vietnamese were shot or buried alive during the brief communist occupation of the city during the 1968 Tet offensive.

The next to suffer from our betrayal would be the nearby countries of Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Malaysia. They could not hope to remain free once the South Vietnamese roadblock to communism had been removed. The communist domination of Southeast Asia would shake countries even farther away—such as Indonesia, India, Japan.

Vietnam has come to be a crisis point. If America and its allies in South Vietnam were to fail, the cause of freedom would fail and the area of freedom would be diminished. The lesson would be clear for all to read. Defeat lies in store for those who put their trust in the United States. Freedom is a dead dream; the future belongs to the enslaver.

If the world were to witness such a defeat, the United States, leader of the free world, overnight would lose the respect of the world and would lose its self-respect. In a test of will, the United States would have been found wanting. In a test of conscience, the United States would have been found to have no conscience. In a test of strength, the United States would have been found to have not strength enough.

Did 39,000 American boys die for this? Has America forgotten the stuff it is made of, its purpose in the world?

If one listened only to the cries of those who urge peace at any price, one would have cause to question as Hanoi must question—the essential fiber of this nation. But the cries for a dishonorable end to the war do not reflect the will of anything like the majority of the American people. Nor do many of those who urge withdrawal really mean that they would accept peace on the enemy's terms. They simply want—as who does not?—an end to the war.

It is easy for the enemy to underestimate this country. In waiting for us to surrender, he hears the shrill protests and misses the true, patient heartbeat of America. This country has never lost a war; it has never surrendered to an enemy. And it is not about to do so now.

The need today, when an honorable end to the war is within sight, is for courage and patience, in the best American tradition. When their country is in trouble the American people close ranks and stand together. Together, we have brought our country through many storms.

We are now in the midst of a storm, and we will see it through. If the enemy is counting on this nation to falter, he is wrong. The heart of America is as strong as ever, and its patience will endure. Our enemy need not question it. Our allies need not doubt it. Our President need not wonder.

THE ROLE OF THE NEWS MEDIA

HON. WILLIAM L. HUNGATE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, the role of the media both in reporting and as an active agent in the happenings of our times is beginning to receive some serious consideration.

There are those who assert that we now have a form of censorship in the media in the sense that what is reported, how widely it is reported, the prominence given the story, and the time at which it appears are all determined by individuals over whom the public exercises no appreciable control. Individuals as diverse as Robert Kennedy and SPIRO AGNEW, Lyndon Johnson, and Richard Nixon have been critical of the informational resources given our Nation. If the premise is accepted that a form of news control now exists—reportedly major news magazines such as Time, Newsweek, and Life first declined to purchase and run the Song My story—then the question becomes whether the censorship we have should be operated privately or publicly; whether the power to control news flow, content, and coloration should depend on financial strength and inclination, or whether it should be handled by public elected or appointed individuals subject to removal through the exercise of the public will.

Accordingly the article "Press Coverage of Civil Disorders" appearing in the Public Opinion Quarterly, fall 1969 issue, is of considerable interest in reflecting the degree of responsibility exercised, and sometimes not exercised, in the media.

An excerpt follows:

EXCERPT FROM "PRESS COVERAGE OF CIVIL DISORDERS"

A CASE STUDY OF WINSTON-SALEM, 1967

"A variety of voluntary codes and guidelines—some devised by the police, some by city administrations, most by the media themselves—now govern the reporting of riots in many American cities. Designed to curb flamboyant or sensational accounts that might exacerbate racial tensions, these guidelines may also have unanticipated and less desirable consequences. The following case study analyzes the implications of one newspaper's coverage of one such disorder.

"David L. Paletz is Assistant Professor of Political Science at Duke University and Robert Dunn is a student there.

"Racially larded civil disorders have occurred throughout American history. Until the advent of television, the press provided the basic source of information on these minacious disturbances. Yet, surprisingly, there are few attempts to evaluate, analyze, or even describe the way the press covered such events. Academies have been notably derelict. This essay is one small attempt to rectify the scholarly omission. We briefly canvass the nature of newspaper coverage of riots during the period 1919–1943. Then we peruse the ways recent racial disturbances have been treated in the press. In the body of the paper, to examine a newspaper in action, we report on the results of a case study we conducted of the treatment by the Winston-Salem Journal of that city's November 1967 riot. This leads to certain uneasy reflections on the present nature and future direction of riot coverage in the press.

PRESS COVERAGE OF RACIAL DISTURBANCES

"According to the limited research actually conducted, prior to the 1960's racial disturbances extensive enough to be considered riots consisted primarily of violent clashes between whites and Negroes. In most instances black people were the victims of white aggression. Many attacks were stimulated by the local press. The classic example is the Washington, D.C. fray of mid-July 1919 when the Washington Post, with its vastly exaggerated tales of Negro rapists, played a major role in provoking the disturbance. The press of East St. Louis is supposed to have played a similar role in provoking the riots that occurred in that city in the same month. In Chicago, which also experienced major racial conflict in July 1919, the press gave Negroes scarcely better shrift. As the Chicago Commission on Race Relations pointed out:

"Negroes in Chicago almost without exception point to the Chicago press as the responsible agent for many of their present difficulties. Throughout the country it is pointed out by both whites and Negroes that the policies of newspapers on racial matters have made relations more difficult, at times fostering new antagonism and enmities and even precipitating riots by inflaming the public against Negroes.

"When the riots occurred it appears the press tended to misreport events to the detriment of Negroes. And when trials followed riot, much of the press viewed Negro defendants as guilty and presented their cases less than fairly. Not all the press was culpable, but much of it deserved Seligmann's indictment:

"It will be the work of years to undo the poisonous and anti-social accomplishments of such organs as The Omaha Bee, The Washington Post and The Times, The Chicago Evening Post, The New York Times, in fact of the majority of American newspapers.

"The next major outbreaks of racial conflict occurred in Detroit, Harlem, and Los Angeles in 1943. The dearth of research here is even greater than we encountered in summarizing the 1919 disturbances. In general the press appears to have been less virulent and more constructive, but an accurate assessment would require the kinds of studies apparently not yet conducted."

I recommend the entire article for further study.

PEOPLE POWER—IN THE DEFENSE OF CHRISTMAS

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, through the length and breadth of our land we are witnessing something new and encouraging. The American people have had enough—and they are saying so.

For long years the Hitler technique of the big lie has been applied in America. The closely controlled news media have drummed the never-changing theme of socialism, collectivism, and internationalism into the minds of the people.

Crime, ignorance, failure, laziness—these are never the fault of the criminal, the ignorant, the failure or the lazy, but of "society" in some strange manner. If a test consistently proves that there are differences in people, then the test must be wrong. If children are incapable of learning English, then they must be taught Swahili. If the lowest segment of our society has no concept of family responsibility, then the family must be destroyed.

And, above all, the people know nothing. The bureaucratic autocrats are the only ones who are able to think for the people, to plan their lives, to educate their children.

But the people are now being heard. They are not alone. They are the majority, and all around the country, they are letting this be known.

I include a typical newsclipping of the restoration of Christmas in Massachusetts by irate parents, who just refused to believe that Christmas is un-American:

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 2, 1969]

SCHOOL BAN ON YULE RITES IS RESCINDED

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.—A ban on all religious reference to Christmas in Marblehead public schools has been rescinded after parents and children picketed the home of the school committee chairman and left an inflatable Santa Claus on his lawn.

"The program of observing religious holidays in the Marblehead public school system will continue as it has in the past," the school committee said in a statement Sunday.

The school department had issued a statement earlier saying: "All reference to the word Christmas will be eliminated in group activities planned in all Marblehead schools."

School Superintendent Aura W. Coleman said the ban had been adopted after a conference with clergymen of all faiths. In its new statement, the committee said it would not prohibit specific classroom activities, but would rely on the "sensitivity" of teachers in attempting to eliminate complaints of religious bias.

Coleman said that during the Christmas season last year he received "numerous complaints" from Jewish parents about their children's participation in school holiday activities.

In a 1963 ruling, former Attorney General Edward W. Brooke, now the state's junior U.S. senator, said observances were permissible as long as they were part of the educational process and had no specific religious connotation.

STANTON ON AGNEW

HON. LIONEL VAN DEERLIN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, last week, in a speech to the International Radio and Television Society, Dr. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, sharply rebuked the Vice President for the way in which Mr. AGNEW had criticized the news media. Dr. Stanton's greatest concern was over Mr. AGNEW's reference to television's being "sanctioned and licensed by Government," and to Mr. AGNEW's suggestion that "it is time that the networks were made more responsive to the views of the Nation."

Could this choice of words, employed by the second highest official in the administration, have been purely accidental? asked Dr. Stanton.

Mr. AGNEW insists they were. But to Dr. Stanton, and myself, these phrases have a distinctly ominous ring. Who, for instance, would the Vice President charge with the responsibility of "making" the networks more responsible to national views? The Vice President did not say, but the implication—the implied threat—seems rather obvious, to me at least.

Under unanimous consent, I include Dr. Stanton's speech of November 25 at this point in my remarks:

INTERNATIONAL RADIO AND TELEVISION SOCIETY, INC.

(Address by Frank Stanton, President Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., New York, November 25, 1969)

I am not here to defend broadcast journalism as being beyond all criticism. No one could have worked as long as I have in radio and television without realizing that we are far from perfect in carrying out our enormous responsibilities in broadcast journalism. We have never been satisfied with the job we are doing. We are not satisfied now. It is our continuing hope and our continuing effort to do better. We are concerned with what the press says of us. We are concerned with what our audiences write us. We are concerned with what our affiliates tell us. We do strive for objectivity, although it is not always easy to achieve. While freedom of the press is meaningless without the freedom to be wrong, we do try to be right. And I think that in the vast majority of cases we have succeeded.

Let me turn now to the events of the past few weeks that have commanded the attention of many of us. On November 3, the President of the United States delivered a much-publicized and eagerly-awaited speech presenting the Administration's position and plans on the war in Vietnam. That war has been the subject of one of the longest and most fervent public debates in all American history. Good, conscionable and dedicated men and women, from all sections of our society, have earnest and deeply-felt differences as to its meaning, its conduct and its prospects. Fundamental questions of rightness and wrongness have disturbed our people as no other issue in this century.

The President spoke for 32 minutes on all four nationwide television networks, four nationwide radio networks and scores of independent stations. Some 88 million people heard his words as they were conveyed, uninterrupted and in a place and under conditions of his own choosing. Following the President's address, each of the television networks provided comments by professionals analyzing the content of the speech. Participating were experienced newsmen, most of whom have performed similar functions for many years following the live broadcast of special events of outstanding significance. Since the participants were different on the four television networks, the comments of none of them were heard by the same huge audience that heard the President. One of the networks added to the expertise by presenting the views of a distinguished diplomat and public servant, who had held high posts in nine Presidential terms, of both parties, prior to the present Administration. Another presented the comments of two United States senators, who took divergent views of the policy advocated in the speech.

In all this, nothing unprecedented had happened. Such comments have customarily been offered after most significant Presidential appearances—State of the Union, Inaugurals, United Nations addresses, press conferences, for example. And they usually have been more than mere bland recapitulations, which would serve little purpose, and have frequently called attention to emphases, omissions, unexpected matters of substance, long anticipated attitudes, changes of views, methods of advocacy or any other aspect of the speech. Such comments have been offered by enterprising news organizations since the dawn of the modern press and continued into the era of radio and television.

Following the President's speech and following the relatively brief comments made directly after it, the White House was deluged with telegrams and letters approving the President's speech, the White House reported, by an overwhelming margin. Two days later, the Gallup Survey reported that nearly 4 out of every 5 of those who heard it, approved the President's speech and the course that it advocated with regard to Vietnam.

Ten days after the President's speech, the second highest official in the Administration launched an attack on the television networks on the grounds that critical comments on government policy as enunciated in a Presidential address might unduly influence the American people—even though, following such comments, the President received a 77 percent vote of confidence from those who heard him on the issue discussed.

The Vice President also censured television network news for covering events and personalities that are jolting to many of us but that nevertheless documented the kind of polarized society—not just here but throughout the world, whether or not there is television and whether it is controlled or free—in which, for better or worse, we are living. It is not a consensus society. It is a questioning, searching society—unsure, groping, running to extremes, abrasive, often violent even in its reactions to the violence of others. Students and faculties are challenging time-honored traditions in the universities. Young clergy are challenging ancient practices and even dogma of the churches. Labor union members are challenging their leaderships. Scientists, artists, businessmen, politicians—all are drawn into the fray. Frequently, because everyone is clamoring for attention, views are set forth in extreme terms.

As we do not propose to leave unreported the voice of the Vice President, we cannot in good conscience leave unreported any other significant voice or happening—whether or not it supports government policy, whether or not it conforms with our own views, whether or not it disturbs the persuasions of any political party or bloc. But no healthy society and no governing authorities worth their salt have to fear the reporting of dissenting or even of hostile voices. What a healthy society and a self-respecting government do have to fear—at the price of their vitality if not of their life—is the suppression of such reporting.

To strengthen the delusion that, as a news medium, television is plunging the nation into collapse and can be deterred only by suppressing criticisms and by either withholding bad news or contriving a formula to balance it with good news, the Vice President's speech was replete with misinformation, inaccuracies and contradictions. To deal adequately with all of these on this occasion would take us through the afternoon, but let me note some of them by way of example, then move on to consider with you the context of the Vice President's speech so far as the actions and statements of other Administration officials are concerned and, finally, make some observations on the significance of this unhappy affair.

The Vice President began his indictment of November 13 with a monstrous contradiction. He asserted flatly that "no medium has a more profound influence over public opinion" than television. And yet he also claimed that the views of America have been very little affected by this "profound influence," when he said, "The views of the majority of this fraternity [i.e., television network news executives and editors] do not—and I repeat, not—represent the views of America." The Vice President can't have it both ways. If the views of the American people show "a great gulf" between how a speech is received by them and how it is treated in a broadcast, obviously the treatment of it has no material effect upon their opinion. Even the premise of the Vice President's claim is proved wrong by the Gallup findings already mentioned.

The Vice President objected to the subjection of the words and policies of the President to "instant analysis and querulous criticism." The analysis, whatever its merits or failings, was hardly instant. Highly-informed speculation about the content of the speech had gone on for days and even weeks. Copies were made available at least two hours in advance of the analysis, allowing at least as much time as most morning newspapers had before press time. If a professional reporter could not arrive at some meaningful observations under those circumstances, we would question his competence.

The Vice President took care—and the point should not be lost on us—to remind us that television is "enjoying a monopoly sanctioned and licensed by government." A monopoly, by any definition I know, is the exclusive control of a product or a service by a single entity. Television news is broadcast in this country by four networks, all with different and fiercely competitive managements, producers, editors and reporters, involving hundreds of strongly individualistic people; by a dozen station groups, initiating and producing their own news broadcasts, and by hundreds of stations, producing their own news broadcasts wholly independent and distinct from those of any network they may otherwise be associated with. Moreover, it is estimated that, on the average day, 65 percent more hours of viewing are devoted to station-originated news broadcasts than to network news broadcasts. In addition, there are 6,717 radio stations in this country—the overwhelming majority without network affiliations.

All this hardly represents monopolistic control.

The Vice President seems to maintain that the First Amendment applies differently to NBC from what it does to The New York Times, because NBC's audience is bigger and because television has more impact. That the First Amendment is quantitative in its applicability is a chilling innovation from a responsible officer of the government. By this standard, the Times is less entitled to the protection of the Bill of Rights than the Des Moines Register, with a third of its circulation, and twice as entitled to it as the New York Daily News, which has double the Times' circulation. As for the impact of the television medium, it may be true that combined picture and voice give television a special force. On the other hand, print can be reread, it can be lingered over, it can be spread around, it can be consulted over and over again. Should, on the grounds of these advantages over television, the print media have less freedom?

The Vice President asked how many "marches and demonstrations" there would be if there were no television cameras. An elementary textbook in American history might prove instructive. There was no television to record the demonstrations against slavery; demonstrations against the Mexican War; demonstrations against the Civil War draft; demonstrations for women suffrage; demonstrations for Prohibition; demonstrations for the League of Nations; demonstrations against child labor; demonstrations for economic justice. That there would be no disturbing news except for television is a canard as dangerous as it is egregious.

Now let us turn to the crucial issue raised by the Vice President.

Despite his complaints about and what we report, the Vice President protested that he was not advocating censorship. He found it necessary, a week later, to repeat his protest three times in one paragraph. It is far more shocking to me that the utterances of the second-ranking official of the United States government require such repeated assurances that he had in mind no violation of the Constitution that it is comforting to have them at all. Of course, neither he nor any of his associates are advocating censorship—which would never survive judicial scrutiny. But it does not take overt censorship to cripple the free flow of ideas. Was the Vice President's reference to television's being "sanctioned and licensed by government" accidental and devoid of any point or meaning? Was his suggestion that "it is time that the networks were made [emphasis added] more responsive to the views of the nation" merely sloppy semantics and devoid of any notion of coercion?

Perhaps the Vice President, in his November 20 follow-up speech, was not referring to government action, but only to a dialogue among citizens when he said, "When they [network commentators and some gentlemen of The New York Times] go beyond fair comment and criticism they will be called upon to defend their statements and their positions just as we must defend ours. And when their criticism becomes excessive or unjust, we shall invite them down from their ivory towers to enjoy the rough and tumble of public debate." Who, in those sentences, will do the calling of these men to defend themselves, and before whom? Who is the "we" who shall do the inviting? And by whose standards will the limits of "fair comment" and "just criticism" be judged and who shall be the judges?

The ominous character of the Vice President's attack derives directly from the fact that it is made upon the journalism of a medium licensed by the government of which he is a high ranking officer. This is a new relationship in government-press relations. From George Washington on, every Administration has had disputes with the press, but the First Amendment assured the press that such disputes were between equals, with the press beyond the reach of the government. This all-important fact of the licensing power of life and death over the broadcast press brings an implicit threat to a government official's attacks on it, whether or not that is the intention and whether or not the official says he is speaking only as an individual.

But the Vice President does not seem to have been walking a lonely path in the direction of suppression and harassment:

Herbert G. Klein, the Administration's Director of Communications, revealed that, on November 4, the day after the President's speech, calls from White House offices went out to broadcast stations asking whether editorials were planned and, in Mr. Klein's words, "to ask them what they would say in their editorial comment."

In Washington, D.C., television stations were called by a member of the Subversive Activities Control Board, Paul O'Neil, requesting logs of news coverage devoted to support of and in opposition to the Administration's Vietnam policy. His wife, a Dade County official of the Republican Party, who specified her husband's official position, made the same request of Miami, Florida stations.

On November 4, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, in unprecedented calls to the presidents of the three broadcasting companies with national television networks, demanded transcripts of the remarks of their reporters and others who had commented on the speech, saying there had been complaints, the source of which he failed to specify—although, two weeks later on sober second thought, he seemed to reverse himself when he signed a letter adopted by the full Commission finding that the comments made on the networks after the speech in no way violated its doctrine of fairness.

A special counsel to the President, Clark R. Mollenhoff, said that the speech "was developed by various White House aides," adding "if you are asking me, 'does it reflect the Administration's views,' the evidence is abundant that it does." The President's press secretary, Ronald Ziegler, agreed that a White House special assistant, Patrick J. Buchanan, "very well could have contributed some thoughts to the speech."

Mr. Klein, on November 16, said, "I think that any time any industry—and I include newspapers very thoroughly in this, as well as the networks—if you look at the problems you have today and you fail to continue to examine them, you do invite the government to come in."

In my judgment, the whole tone, the whole content and the whole pattern of this government intrusion into the substance and methods of the broadcast press, and indeed of all journalism, have the gravest implications. Because a Federally-licensed medium is involved, no more serious episode has occured in government-press relationships since the dark days in the fumbling infancy of this republic when the ill-fated Alien and Sedition Acts forbade criticism of the government and its policies on pain of exile or imprisonment.

In the context of this intimidation, the self-serving disavowal interpolations of no censorship, no matter how often repeated, are meaningless. Reprisals no less damaging to the media and no less dangerous to our fundamental freedoms than censorship are readily available to the government—economic, legal and psychological. Nor is their actual employment necessary to achieve their ends; to have them dangling like swords over the media can do harm even more irreparable than overt action. If these threats implicit in the developments of the past week are not openly recognized, unequivocally denounced and firmly resisted, freedom of communications in this country will suffer a setback that will not be limited to checking the freedom of television or to barring critical comment on government policy. It will precipitate an erosion that will inevitably destroy the most powerful safeguard of a free society—free, unhampered and unharassed news media.

This does not have to be the resolute intention of any person or group, any party or government. We can wander unintentionally—all of us—into a lethal trap if we let our dissatisfaction with the handling of specific issues, which are variable, and of events, which are transitory, compromise our adherence to basic principles, which are constant. No permanent freedom was ever wisely exchanged for temporary popularity, for the popularity can be gone with changing political or social cycles and the freedom can be regained, if ever, only at fearful cost. And this is a truth that should be remembered by those who demand that our freedoms be preserved only when they agree with us, but who have been eager to restrict them whenever they disagree with us. You cannot side with restrictions or with bullying or with recriminations when they support your views and then oppose them when they differ, for they will rise up and haunt you long after your cause is lost or won.

The issue here is simple. Dwight D. Eisenhower said, "I believe the United States is strong enough to expose to the world its differing viewpoints. . . ." His successor, John F. Kennedy, said, "The men who create power make an indispensable contribution to the nation's greatness, but the men who question power make a contribution just as indispensable."

Criticism is an essential ingredient in that mix. It is central, not tangential, to a free society. It is always a free society's strength and often its salvation. Television itself is not and should not be immune to such criticism. As a matter of fact, it is the most criticized medium in the history of communications. Newspapers, magazines, academic groups, learned societies—who wouldn't dream of criticizing each other—criticize us every single day. Everyone has free access to what we do, and everyone sees us do it. We are not unaccountable. We are not clandestine. We have no end product that is not seen and judged by everyone. But such open criticism is a far cry from sharp reminders from high official quarters that we are licensed or that if we don't examine ourselves, we in common with other media "invite" the government to move in.

The troubled pages of this century's history are writ dark with the death of liberty in those nations where the first fatal symptom of political decay was an effort to control the news media. Seldom has it been called censorship. Seldom is the word used except in denials. Always it has been "guidelines" in the name of national unity. And we might well ponder the fate of the unhappy role of nations that had no regard for their freedoms or took them for granted or held them lightly.

As we meet here, 39 nations in the world have a controlled press or a press that wavers uncertainly between control and freedom. These melancholy statistics might well be borne in mind by those of our own countrymen who, as the Vice President descends upon one part of the country to attack the journalists of another part, are moved by their temporary irritations to applaud their own ensnarement. In his speech of November 13, the Vice President turned to Learned Hand to support a proposition that would have been total anathema to the great judge. Let me, in conclusion, invoke Hand in more revealing words:

"Our democracy rests upon the assumption that, set free, the common man can manage his own fate; that errors will cancel each other by open discussion; that the interests of each when unguided from above, will not diverge too radically from the interests of all. . . ."

I appreciate having had this opportunity to speak to you today in what all thoughtful people must regard as a critical period in the life of a free society and of the free communications without which it cannot exist.

EXPORT CONTROL ACT

HON. GARRY BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is expected that the House of Representatives will take up and consider yet this week the conference report on H.R. 4293, the 1969 amendments to the Export Control Act as newly titled "The Export Administration Act of 1969."

My fellow conferees, Mr. WIDNALL and Mr. MIZE, and I refused to sign the conference report because we disagreed with the determination of the other conferees to accept the Senate version of section 4(b), the "Authority" section of the bill. The three of us have heretofore circulated to all Members of the House an expression and explanation of our views in opposition to adoption of the conference report. We will actively oppose the adoption of the conference report until and unless the House version of section 4(b) is incorporated in the legislation in lieu of the Senate version of such section. Since the time the conference was completed on H.R. 4293, I have received several letters from exporters and others urging adoption by the House of Representatives of the conference report. In each of such letters, the writer has indicated his lack of support for the policy which would be established by adoption of the Senate version of section 4(b) regarding trade in strategic goods with Russia and other Communist bloc nations.

Inasmuch as many of my colleagues in the House may be receiving similar letters from exporters, I have decided it might be desirable or helpful to share with them my typical response to such letters as well as the content of the letter which was earlier circulated by Mr. WIDNALL, Mr. MIZE, and myself among our colleagues. The letters follow:

NOVEMBER 18, 1969.

Re conference report on H.R. 4293, Export Control Act.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: The Conference Report on the Export Control Act, having been approved by the Senate, will be before the House of Representatives this week, probably on Wednesday.

We are urging you to oppose the adoption of the Conference Report.

As Conferees on the part of the House, we did not sign the Report and hope it will not receive your support because the all-important Section 4, the "Authority" section, of the Report is almost verbatim the Senate language to which we strenuously object for the following reasons:

(1) It will be impossible to canvass the government defense laboratories and private defense contractors throughout the United States to ascertain which of the many thousands of commodities, technologies and information affected by the bill would, or would not, make a significant contribution to the military potential of Communist Countries within the six month period to which such review is limited by Section 4(a).

(2) Section 4(b) provides that if strategic products, technology or information are available from any other source including Russia and other Communist countries or friendly nations not allied with the United States, such items cannot be subject to export control unless the President makes a specific determination that this is necessary in the interest of national security. Even if the President makes such a determination, the President then must report in detail to the Congress, his reasons for same. This reporting mandate will require detailed public disclosure which could, and no doubt would, be detrimental to our national security, our foreign relations and would damage U.S. firms in regard to matters of trade confidentiality.

(3) No provision is made for the maintenance of controls over "basket categories"—groupings of many similar products in general categories without individual identification. Use of basket categories is essential to control of the exportation of new products or technology having strategic potential but for which a separate classification does not exist because such new product or technology has never been previously identified. The Senate language in the Report requires individual identification of all products subject to control and therefore inability to identify many new products and technologies would authorize their uncontrolled export even to the detriment of our national security.

In summary, we concur with many in the Congress who believe the Export Control Act needs up-dating. We agree that some of its provisions have been unnecessarily restrictive but we reject the radical changes proposed by the Senate and incorporated in the Conference Report.

We think it extremely unwise and not in this nation's interest to shift the burden of proof to the President in total disregard of the fact that justification of his actions may entail the divulging of information which would be contrary to the national security interests of this country. When we, in the House, adopted an amendment to the Export Control Act making "availability" elsewhere of the proposed export a matter to be considered by the President in exercising his control authority, we restricted the application of such availability test to those nations with which we have defense treaty commitments—in other words, we can have an impact upon trade policy and shipment of goods from other free world nations but we have no similar power or control with respect to the shipment of goods among and within the nations of the Communist Bloc.

Defeat of the Conference Report will permit an opportunity to re-examine the questions and issues we have raised herein and hopefully the adoption of the House "Authority" section.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM B. WIDNALL,
CHESTER L. MIZE,
GARRY BROWN.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 1, 1969.

DEAR ———: Thank you for contacting me urging my support of the Conference Report on H.R. 4293, legislation amending the Export Control Act of 1949 and entitled "The Export Administration Act of 1969."

Frankly, I am somewhat at a loss to reconcile your support of the Report and some of the statements in your communication in view of the Senate version of the "Authority" section of the bill as included in the Conference Report. These statements lead me to believe that you have not carefully read the Conference Report or preferred to ignore some of its language.

Needless to say, I am actively opposed to the Conference Report in its present form, although I was a prime mover for modification of the Export Control Act when the bill to renew the Act was originally before the House of Representatives. In fact, I was successful in amending the Act even with respect to the "Authority" section.

Your communication expressly states that you are opposed to trade in strategic goods by exporters of this nation with nations of the Communist bloc, including Russia; yet, the language of the "Authority" section of the Conference Report, which was the Senate language, denies to the President the right to restrict or control such trade unless he satisfies the two-factor test of Section 4(b) or makes an absolute determination that such trade would be detrimental to the national security of the United States and explains his reasons for such determination in a "full and detailed statement" in the next quarterly report to the Congress.

The strategic importance of most exports which may have military significance detrimental to the national security of the United States must necessarily be established from intelligence reports. Disclosure of the substance of these reports to the general public, through a detailed quarterly report to the Congress, would not be in this nation's interest in the view of this writer. It, therefore, would be almost essential for the President to attempt to satisfy the two-factor test of the "Authority" section for the control of exports which does not necessitate the filing of such a report.

It is this two-factor test within the "Authority" section that causes me the greatest concern. If you have read the language of the Report, you will know that it denies to the President the right to control exports either through the establishment of restricted trade lists or by denial of export licenses, unless the President satisfies both requirements of such section. This test provides that with respect to any export control action, the President must determine: (1) that the item to be restricted or denied a license "would make a significant contribution to the military potential of such nation or nations which would prove detrimental to the national security of the United States"; and, (2) such item or items "sought to be exported are not readily available to such nation or nations from other sources" (emphasis added). Since this is a two-fold test, satisfaction of only one of the requirements is not sufficient to justify controls.

The impact of this two-fold test is to deny to the President the right to control the export of items to any nation even though such item or items may have substantial military significance detrimental to the United States, if such item or items are readily available to such nation or nations from any other source, including a source within the Communist bloc of nations, even Russia, since the term "other sources" has in no way been limited by the Conference Report.

The questioning of Senator Mondale regarding his interpretation of this language of the Conference Report (see Congressional Record for November 14, 1969, pages 34290–34293) clearly establishes that either Senator Mondale and his colleagues in the Senate did not mean that which they had written in their Senate language or did not say what they meant. Nevertheless, the language is not patently ambiguous and, therefore, is not subject to interpretation regardless of the amount of legislative history which the Senate colloquy established in the pages of the Congressional Record to which I have referred.

Again, it is impossible for me to reconcile your rejection of trade in strategic goods with Communist nations with the analysis I have above set forth. We both support modification of the Export Control Act substantially along the lines of the Conference Report, and it appears to me you should be supporting my opposition to adoption of the Conference Report until the "Authority" section has been corrected to reflect that which apparently even the Senate intended.

My purpose in opposing the adoption of the Conference Report is to permit an opportunity for the Congress to adopt the House version of the "Authority" section and for no other reason. This action would be consistent with what the Senate apparently intended and would accommodate a reconciliation of what appear to be the conflicting recommendations of your letter. Even more importantly, such action would effect a realistic modernization of the Export Control Act without jeopardizing the effectuating of proper export control policy.

With best regards.

Sincerely,

GARRY BROWN.

ADDRESS OF DR. FRANK STANTON, PRESIDENT OF COLUMBIA BROADCASTING CO., BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL RADIO AND TELEVISION SOCIETY, NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 25, 1960

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, on November 13 the Vice President of the United States spoke in Des Moines, Iowa, focusing his remarks on the television industry in this country. One week later on November 20, in Mobile, Ala., Vice President AGNEW spoke again concerning the Nation's media, this time concentrating his comments on newspapers.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I would like to insert in the RECORD a thoughtful and significant response to the Vice President's criticism, an address by Dr. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, before a meeting of the International Radio & Television Society held in New York City on November 25.

Dr. Stanton's address follows:

ADDRESS BY DR. FRANK STANTON

I am not here to defend broadcast journalism as being beyond all criticism. No one could have worked as long as I have in radio and television without realizing that we are far from perfect in carrying out our enormous responsibilities in broadcast journalism. We have never been satified with the job we are doing. We are not satisfied now. It is our continuing hope and our continuing effort to do better. We are concerned with what the press says of us. We are concerned with what our audiences write us. We are concerned with what our affiliates tell us. We do strive for objectivity, although it is not always easy to achieve. While freedom of the press is meaningless without the freedom to be wrong, we do try to be right. And I think that in the vast majority of cases we have succeeded.

NIXON OUTLINES VIETNAM PEACE PLAN

Let me turn now to the events of the past few weeks that have commanded the attention of many of us. On November 3, the President of the United States delivered a much-publicized and eagerly-awaited speech presenting the Administration's position and plans on the war in Vietnam. That war has been the subject of one of the longest and most fervent public debates in all American history. Good, conscionable and dedicated men and women, from all sections of our society, have earnest and deeply-felt differences as to its meaning, its conduct and its prospects. Fundamental questions of rightness and wrongness have disturbed our people as no other issue has in this century.

The President spoke for 32 minutes on all four nationwide television networks, four nationwide radio networks and scores of independent stations. Some 88 million people heard his words as they were conveyed, uninterrupted and in a place and under conditions of his own choosing. Following the President's address, each of the television networks provided comments by professionals analyzing the content of the speech. Participating were experienced newsmen, most of whom have performed similar functions for many years following the live broadcast of special events of outstanding significance. Since the participants were different on the four television networks, the comments of none of them were heard by the same huge audience that heard the President. One of the networks added to the expertise by presenting the views of a distinguished diplomat and public servant, who had held high posts in nine Presidential terms, of both parties, prior to the present Administration. Another presented the comments of two United States senators, who took divergent views of the policy advocated in the speech.

In all this, nothing unprecedented had happened. Such comments have customarily been offered after most significant Presidential appearances—State of the Union, Inaugurals, United Nations addresses, press conferences, for example. And they usually have been more than mere bland recapitulations, which would serve little purpose, and have frequently called attention to emphases, omissions, unexpected matters of substance, long anticipated attitudes, changes of views, methods of advocacy or any other aspect of the speech. Such comments have been offered by enterprising news organizations since the dawn of the modern press and continued into the era of radio and television.

Following the President's speech and following the relatively brief comments made directly after it, the White House was deluged with telegrams and letters approving the President's speech, the White House reported, by an overwhelming margin. Two days later, the Gallup Survey reported that nearly 4 out of every 5 of those who heard it, approved the President's speech and the course that it advocated with regard to Vietnam.

AGNEW CRITICISM OF TELEVISION NETWORK NEWS

Ten days after the President's speech, the second highest official in the Administration launched an attack on the television networks on the grounds that critical comments on government policy as enunciated in a Presidential address might unduly influence the American people—even though, following such comments, the President received a 77 percent vote of confidence from those who heard him on the issue discussed.

The Vice President also censured television network news for covering events and personalities that are jolting to many of us but that nevertheless document the kind of polarized society—not just here but throughout the world, whether or not there is television and whether it is controlled or free—in which, for better or worse, we are living. It is not a consensus society. It is a questioning, searching society—unsure, groping, running to extremes, abrasive, often violent even in its reactions to the violence of others. Students and faculties are challenging time-honored traditions in the universities. Young clergy are challenging ancient practices and even dogma of the churches. Labor union members are challenging their leaderships. Scientists, artists, businessmen, politicians—all are drawn into the fray. Frequently, because everyone is clamoring for attention, views are set forth in extreme terms.

As we do not propose to leave unreported the voice of the Vice President, we cannot in good conscience leave unreported any other significant voice or happening—whether or not it supports government policy, whether or not it conforms with our own views, whether or not it disturbs the persuasions of any political party or bloc. But no healthy society and no governing authorities worth their salt have to fear the reporting of dissenting or even of hostile voices. What a healthy society and a self-respecting government do have to fear—at the price of their vitality if not of their life—is the suppression of such reporting.

To strengthen the delusion that, as a news medium, television is plunging the nation into collapse and can be deterred only by suppressing criticisms and by either withholding bad news or contriving a formula to balance it with good news, the Vice President's speech was replete with misinformation, inaccuracies and contradictions. To deal adequately with all of these on this occasion would take us through the afternoon, but let me note some of them by way of example, then move on to consider with you the context of the Vice President's speech so far as the actions and statements of other Administration officials are concerned and, finally, make some observations on the significance of this unhappy affair.

MISINFORMATION, INACCURACIES, AND CONTRADICTIONS

The Vice President began his indictment of November 13 with a monstrous contradiction. He asserted flatly that "no medium has a more profound influence over public opinion" than television. And yet he also claimed that the views of America have been very little affected by this "profound influence," when he said, "The views of the majority of this fraternity [i.e., television network news executives and editors] do not—and I repeat, not—represent the views of America." The Vice President can't have it both ways. If the views of the American people show "a great gulf" between how a speech is received by them and how it is treated in a broadcast, obviously the treatment of it has no material effect upon their opinion. Even the premise of the Vice President's claim is proved wrong by the Gallup findings already mentioned.

The Vice President objected to the subjection of the words and policies of the President to "instant analysis and querulous criticism." The analysis, whatever its merits or failings, was hardly instant. Highly-informed speculation about the content of the speech had gone on for days and even weeks. Copies were made available at least two hours in advance of the analysis, allowing at least as much time as most morning newspapers had before press time. If a professional reporter could not arrive at some meaningful observations under those circumstances, we would question his competence.

The Vice President took care—and the point should not be lost on us—to remind us that television is "enjoying a monopoly sanctioned and licensed by government." A monopoly, by any definition I know, is the exclusive control of a product or a service by a single entity. Television news is broadcast in this country by four networks, all with different and fiercely competitive managements, producers, editors and reporters, involving hundreds of strongly individualistic people; by a dozen station groups, initiating and producing their own news broadcasts, and by hundreds of stations, producing their own news broadcasts wholly independent and distinct from those of any network they may otherwise be associated with. Moreover, it is estimated that, on the average day, 65 percent more hours of viewing are devoted to station-originated news broadcasts than to network news broadcasts. In addition, there are 6,717 radio stations in this country—the overwhelming majority without network affiliations.

All this hardly represents monopolistic control.

The Vice President seems to maintain that the First Amendment applies differently to NBC from what it does to The New York Times, because NBC's audience is bigger and because television has more impact. That the First Amendment is quantitative in its applicability is a chilling innovation from a responsible officer of the government. By this standard, the Times is less entitled to the protection of the Bill of Rights than the Des Moines Register, with a third of its circulation, and twice as entitled to it as the New York Daily News, which has double the Times' circulation. As for the impact of the television medium, it may be true that combined picture and voice give television a special force. On the other hand, print can be reread, it can be lingered over, it can be spread around, it can be consulted over and over again. Should, on the grounds of these advantages over television, the print media have less freedom?

The Vice President asked how many "marches and demonstrations" there would be if there were no television cameras. An elementary textbook in American history might prove instructive. There was no television to record the demonstrations against slavery; demonstrations against the Mexican War; demonstrations against the Civil War draft; demonstration for women suffrage; demonstrations for Prohibition; demonstrations for the League of Nations; demonstrations against child labor; demonstrations for economic justice. That there would be no disturbing news except for television is a canard as dangerous as it is egregious.

CENSORSHIP IS THE CRUCIAL ISSUE

Now let us turn to the crucial issue raised by the Vice President.

Despite his complaints about how and what we report, the Vice President protested that he was not advocating censorship. He found it necessary, a week later, to repeat his protest three times in one paragraph. It is far more shocking to me that the utterances of the second-ranking official of the United States government require such repeated assurances that he had in mind no violation of the Constitution that it is comforting to have them at all. Of course, neither he nor any of his associates are advocating censorship—which would never survive judicial scrutiny. But it does not take overt censorship to cripple the free flow of ideas. Was the Vice President's reference to television's being "sanctioned and licensed by government" accidental and devoid of any point or meaning? Was his suggestion that "it is time that the networks were made [emphasis added] more responsive to the views of the nation" merely sloppy semantics and devoid of any notion of coercion?

Perhaps the Vice President, in his November 20 follow-up speech, was not referring to government action, but only to a dialogue among citizens when he said, "When they [network commentators and some gentlemen of The New York Times] go beyond fair comment and criticism they will be called upon to defend their statements and their positions just as we must defend ours. And when their criticism becomes excessive or unjust, we shall invite them down from their ivory towers to enjoy the rough and tumble of public debate." Who, in those sentences, will do the calling of these men to defend themselves, and before whom? Who is the "we" who shall do the inviting? And by whose standards will the limits of "fair comment" and "just criticism" be judged and who shall be the judges?

The ominous character of the Vice President's attack derives directly from the fact that it is made upon the journalism of a medium licensed by the government of which he is a high ranking officer. Ths is a new relationship in government-press relations. From George Washington on, every Administration has had disputes with the press, but the First Amendment assured the press that such disputes were between equals, with the press beyond the reach of the government. This all-important fact of the licensing power of life and death over the broadcast press brings an implicit threat to a government official's attacks on it, whether or not that is the intention and whether or not the official says he is speaking only as an individual.

AGNEW SPEECH HAS ADMINISTRATION SUPPORT

But the Vice President does not seem to have been walking a lonely path in the direction of suppression and harassment:

Herbert G. Klein, the Administration's Director of Communications, revealed that, on November 4, the day after the President's speech, calls from White House offices went out to broadcast stations asking whether editorials were planned and, in Mr. Klein's words, "to ask them what they would say in their editorial comment."

In Washington, D.C., television stations were called by a member of the Subversive Activities Control Board, Paul O'Neil, requesting logs of news coverage devoted to support of and in opposition to the Administration's Vietnam policy. His wife, a Dade County official of the Republican Party, who specified her husband's official position, made the same request of Miami, Florida stations.

On November 4, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, in unprecedented calls to the presidents of the three broadcasting companies with national television networks, demanded transcripts of the remarks of their reporters and others who had commented on the speech, saying there had been complaints, the source of which he failed to specify—although, two weeks later on sober second thought, he seemed to reverse himself when he signed a letter adopted by the full Commission finding that the comments made on the networks after the speech in no way violated its doctrine of fairness.

A special counsel to the President, Clark R. Mollenhoff, said that the speech "was developed by various White House aides," adding "if you are asking me, 'does it reflect the Administration's views,' the evidence is abundant that it does." The President's press secretary, Ronald Ziegler, agreed that a White House special assistant. Patrick J.

Buchanan, "very well could have contributed some thoughts to the speech."

Mr. Klein, on November 16, said, "I think that any time any industry—and I include newspapers very thoroughly in this, as well as the networks—if you look at the problems you have today and you fail to continue to examine them, you do invite the government to come in."

In my judgment, the whole tone, the whole content and the whole pattern of this government intrusion into the substance and methods of the broadcast press, and indeed of all journalism, have the gravest implications. Because a Federally-licensed medium is involved, no more serious episode has occurred in government-press relationships since the dark days in the fumbling infancy of this republic when the ill-fated Alien and Sedition Acts forbade criticism of the government and its policies on pain of exile or imprisonment.

In the context of this intimidation, the self-serving disavowal interpolations of no censorship, no matter how often repeated, are meaningless. Reprisals no less damaging to the media and no less dangerous to our fundamental freedoms than censorship are readily available to the government—economic, legal and psychological. Nor is their actual employment necessary to achieve their ends; to have them dangling like swords over the media can do harm even more irreparable than overt action. If these threats implicit in the developments of the past week are not openly recognized, unequivocally denounced and firmly resisted, freedom of communications in this country will suffer a setback that will not be limited to checking the freedom of television or to barring critical comment on government policy. It will precipitate an erosion that will inevitably destroy the most powerful safeguard of a free society—free, unhampered and unharassed news media.

This does not have to be the resolute intention of any person or group, any party or government. We can wander unintentionally—all of us—into a lethal trap if we let our dissatisfaction with the handling of specific issues, which are variable, and of events, which are transitory, compromise our adherence to basic principles, which are constant. No permanent freedom was every wisely exchanged for temporary popularity, for the popularity can be gone with changing political or social cycles and the freedom can be regained, if ever, only at fearful cost. And this is a truth that should be remembered by those who demand that our freedoms be preserved only when they agree with us, but who have been eager to restrict them whenever they disagree with us. You cannot side with restrictions or with bullying or with recriminations when they support your views and then oppose them when they differ, for they will rise up and haunt you long after your cause is lost or won.

CRITICISM IS VITAL TO A FREE SOCIETY

The issue here is simple. Dwight D. Eisenhower said, "I believe the United States is strong enough to expose to the world its differing viewpoints. . . ." His successor, John F. Kennedy, said, "The men who create power make an indispensable contribution to the nation's greatness, but the men who question power make a contribution just as indispensable."

Criticism is an essential ingredient in that mix. It is central, not tangential, to a free society. It is always a free society's strength and often its salvation. Television itself is not and should not be immune to such criticism. As a matter of fact, it is the most criticized medium in the history of communications. Newspapers, magazines, academic groups, learned societies—who wouldn't dream of criticizing each other—criticize us every single day. Everyone has free access to what we do, and everyone sees us do it. We are not unaccountable. We are not clandestine. We have no end product that is not seen and judged by everyone. But such open criticism is a far cry from sharp reminders from high official quarters that we are licensed or that if we don't examine ourselves, we in common with other media "invite" the government to move in.

The troubled pages of this century's history are writ dark with the death of liberty in those nations where the first fatal symptoms of political decay was an effort to control the news media. Seldom has it been called censorship. Seldom is the word used except in denials. Always it has been "guidelines" in the name of national duty. And we might well ponder the fate of the unhappy role of nations that had no regard for their freedoms or took them for granted or held them lightly.

As we meet here, 39 nations in the world have a controlled press or a press that wavers uncertainly between control and freedom. These melancholy statistics might well be borne in mind by those of our own countrymen who, as the Vice President descends upon one part of the country to attack the journalists of another part, are moved by their temporary irritations to applaud their own ensnarement. In his speech of November 13, the Vice President turned to Learned Hand to support a proposition that would have been total anathema to the great judge. Let me, in conclusion, invoke Hand in more revealing words:

"Our democracy rests upon the assumption that, set free, the common man can manage his own fate; that errors will cancel each other by open discussions; that the interests of each when unguided from above, will not diverge too radically from the interests of all. . . ."

I appreciate having had this opportunity to speak to you today in what all thoughtful people must regard as a critical period in the life of a free society and of the free communications without which it cannot exist.

AID FERTILIZER POLICIES QUESTIONED

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, recently I have had cause to question a proposed policy change at AID which involved what I considered to be a circumvention of the "buy American" principle of our foreign assistance program. Accordingly, I wrote the following letter to Administrator Hannah:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 11, 1969.

Dr. JOHN A. HANNAH,
Administrator, Agency for International Development, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. HANNAH: The enclosed letter and material have been received from a man in whom I have the greatest amount of respect, and whose knowledge in the area of the U.S. bag industry is well recognized.

On a previous occasion he supplied valuable information regarding bag specifications, which resulted in large savings to the AID foreign assistance program and to the American taxpayer.

What appears to be the major problem here is not a single company's ability through an AID exemption to buy bags overseas, but the implication of the ruling as it affects the entire U.S. bag industry and all those who handle bagged shipments.

The Buy American principle, which has been a keystone of our foreign aid program is in jeopardy of being completely cut off for an important segment of U.S. business. I find it hard to believe that AID's recent ruling is not in direct opposition to the intent of Congress as expressed in foreign aid legislation.

Specifically, I understand that an AID legal officer, Mr. Kenneth Fries, sent out an official letter stating that bags were not included "as components of non U.S. origin for purposes of AID componentry limitations." This appears to mean that suppliers will be entirely free to bag supplies anywhere abroad, thereby by-passing an entire American industry that has always been in the past an integral part of our foreign assistance program.

I would appreciate your close attention to this matter, and determination regarding the status of the U.S. bag industry.

Kind regards and best wishes.

Sincerely,

PETER W. RODINO, Jr.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1969.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PETE: I should like to bring to your attention a serious problem that will lead to unemployment of thousands of people—a problem caused by a ruling of the legal department of A.I.D. going in the opposite direction of the intent of Congress in the assistance to less fortunate nations.

As you know, through the Agency of International Development, our fellow citizens have given material costing billions of dollars to the have-not nations. For bookkeeping purposes, formal contracts have been drawn up similar to commercial transactions. And it is a matter of record these nations have not paid the interest on the so-called loans and it is ridiculous for anyone to believe the money for the assistance given through the generosity of the American people will ever be paid.

That is our foreign assistance policy and today I am not going to debate the flaws in it. But I do take issue when we help these countries at the expense of American management and labor.

We ship millions of tons of fertilizer under this program to such nations as India, Pakistan, Vietnam and Indonesia.

In my judgement that is good and that is the intent of Congress in carrying out the wishes of the American people for we all want to help individual farmers in those countries to plant and harvest rice for subsistence.

But it is an indisputable fact that when we ship fertilizer in bulk seven percent of the shipment disappears between the time it leaves the fertilizer plant and is loaded on a ship in one of our ports. Further, it is an indisputable fact that at least a third of the bulk shipments disappear into the black market at the recipient port and in Vietnam, quite possibly, is detoured into the hands of the enemy. It is also an indisputable fact that fertilizer shipped in bulk losses its potency in transit because it is hydroscopic and absorbs moisture as a blotter would absorb water.

Bagging of the material in a U.S. port is, of course, the most efficient, effective method because the weight is exact, the material is protected against moisture and each bag is printed with the A.I.D. emblem and the printing shows the material comes from America.

When material is shipped in bulk, it is shoveled into unprinted bags by underpaid labor in the receipient port. The bags are manufactured overseas, so America loses. Not only does this increase unemployment in bag plants, but stevedores are also unemployed.

Now, the legal department of A.I.D. has ruled that all shipments of fertilizer can be shipped in bulk and the bags can be purchased in Asia for packing the material in Singapore. In view of the loss of material and the adverse effect to both management and labor by this new policy, I believe this must be corrected immediately.

This policy is not only unrealistic, it is a flagrant example of bureaucrats abusing their responsibility and daring Congress to take issue on the matter. This must be stopped. We can no longer sit by and allow this agency to increase unemployment in this country.

Giving this material to needy nations is in keeping with the generosity of the American people. But when this leads to enrichment of black marketeers in Asia and unemployment at home, then it is time that we step in and say in terms that need no clarification that this "public be damned" policy of A.I.D. bureaucrats be stopped immediately.

WERTHAN BAG CORP.,
JOHN WALLACE.

In response, Dr. Hannah replied as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT,
Washington, D.C., November 12, 1969.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RODINO: Thank you for your letter of September 11, 1969, and the enclosures, particularly a letter to you from Mr. John Wallace dated September 11. This correspondence deals with the question of bagging fertilizer financed by A.I.D. for export to such countries as India, Pakistan and Indonesia. I have not replied earlier pending outcome of discussions held between your staff and your constituent. However, our staffs have agreed that we should now respond to your letter.

For several years, A.I.D. has financed certain types of fertilizer (such as ammonium sulfate and diammonium phosphate) for shipment from U.S. ports in bulk. Such fertilizer was bagged in the receiving country at its own expense. This method of shipment has made it possible for A.I.D. to supply considerably larger quantities of fertilizer for the same amount of money. Not only did the receiving countries pay for the bagging, but savings were also realized on ocean freight. We believe that these efforts to reduce the cost of aid to the U.S. Government, and to have the aid-receiving countries bear a portion of that cost, are consistent with the intentions of Congress.

In the recent past, an American company has brought into production a urea plant in Alaska owned jointly with Japanese interests. It inquired of A.I.D. whether, under our regulations, A.I.D. could finance urea produced in Alaska, including the cost of bagging, if the urea was shipped in bulk from Alaska and bagged in Japan for shipment to the recipient country. The company raised this question in the context of an interpretation of A.I.D. Regulation 1 which governs most of the Agency's commodity import programs.

The General Counsel's office of A.I.D informed the company that under A.I.D.'s basic procurement regulations neither bagging material nor the cost of bagging are regarded as "components" within the meaning of the regulations dealing with componentry limitation, which restricts the inclusion of physical components within a product to 10% of the cost of the product financed by A.I.D. Accordingly, the fertilizer which the company proposed to bag in Japan would not be rendered ineligible for A.I.D financing by virtue of A.I.D.'s componentry limitation.

Regulation 1 applies to all commodities financed by A.I.D., and is, as a legal matter, interpreted uniformly for all commodities. The legal ruling would, of course, apply to any manufacturer or exporter of fertilizer. It is, as a legal matter, consistent with the Agency's long-standing practice to permit the use of free-ports or bonded warehouses for packaging and distribution where American manufacturers and exporters find that distribution from such points outside the United States and outside the customs territory of third countries reduces the cost of a product to their customers and thus favors their competitive position in the world market. We, therefore, believe that A.I.D.'s existing rules and the interpretation given them are in the interest of the American export trade.

While there are thus no legal obstacles to deliveries of commodities of U.S. source from free ports and similar installations, specific arrangements between A.I.D. and importing countries frequently preclude such transactions. In the case of fertilizer, most countries, including the largest importers of A.I.D.-financed fertilizers (India, Pakistan, and Indonesia) purchase bagged fertilizer only on the basis of delivery "FOB US Port". Under procedures for fertilizer purchases with those countries, which must be approved by A.I.D., they could not, and do not purchase fertilizer bagged in a third country. We have no present intention to change this policy, although, of course, if a process should be developed by which we could save substantial funds we would want to weigh the facts against the policy you and we share as a general rule, i.e. that U.S. funds should be spent for U.S. procurement.

In his letter to you, Mr. Wallace makes several points with which I am unable to agree, and I would like to comment briefly on each of these.

Mr. Wallace states, first of all, that "it is a matter of record these nations ["the have-not nations"] have not paid the interest on so-called loans." It is a matter of record that almost all countries with which A.I.D. and its predecessor organizations have entered into loan agreements have paid interest on the loans when due and are paying the installments on principal as they mature. If you desire, we would be glad to provide information on the relatively few loans which are delinquent.

Mr. Wallace further asserts that "when we ship fertilizer in bulk seven percent of the shipment disappears between the time it leaves the fertilizer plant and is loaded on ship in one of our ports." I have no information on such losses, but assuming the accuracy of Mr. Wallace's figure, you should know that purchases financed by A.I.D. are made on the basis of delivery "FOB vessel." Therefore, only the fertilizer actually tallied at the port and loaded on board is paid for from A.I.D. loans, and any losses occurring prior to loading on board a ship are to the account of the manufacturer or his agents.

Mr. Wallace goes on to assert that "at least one-third of the bulk shipments disappear into the black market at the recipient port." Since, in the last few years, fertilizer has come into more abundant supply in the principal importing countries, such as India and Pakistan, so-called "black market" sales have become increasingly rare.

Mr. Wallace further asserts that "fertilizer shipped in bulk loses its potency in transit because it is hydroscopic and absorbs moisture." As mentioned earlier, some types of fertilizers, such as ammonium sulfate and diammonium phosphate, absorb moisture only to a negligible extent and buyers and sellers of those types of fertilizers have found shipment in bulk suitable, whether A.I.D. is involved in the financing or not. Thus A.I.D.'s practice is consistent with that of the trade generally.

We have not yet found a method suitable for bulk shipments of urea and have not financed such shipments. Whether shipment in specially designed vessels or any other special method of shipping urea in bulk over long distances is economically feasible has not yet been demonstrated.

Mr. Wallace states that local bagging overseas involved "unprinted bags". A.I.D. regulations do not require that the bags so used bear A.I.D. markings, although there are markings.

To sum up, A.I.D. has permitted bulk shipments of certain types of fertilizer for some time under arrangements from which both the A.I.D. recipients and the U.S. Government gain. A.I.D. has not amended its rules either recently or as a concession to one manufacturer; A.I.D. has furnished a legal interpretation of its regulations, which would be applicable to all manufacturers, but that legal interpretation does not, in and of itself, permit a fertilizer manufacturer to ship from a U.S. port in bulk when the specifications call for fertilizer in bags "FOB U.S. Port". Under current purchasing practices this is the normal specification.

I hope the foregoing comments will clarify the issues and A.I.D.'s current policies. Since Chairman Morgan of the House Foreign Affairs Committee has also expressed an interest in this matter, I am sending him a copy of this letter.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN A. HANNAH.

Since Mr. Wallace, who works on a day-to-day basis with the problems of supplying jute bags for overseas fertilizer shipments, disagrees so fundamentally with AID, I asked him to respond to Dr. Hannah's letter. He complied as follows:

WERTHAN BAG CORP.,
Nashville, Tenn., November 21, 1969.

Congressman PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
Rayburn Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PETE: As I noted on Tuesday the letter from A. I. D. is certainly unsatisfactory, now I shall respond for your files and also for Chairman Morgan's file.

In reply to their statement, second paragraph, page three, it is true that most of, "the have-not nations" have made some interest payments; I think they should forward the record of India and Pakistan during the past decade.

Regarding the next paragraph: If this statement is of no interest to A. I. D., then they wasted an afternoon of industry representatives complaining about this loss and seeking a solution. That meeting was in June 1968, at the Greenbrier Hotel, White Sulphur Springs. The meeting was called by Mr. John Osgathorpe, at the request of the Indian delegation. The proceedings were taped.

Concerning the next paragraph, my figure of loss of product in the recipient nation was on the low side. At least there is an admission that black market operations have existed, a fact they always denied.

I can assure you that while the supply of fertilizer has increased they will not have enough material to meet their needs during the lifetime of a baby born today.

I never suggested or implied the ammonium sulphate be shipped in bags. It is the testimony of A. I. D. officials a couple of years ago who fought you tooth and nail when they insisted that unless a multiwall bag insert with a moisture barrier was used as opposed to a cheaper polyethylene liner that the material would lose much of its potency.

Now they are shipping this material in bulk and bagging it overseas in unprinted bags. Until now they denied that such bags were unprinted. This is a loose policy, bags are half to two-thirds filled and it is up to A. I. D. to explain where the remainder of the cargo disappears.

It is my contention that the purchasing of bags overseas increases unemployment in bag plants, and also the stevedores.

The textile industry is the sickest major industry in the country.

If this policy is correct then why does not the Defense Department purchase all of its requirements for sheets, uniforms, blankets and tents in Hong Kong?

Warmest regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN WALLACE.

Mr. Speaker, obviously we have a situation here where there is rather substantial disagreement over what should be matters of ascertainable fact. A number of questions are certainly in order.

First of all I can personally testify to the fact that over 2 years ago Mr. Wallace brought to me evidence that AID was requiring expensive overpackaging of diammonium phosphate by calling for a burlap bag with a five-layer multiwall paper insert. This very expensive combination of bag and insert was specified for the principal reason of keeping out moisture, which if allowed to penetrate the fertilizer would sap it of its strength and cake it into a solid piece almost as strong as concrete.

Mr. Wallace proposed the substitution of a polyethlene liner, much cheaper and fully adequate as a moisture protector for the highly hydroscopic diammonium phosphate. After the intervention of the then Inspector General for Foreign Assistance, and the Administrator for Southeast Asia AID in fact changed their specifications and subsequently have been saving American taxpayers many thousands of dollars yearly.

The point, however, is that AID firmly believed diammonium phosphate required heavy bagging care and attention to preserve it from moisture penetration.

The following year at a meeting of the National Plant Food Institute in White Sulphur Springs, the Indian delegation announced that this particular material, diammonium phosphate, would soon be shipped in bulk instead of bags. This led to a heated exchange between bag representatives and the Indians, but now, true to their threat, a situation exists in which AID has changed the specifications of diammonium phosphate to bulk shipment. They no longer talk about protecting the product from the elements.

Since the nature of this fertilizer has not changed, one can only wonder how AID managed to completely reverse itself, for in Administrator Hannah's reply to my earlier inquiry, he stated:

> Some types of fertilizer, such as . . . diammonium phosphate, absorb moisture only to a negligible extent and buyers and sellers . . . have found shipment in bulk suitable . . . Thus AID's practice is consistent with that of the trade generally.

In addition to the above, the "bag versus bulk" controversy has never been satisfactorily researched and competently answered.

Mr. Wallace contends that for efficient handling, product protection, correct cargo identification, proper weights, and domestic employment the best course to follow in order to cut waste and aid domestic employment is to bag all hydroscopic fertilizer in the United States. He contends that the combined added expenses of bulk shipments due to additional port costs and black market operations brings the total price up to the level of bagging the material in the United States. And, aside from the economics, he feels that only through U.S. bagging can the proper U.S. origin identification be maintained.

I believe, also, that one would find the American public supporting the policy of marking every bag of fertilizer, or any other material shipped under the AID program, with a clear indication of U.S. origin. Administrator Hannah's admission that AID regulations do not require material bagged overseas to bear AID markings is a policy in need of immediate administrative correction.

I understand that the Indian stevedores who handle U.S.-origin bagged fertilizer use steel hooks to unload the material. This practice, of course, tears up many bags with a resultant loss of valuable fertilizer. The Indian farmer then receives a badly damaged bag of U.S. fertilizer. Iron Curtain countries, however, seem to fare much better, and there is at least a suspicion that the political coloration of the Indian stevedore unions has a great deal to do with the situation.

There are other questions, of course, that need clear and decisive policy determinations. U.S. bag and fertilizer industries, for example, are justifiably disturbed over the so-called Indian fishing expeditions. This costly practice occurs when the Indian Government offers tenders for thousands of tons of U.S. fertilizer, only to subsequently cancel before the award date because they believe they can get the material cheaper in some other country.

In the meantime, U.S. fertilizer manufacturers, their agents and bag manufacturers have wasted valuable time and money. There is no question of lack of competition in the United States, only a question of playing the international market at the expense of U.S. suppliers. Once a tender is offered the lowest bidder should receive the award. AID, after the difficulties it has encountered from a skeptical Congress, should be interested in gaining public support. And a good place to begin is with U.S. business interests that have participated in AID-financed programs.

CITY LIVING CIRCA 1985?

HON. LOUIS C. WYMAN

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is incomprehensible to me that those who live in urban areas with the direction of those whom they have chosen to lead them for the moment, cannot create attractive, enlightened, dynamic, and progressive urban environments in even the most blighted neighborhoods. Massive—although admitted inadequate—Federal funding is standing by to assist. Local funding alternatives also exist. Each national administration in recent years has had its urban crash programs from model cities to housing.

Yet somehow, somewhere, the individual verve on the part of urban inhabitants seem to be lacking. Can it be that the senses of those who live along city canyons have become dulled to the point of apathy? Does the discouraging example of disinterested neighbors appear insurmountable?

To get the job done in metropolitania there are certain fundamental ingredients for success. These are:

First. An intelligent, workable, plan with an identifiable attractive objective.

Second. Interest and support from affected residents and businesses.

Third. Time limitations sufficiently realistic to require expedition and give monthly proof of specific accomplishment.

Fourth. Legislative authorization to representative local groups to impose meaningful sanctions and to use powers of eminent domain.

Fifth. Satisfactory temporary housing for those affected with options to return as desired.

Sixth. Specific and substantial penalties upon individuals and corporations who willfully noncomply with the community effort.

Seventh. Federal matching assistance fundwise but without sole Federal funding, with appropriate standards providing ample local options for variances.

Eighth. Awareness that solutions as well as plans must of necessity vary substantially from city to city.

Failing specific and positive direction and development of some such permanent solution to continuing urban crises, David Broder's column in today's Washington Post suggests the appalling possibilities of tomorrow's urban fortress Americana. As Mr. Broder points out, tax relief would indeed be a dubious bargain if these conditions are to be a long-range consequence.

The column follows:

TAX RELIEF A DUBIOUS BARGAIN IF CITIES DIE IN WAVE OF CRIME

(By David S. Broder)

Last week's report from the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence makes a point that is terribly pertinent to the current Senate debate on the tax bill—a point that has been largely overlooked.

The commission headed by Dr. Milton Eisenhower, in its study of "crime in the streets," the epidemic of violence that afflicts the major cities and fosters the politics of fear, said there are only two ways of dealing with the problem.

Either society and government will make the expenditure of public funds needed to combat crime and to eliminate its causes or individual families will buy as much protection for themselves as they can afford.

The consequences of the choice are enormous—and the tax bill is an important part of the choice, because it represents the biggest decision on national priorities Congress will make this year.

In its present form (even without the additional tax-reduction amendments Sen. Albert Gore is sponsoring) it embodies a political compromise, to procure a limited amount of tax reform at a substantial cost in federal revenues.

The reforms—many of them worthwhile in themselves—would bring the government something over $6 billion a year of extra revenue, when fully implemented. To close these loopholes, it is proposed that more than $9 billion a year of tax cuts be granted. About $625 million of the cuts would go to the poor families, who would be relieved of their income tax obligations by the bill. But the vast bulk of the tax relief would go into the pockets of the middle- and upper-income families as a subsidy to further private consumption.

It is this decision to give private spending priority over public investment that has largely escaped challenge in congressional debate. Belatedly, the administration and some members of the Joint Economic Committee have questioned the inflationary aspects of the scheduled tax cuts. But few voices have been heard from either party challenging the basic assumption that private spending has priority over public.

Yet that question must be raised when one considers the Eisenhower Commission's description of what the "private spending" solution to the crime problem means to the future of our country.

If individuals are left to cope with the problem of providing safety for themselves, the commission says, central business districts will be inhabited only during daytime "and will be largely deserted except for police patrols during nighttime hours."

"High-rise apartment buildings and residential compounds, protected by private guards and security devices, will be fortified cells for upper-middle and high-income populations living at prime locations in the cities . . ."

In the suburbs, the commission says, "ownership of guns will be almost universal; homes will be fortified by an array of devices from window grills to electronic surveillance equipment; armed citizen volunteers in cars will supplement inadequate police patrols in neighborhoods closer to the central city, and extreme left-wing and right-wing groups will have tremendous armories of weapons which could be brought into play, with or without any provocation.

"High-speed, patrolled expressways will be sanitized corridors connecting safe areas, and private automobiles . . . will be routinely equipped with unbreakable glass, light armor and other security features. Inside garages or valet parking will be available at safe buildings in or near the central city. Armed guards will ride shotgun on all forms of public transportation."

Meanwhile, the report says, "the ghetto slum neighborhoods will be places of terror, with widespread crime, perhaps completely out of police control during nighttime hours . . . Between the unsafe, deteriorating central city . . . and the network of safe prosperous areas and sanitized corridors, there will be not unnaturally, intensifying hatred and deepening division."

That is a description of a hellish America, a society living in constant fear, a society that could not possibly sustain for long the habits and institutions of freedom and self-government. But it is not so different from the cities of today that anyone can believe it is exaggerated.

What is the alternative? The Eisenhower Commission, like every other body that has looked at the problem, says there simply must be a massive commitment of resources—doubling the amount we spend on the criminal justice system and making billions of dollars available to improve housing, education and job opportunities in the slums that produce most of our urban crime.

Those billions, of course, are the slums Congress is preparing to return to the taxpayers—as an inducement to accept some small steps toward equity in the tax system.

It is a dubious bargain.

OEO LEGAL SERVICES PROGRAM IN JEOPARDY

HON. LAURENCE J. BURTON

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. BURTON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion in recent weeks concerning the controversial Murphy amendment which was added at the last minute to the Senate-passed OEO authorization bill. The leading newspaper in my district, the Ogden Standard-Examiner, commented on the issues involved in this dispute in its lead editorial of Wednesday evening, November 19, 1969. I am pleased to call this editorial to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress:

LEGAL SERVICES FOR POOR THREATENED

One of the most successful programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity—its legal services branch—is threatened with virtual extinction unless the U.S. House of Representatives rallies to the side of the nation's poor.

The Senate has already approved an OEO appropriation containing a last-minute amendment by Sen. George Murphy, R-Calif., that would jeopardize the ability of attorneys to ignore political implications when serving the impoverished.

Sen. Murphy admitted during debate on the measure that "in the speed of writing the amendment, I have not had a chance to even read the language which the staff has included." However, he stuck by the change—acting at the request of his former entertainment colleague, Gov. Ronald Reagan of California.

As passed by the Senate, the Murphy amendment would give each governor the power to veto—in whole or in part—any OEO legal services program in his state, even a pending law suit, without giving a formal reason.

This gubernatorial veto power has been attacked by a number of legal organizations, including the American Bar Association and the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association.

The Bar Association resolution noted that the ABA "supports and continues to encourage every lawyer in the exercise of his professional responsibility to represent any client or group of clients in regards to any cause, no matter how unpopular.

"The American Bar Association deplores any action or statement by any government official who attempts to discourage or interfere with the operation or activities of any properly constituted organization which provides legal services to the community . . .," the resolution stated.

The threat to the OEO agency has possible repercussions in our part of Utah.

The Legal Services office in Ogden has four attorneys and six other staff members, aided by volunteers from among our community's legal profession, who so far this year have considered 1,450 applications for aid. Many of the requests seek help on housing problems. The office played a leading role in changing methods for selection of juries in Weber County to assure equal representation for all taxpayers.

We concur with The Washington Post and the New York Times that, as the Post put it, "a governor should not be given power to veto or to intimidate through a threat of a future veto any project that is designed to bring equal rights to all Americans."

ERNEST GRUENING'S PLAN TO END THE WAR IN VIETNAM

HON. WILLIAM F. RYAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the conflict in Vietnam, Ernest Gruening, former Senator from Alaska, has been a strong and active voice against American involvement in Vietnam.

Senator Gruening courageously opposed the escalation of the war by the Johnson administration. He realized, even then, that U.S. participation in the war would only bring tragedy to Vietnam as well as to this Nation.

Unfortunately, Senator Gruening no longer serves in the U.S. Senate. He has not, however, silenced his opposition to the continued presence of American fighting men in Vietnam.

In the November 27 issue of the New York Times, a letter to the editor from Senator Gruening appeared in support of immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Vietnam.

I am inserting this letter in the RECORD. I urge all my colleagues to give careful consideration to what Senator Gruening suggests in his letter:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
November 24, 1969.

FOR WITHDRAWAL NOW

TO THE EDITOR: Dean Acheson, in your Nov. 24 issue supporting President Nixon's Vietnam policy, concludes by saying:

"If there is a better plan than the President's, let's hear it."

There is a much better plan. It is to accept Senator George Aikens proposal made months ago for the United States to declare we have won the war; then we should pull out just as rapidly as we can. Senator Charles Goodell's bill to end the U.S. military presence by Dec. 1, 1970 would carry out that purpose. I know all of the arguments against a unilateral withdrawal, but the fact is that President Nixon's Nov. 3 plan will not only not end the war but will prolong it.

Our boys will continue to die in vain and the costly drain on our resources to the exclusion of most of our vital domestic programs will continue. There will be no peace by negotiation because our adversaries feel quite understandably that there is nothing to negotiate.

Sooner or later withdrawal without further ado will become inevitable. Why not now before we sacrifice needlessly more American lives, kill more South and North Vietnamese, destroy more of the land we are allegedly "saving," and foster ever deepening dissent at home?

ERNEST GRUENING,
Former U.S. Senator from Alaska.

URGES DEFEAT OF "MURPHY AMENDMENT"

HON. JAMES C. CORMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I spoke out against the so-called "Murphy amendment" to Senate bill S. 3016. At that time I brought to the attention of the House Members a resolution adopted by the Los Angeles County Bar Association Board of Trustees strongly opposing the Senate action in including this amendment in its bill to provide for the continuation of economic opportunity programs.

Recently, nine law school deans from the State of California issued a statement urging defeat of the "Murphy amendment" from the Senate bill. These gentlemen believe the amendment is inconsistent with the canons of professional ethics and professional responsibility which are essential to the proper functioning of our traditional system of justice. It should also be noted that these gentlemen oppose any limitation on the legal services program. I fully agree with the statements made by these nine law school deans from my own State.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12321, to authorize continued programs under the Economic Opportunity Act, comes to the floor for consideration this week. The committee very wisely did not include any version of the "Murphy amendment" in its bill. However, it is expected that an attempt will be made to offer such an amendment to the House bill during floor debate.

As we begin consideration of this legislation, I wish to add the voices of these nine law school deans to the growing opposition to the "Murphy amendment," and urge the attention of my colleagues to their statement:

STATEMENT OF CALIFORNIA LAW SCHOOL DEANS

We strongly urge the defeat of the amendment to S. 3016 which grants State Governors an absolute veto over Legal Services Programs. The amendment is intended to allow Governors to bar particular types of legal actions.

As Deans of the law schools educating most of California's future lawyers, we are deeply concerned about the impact of this amendment upon the ideals and practice of law in this State and the Nation. It is inconsistent with the Canons of Professional Ethics which we endeavor to instill in our students. It constitutes a direct infringement upon the independence and professional responsibility which are essential to the proper functioning of our traditional system of justice.

This amendment has been opposed by most representatives of the legal community, including the unanimous action of the American Bar Association's Board of Governors. It is also opposed by the Judicial Conference of the United States under Chief Justice Warren Burger, by the National Legal Aid and Defender Association delegates and board, by the American Bar Association's Section on Individual Rights and Responsibilities, and by the President of the Association of American Law Schools. We join in opposing the amendment for these further reasons:

(1) Any limitation on the Legal Services Program threatens law and order by closing a peaceful channel for the redress of the grievances of the poor.

(2) Preventing poor people from maintaining legal action against their government undermines the American system of a government of law in which no official is beyond legal review.

(3) Granting State Governors an absolute veto over Legal Services Programs almost assuredly will result in a substantial, or indeed total, denial of legal assistance to the disadvantaged in a number of states.

Dated: November 1969.

INDIANS DENIED DAY IN COURT; A TRAVESTY OF JUSTICE

HON. JERRY L. PETTIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. PETTIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a matter which both perplexes and angers me. Why is it that a proud and mighty U.S. Government insists continuously on trampling on the rights of the American Indian? How can it be, I wonder, that such a compassionate and affluent Nation will annually pour out billions of dollars' worth of aid to a motley variety of countries and then turn around and treat the Indians—the earliest natives of these United States—with such brutal disregard?

To the shame of America, there are already too many such instances on file and now I find myself having to add still another citation to this inglorious record. I refer specifically to the attempted grant by the Bureau of Land Management of the Department of the Interior to the State of California of 1,500 acres of highly valuable land occupied by the Fort Mojave Indian Tribe since time immemorial and to which they claim title. This attempted "giveaway" of the Mojave lands, instituted 10 years ago, is a bleak and sordid story of an entrenched bureaucracy seeking to sustain an unconscionable series of bumbling acts which can best be described as amoral.

The Fort Mojaves have attempted several times, unsuccessfully, to use their proper legal rights to protest this acquisition. Their efforts have been aborted by a series of delays, postponements and indecision. Never have they had their day in court. Then, in October, a hearing on the Indians' case was scheduled for November 18. Now allow me to quote from an October 14 opinion from Mitchell Melich, the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior:

The Director of the Bureau of Land Management is instructed to schedule a hearing on November 18, 1969; he is to appoint the hearings examiner who, in turn, will inform the parties as to the time and place of the hearing. No postponement or continance will be granted.

Yet the Solicitor's office shortly proceeded in typical callous fashion to abrogate its own dictum by allowing the Attorney General of California to have another continuance, until December 15. That cynical decision was then followed by the ultimate in deception and discrimination. At the pretrial hearing called by the hearing examiner, the Mojaves were told that the proceeding was not a hearing de novo; moreover, the Mojaves were told that the record of the proceedings from which arose the "giveaway" decision, would remain a part of the reconvened proceedings, although the Mojaves could cross-examine the witnesses who had testified at the "giveaway" proceedings.

That is an outright contradiction of a promise made at a meeting on March 21 of this year in the Office of the Secretary of the Interior, with Senator Alan Cranston of California and members of his staff; Mr. Raymond Simpson, counsel for the Mojaves; four members of the Mojave tribe, and myself. But though the Secretary arranged for the meeting, he disdained joining the gathering himself and designated some lackey to represent him. This individual stated very plainly that he had the authority to speak for the Secertary and he proceeded to inform us that a hearing de novo would be granted the Mojaves.

Under that assumption, the following telegram was dispatched to Secretary Hickel confirming the understanding:

MARCH 21, 1969.

HON. WALTER HICKEL,
Secretary of the Interior, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On behalf of the Fort Mojave Indians, their counsel, Raymond Simpson and myself, I wish to express deep appreciation for the meeting you arranged today on our behalf. We are particularly grateful that, after a wait of two years, you have promised a decision by April fifteenth on this critical matter of the swampland application. We are aware of the tremendous responsibilities that any Secretary bears when first assuming office. Therefore, we are doubly grateful for this prompt promise of action. Best personal regards.

JERRY L. PETTIS,
Member of Congress.

Now that promise has been broken again. The Indians still have not had their day in court and I call now on the Secretary for an explanation of this contemptible conduct. What has happened, I wonder, to the man who used to visualize himself as the champion of the Indians and Eskimos when he was the Governor of Alaska? Has Potomac fever so dimmed his perspective?

Simply stated the Mojaves are being denied the due process of law; they are not getting their long-awaited and justifiable day in court. The ground rules for the proposed hearing are so restrictive that it is virtually a kangaroo court. And what it amounts to is a shoddy attempt by the present incumbents in the Department of the Interior to legalize a bad and unjust decision made long ago by some incompetent bureaucrat.

Can we wonder then why the Indian has come to consider his white brother as fork tongued? Considering everything, I think it is a charitable description.

It is my intention to secure a just solution of this matter and perhaps in so doing focus some badly needed attention, by the Congress and the public, on those appointive officials who feel so free to disregard and abuse the rights of our Indians.

What follows is a precise and comprehensive document of the sad history of this case and, Mr. Speaker, I would invite our colleagues to give it their careful attention:

From the standpoint of the Mojaves the calculated seizure of their lands commenced, unbeknownst to them, 10 years ago. By a letter dated April 24, 1959, California filed its application to have the lands which the Mojaves claim as part of their ancient homeland, declared subject to the so-called Swamp and Overflow Act of 1850, which would recognize title in California. Notice of California's 1959 application was neither given to the Mojaves nor to the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Some 5 years later the Bureau of Land Management on September 30, 1964, rejected California's April 1959 application for the lands. Notice of this action was not given to either the Mojaves or to the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

By its 1963 opinion the Supreme Court in the case of Arizona against California, refused to rule upon the disputed boundary of the Fort Mojave Indian Reservation which directly involved the lands to which the Mojaves at all times have laid claim. To have the disputed boundary resolved—evidencing the title of the Mojaves to the lands in question—the Bureau of Indian Affairs by a memorandum dated December 7, 1964, requested the appropriate officials of the Department of the Interior to undertake a resurvey of it. This latter date becomes increasingly important as the sequence of events will reveal.

Although the request for a resurvey of the lands in question was pending before the Department of the Interior, the following events and actions transpired:

On December 13, 1965—a full year after the request to resolve the boundary dispute—California renewed its application for the lands and requested a hearing provided for in the Swamp and Overflow Act; no notice of this application was given to either the Mojaves or the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

January 24, 1966, is the date that the Department of the Interior granted California's application to be heard in regard to its claim that the lands in question were subject to the Swamp and Overflow Act. No notice was given to the Indians or the Bureau of Indian Affairs of that Department order.

April 25, 1966—a notice of hearing was given to all interested parties—with the exception of the Indians and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

September 19, 1966, is the date of the actual hearing in Sacramento, California. The Mojave Indians and the Bureau of Indian Affairs were denied notice of the hearing and denied an opportunity to be heard at it.

February 10, 1967, is the date of an opinion rendered by the Solicitor's Office responding to the December 7, 1964, request for a survey of the lands in question, in which it was declared: "In my opinion, there is no legal justification for a resurvey of the 1928 western boundary."

March 15, 1967—shortly after the Solicitor's opinion of February 10, 1967, denying the request for a resurvey of the lands involved—is the date when the hearing examiner for the Bureau of Land Management declared in effect that title to the 1,500 acres claimed by the Mojaves, resided in the State of California. No notice of this decision of March 15, 1967, was given either to the Mojaves or the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Early in July of 1967—quite by accident—the Bureau of Indian Affairs learned of the "giveaway" of the 1,500 acres of land to California.

July 11, 1967—the Bureau of Indian Affairs filed a motion to intervene in the proceedings which resulted in giving California the 1,500 acres, the matter then being on appeal by the Bureau of Land Management.

August 9, 1967, the Mojaves, through their attorney, likewise petitioned to intervene in the proceedings.

There ensued a year-long struggle by the Mojaves and the Bureau of Indian Affairs to have their day in court—a trial de novo.

August 14, 1968, the Solicitor in an order (a) denied the Bureau of Indian Affairs' petition to intervene—alleging it had been represented at the hearing by the Solicitor's Office; (b) gravely restricting the Mojaves their demanded right to a day in court, the Solicitor required that there first be considered and determined by the Secretary of the Interior a most complex question of law, namely: If the Mojaves held aboriginal title in 1850 to the 1,500 acres of land, would the Swamp and Overflow Act have application to the land, as claimed by California? (c) only after the Secretary of the Interior had determined that complex legal question would the Secretary decide whether the Mojaves would be heard relative to the Swamp and Overflow question and then, in effect, only if it was decided that the boundary dispute alluded to above was resolved in the Mojaves favor, which, as stated, had already been resolved against them by the Solicitor's opinion of February 10, 1967.

Of great importance in regard to the Solicitor's decision of August 14, 1968, is the fact that the decision purported to establish the Secretary of Interior as a court of law to determine the far-reaching "threshold" question.

Another year of struggle was consumed by the Mojaves now fighting alone because the Bureau of Indian Affairs was not permitted to intervene.

Denial by the Solicitor in the August 14, 1968, decision of the right of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to intervene in the proceedings in question, in addition to grievously injuring the Mojaves, was this shocking result:

It constituted action by the Solicitor's office which defeated the will of Congress by precluding the Bureau created by the Congress to assist the Indians in the performance of its function as declared by the Congress.

As the Solicitor's tactics against the Mojaves unfolded, this incredible fact came to light: The member of the Solicitor's staff whose opinion of February 10, 1967—immediately antecedent to the giveaway opinion of March 15, 1967—was writing opinions antagonistic to the Mojaves and otherwise participating in the matter. When this grave conflict came to light, the attorney for the Mojaves immediately filed a motion to have that member of the Solicitor's office disqualified by reason of his earlier opinion to antipodal to the Mojaves interest. January 23, 1969, is the date when the motion of the Mojaves to disqualify was denied by the Solicitor.

To fall into the procedural pit created by the Solicitor would have been fatal to the Mojaves. As a consequence they renewed their petition for a trial de novo denying that the Secretary had the power to render a legal decision regarding the threshold question and at all costs to avoid being caught by the cat-and-mouse tactics being used by the Solicitor against the Mojaves.

Noting the shameful practices indulged in against the Mojaves, I interposed objections to the Solicitor and demanded the Mojaves have their day in court—a trial de novo and I was promised a trial de novo by the Solicitor's office.

October 14, 1969—the Solicitor's office reversed itself—declaring that the August 14 decision, purporting to constitute the Secretary of the Interior a court of law with power to render a legal opinion respecting the "threshold" question, was in error. In that opinion, reversing the August 14 opinion, the Solicitor's office declared:

(a) The "giveaway" decision of March 15, 1967, declaring title to the Mojave lands to be in California, was vacated. (b) It also stated, in effect: The Mojaves have petitioned for a trial de novo and a new proceeding would be held commencing November 18, 1969 affording to the Mojaves an opportunity to be heard, specifically ruling that: "When the hearing is reconvened, the Tribe (Mojave) and the Bureau (of Land Management) each will be afforded the opportunity to present such evidence as may now be available to them as to the right of the state to the subject lands under the Swamp Land Act, and it is so ordered." (By an opinion dated October 27, 1969, the hearing date on California's request was changed to December 15, 1969.)

Believing justice would be accorded to them under the October 14, 1969, Solicitor's opinion, the Mojaves were joyful at their "victory." However, their joy was short lived. At a pretrial hearing called by the hearing examiner, the Mojaves were told that the proceeding was not a trial de novo; moreover, the Mojaves were told the record of the proceedings, from which arose the "giveaway" decision, would remain a part of the reconvened proceedings, although the Mojaves could cross-examine the witnesses who had previously testified at the "giveaway" proceedings.

In addition, the hearing commissioner likewise sought to secure agreement from the Mojaves, without success, that the now truncated proceedings over which he would preside constitute "due process" of the law, thus curing the denial of the Mojaves of their right to notice of the "giveaway" proceedings and also curing the defect arising from the failure of the Mojaves to be represented at the hearing from which emanated the "giveaway" of Mojave lands.

Further, the hearing examiner denied that the Bureau of Indian Affairs could participate in the now most restrictive proceedings, thus continuing to frustrate the will of Congress which had created the Bureau of Indian Affairs to protect the Indian interests.

November 14, 1969—a final blow to the Mojaves in their struggle to recover their lands was delivered by the Solicitor's office. Responding to the Bureau of Indian Affairs' memorandum seeking to have the boundary dispute referred above resolved in the hearing now set for December 15, 1969, the Solicitor's office wrote the following cryptic memorandum:

> Your memorandum of October 24 concerning the above mentioned subject stated on October 14, we ordered a hearing de novo in regard to the application for patent under the Swamp Land Act of 1850, 43 U.S.C. Sec. 982–984 (1964) by the State of California for certain lands in the state.
> As a matter of fact a hearing de novo was not ordered in this case. The case has been reopened for the purpose of permitting the introduction of additional evidence. The evidence which has already been introduced is a part of the record. Admission of new evidence will, of course, be determined by the Hearing Examiner.

VINCENT P. MANCUSO HONORED

HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the International Association of Lions Clubs endeavors, through exchanges of ideas and services, to foster and maintain peaceful international relationships. In the United States, Lions Clubs are constantly seeking to improve the condition and welfare of all citizens. It seeks expression, in its humane endeavors, to advance the well-being of indigent blind and visually handicapped. In the Greater Cleveland area, various significant services are rendered, and progressive, community achievers who wear the Lions pin of humane recognition, provide meaningful services wherever and whenever possible.

These important services extend to recognitions of nonaffiliated citizens whose efforts are multiplied in effect, through the examples they provide for others.

On Saturday, November 29, 1969, the Heights Lions Club, Inc., presented to an individual its annual Book and Scroll award, conferring title, "Exemplary Citizen, 1969." The award is made to one who provides "extraordinary and varied services—in that such services have inspired emulation, confidence in our American life, and faith in the concept of universal brotherhood."

Recipient of the 1969 award was Vincent P. Mancuso of South Euclid, Ohio. Mr. Mancuso's outstanding record of service covers many years, and has been often lauded for their humanitarian and selfless motivation and tireless dedication. Among recognitions previously received are:

Sir Noble, Order of Alhambra; Sir Knight, Moses Cleaveland General Assembly; Grand Knight, Our Lady of Lourdes Shrine; Knight of the Year, 1967, Gilmour Council 310, Knights of Columbus; Outstanding Man of the Year, 1960, Italian Sons and Daughters of America.

Further, Mr. Mancuso has recently served, for the fifth year, as general chairman of the annual Columbus Day Parade and Banquet in downtown Cleveland. In addition, earlier this month he served as general chairman of the annual benefit banquet-ball for mentally retarded children, an event sponsored each year by the Carmona Caravan of the Order of Alhambra. This wonderful effort resulted in gifts to this fund of $15,000 this year. He has been most aptly described by the chairman of the Heights Lions Club award presentation, Daniel L. Mausser, as, "the irrepressible general chairman of practically everything."

VIETNAM CRISIS

HON. W. R. HULL, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the American people, speaking through yesterday's historic vote in the House of Representatives endorsing the President's peace efforts, have told the world, including the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong, they repudiate proposals for a precipitous pullout from South Vietnam.

The overwhelmingly favorable vote in support of House Resolution 613 directed toward the goal of achieving peace with justice in Vietnam, a resolution which I was proud to cosponsor, demonstrates that the now-fabled silent majority in this country has a voice too. And this voice will not be outshouted by the participants in street demonstrations, who demand that we abjectly capitulate to the Communists by abandoning South Vietnam.

Communist leaders have declared time and time again that they do not expect to take over South Vietnam by force of arms. They do not really believe they can defeat us militarily. Their principal hope, and they admit it, is for a political victory when the American people, weary of its defense of freedom, withholds its support to the Government.

Recognizing this fact, President Nixon accurately noted in his speech to the American people on November 3:

> North Vietnam cannot defeat or humiliate the United States. Only Americans can do that.

Notwithstanding the traitors who parade in the streets waving the flags of the enemy which has killed thousands of young Americans, most Americans will tolerate neither the defeat nor the humiliation of the United States in Vietnam. It is enough that we tolerate the apologists for the Communists.

We intend to achieve peace with justice, and the Congress has signified the American people will not be satisfied with less.

CRIME IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

HON. LAWRENCE J. HOGAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, this is another in a series of statements dealing with crime in the District of Columbia.

Chief of Police Wilson of the District of Columbia recently released the crime index for October 1969.

In July 1969 the Metropolitan Police Department developed a crime trend prediction based on total crime index offenses for 1966, 1967, and 1968. At that time it predicted a crime index rate for fiscal year 1970 of 62,000 crimes. It seems obvious from the October report that that figure will be substantially exceeded this year.

Chief Wilson in discussing the crime index with a group of lawyers in October was predicting a rate of crime of 80,000 by fiscal year 1972. However, the crime rate for October 1969 is 6,063, thus reflecting an annual rate of 72,756, as against an annual rate in October 1968 of 53,724. This is an approximate annual rate of increase in crime in the District of Columbia of 36 percent, an astonishing statistic by any yardstick. If this trend or rate of increase continues, Chief Wilson's figure of 80,000 may be achieved or exceeded next year.

These are grim statistics which I set forth below for the information and enlightenment of all Members of Congress. Of special interest to Members of Congress should be the information that the fifth precinct, in which the Capitol and the House and Senate Office Buildings are located, had the greatest increase in crime than any other precinct in the city, during October.

The crime index follows:

CRIME INDEX FOR OCTOBER 1969

On November 26, 1969, the Office of the Chief of Police released the reported Crime Index Statistics for the month of October 1969. The October statistics show an increase of 3.6% over September 1969. These same figures compared with October 1968 show a 35.4% increase.

Larceny and Auto Theft with 1101 and 1030 offenses reported in October, decreased by 0.8% and 7.5%, respectively, over September 1969. Auto Theft also decreased by 12.6% over July and by 10.4% over August 1969. The continuing decrease in Auto Theft for three consecutive months is significant and may mark the beginning of a downward trend. However, Larceny, with 1085 in July and 1196 in August 1969 does not reflect the same downward trend. The major contributors to the Larceny rate are Larceny from Auto and Larceny from Office buildings.

There was an increase of 192 burglaries or 9.6% over September 1969. The Burglary Prevention Program, instituted in the middle of October, is now in full swing. This program is an effort to encourage the citizens to assist The Police in preventing Burglary and other crimes. Police Department Officials hope that with citizen cooperation, improvements can be expected in future months.

Robbery has continued to increase. In October 1969, 1348 robberies were reported. According to the Robbery Squad, 749 of these or 55.5% were armed robberies. September had 821 armed robberies, thus remaining the high month in this category for 1969 with October ranking second.

In July 1969 the department developed a crime trend prediction based on total Crime Index Offenses for 1966, 1967 and 1968. This prediction indicated a Crime Index Rate of about 62,000 Crime Index Offenses in Fiscal Year 1970. The 12-month total offenses ending with October 1969 was 60,248 which indicates Crime Index Offenses for Fiscal Year 1970 may exceed the initial prediction.

Crime index offenses as related to percentages of total, October 1969

	Number	Percent
Homicide	29	0.48
Rape	35	0.58
Robbery	1,348	22.23
Aggravated assault	338	5.57

Burglary	2,182	35.99
Larceny $50/Over	1,101	18.16
Motor vehicle theft	1,030	16.99
Total, property crimes	4,313	71.14
Total, reported crimes	6,063	100.00

SPEECH OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 2, 1969

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, permit me to join others in paying a warm tribute to our beloved colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KIRWAN) on the occasion of his 83d birthday.

Certainly we all wish this grand gentleman and dedicated public servant a happy birthday—he deserves the best.

MIKE KIRWAN can reflect on his long career of public service with justifiable pride—as Mr. Public Works of America and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Works Appropriations, MIKE KIRWAN has helped to build the muscle and sinews of the Nation's water transportation system. He is a leader in the development of our vast system of flood control projects, in power production, in conservation, and in other areas of resource development in the public interest.

As MIKE KIRWAN observes his birthday, it is fitting and appropriate for us to honor him for his great achievements and accomplishments—and we wish him the best of good luck and good health.

CONGRESSMAN FRANK HORTON PRAISES DR. MARK ELLINGSON'S YEARS AS EDUCATOR AND PRESIDENT OF ROCHESTER INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, educator, president, and community servant—Dr. Mark Ellingson, former president of Rochester Institute of Technology is all these things.

After 33 years, Dr. Ellingson has retired as president of RIT. During this time, the enrollment has grown from 550 full-time students to more than 4,100. He has been the guiding spirit behind the expansion of RIT which has resulted in a beautiful 1,300-acre campus south of Rochester in Henrietta, N.Y.

I am proud to have Dr. Ellingson as a friend. His modesty and the quality of his concern and dedication are exemplary. He has always strived for excellence in student relations and in education, and he has achieved these goals admirably.

Dr. Ellingson came to RIT in 1926. He became economics professor, wrestling coach, and head of the photography department. Ten years later, in 1936, he became president of RIT. Since that time, the school has gained worldwide reputation for its excellence.

Mr. Speaker, on Monday night next week I hope to take part in a special community salute to Mark Ellingson by the leaders of the business, education, government, and industrial community in the Greater Rochester area.

It will be my privilege to give recognition to this distinguished educator and community leader as the representative of those in local, State, and National government. I am sure, that all of my colleagues here join with me in extending to Dr. Ellingson a sincere thank you for a job well done and best wishes for the coming years.

The citizens of the Greater Rochester area and the entire education field owe a great deal to Mark Ellingson. Mr. Speaker, in order for the Members to know just a little of Mr. Ellingson's accomplishment, I would like to share with them a two-part series by Beatrice Collins which appeared in the Brighton-Pittsford, N.Y., Post:

CREATED MODERN RIT: A MODEST LEADER CLOSES HIS DESK

(By Beatrice Collins)

Dr. Mark Ellingson closes his office door next Wednesday retiring after 33 years as president of Rochester Institute of Technology.

Dr. Ellingson of 3940 East Ave., Pittsford, retires with a dream come true—the handsome, new 1,300-acre campus off Jefferson Road, dedicated a year ago.

But the enthusiastic educator, under whose leadership RIT's enrollment has grown from 550 fulltime students to more than 4,100 declines to accept much credit for the steady growth of the school.

The institute grew out of the needs of the community. It has grown naturally in a very favorable environment," Dr. Ellingson said. And it prospered because the industry of Rochester has always had great confidence in it."

Then he added, "I was coincidental with the development of the Institute."

The purpose of RIT, the educator explained in an interview this week, has been to "help young people become competent in a series of occupation fields."

And helping the school in its goal has been a long list of community leaders—in business, industry and civic affairs.

"I hate to start naming names," Dr. Ellingson said, "because there are so darned many of those guys and everyone of them was interested in this community."

However, it is impossible to discuss the progress of RIT without mentioning such community-minded citizens as Frank W. Lovejoy, James Gleason, Thomas Hargrave, and Frank E. Gannett.

"These men were deeply devoted to their community and perfectly willing to utilize part of their profits to better it."

He cited the quality of men like William S. Vaughn, chairman of the Board of Eastman Kodak Co., Kodak president Louis K. Eilers, Joseph C. Wilson of Xerox Corp. and F. Ritter Shumway, a grandson of the founder of Mechanics Institute, forerunner of RIT.

The development of Midtown Plaza by Gilbert McCurdy and Maurice Forman is given by Dr. Ellingson as another achievement by area business leaders.

"This was before urban renewal", he pointed out. "Why do people do this? Well, I'm sure the profit motive is not wholly absent but there's more to it than that."

"People of the community have had their eye on what is good for the community," he said.

These men have maintained the tradition of concern which began with the early Rochester leaders who passed on their concern to the generations coming up, the retiring RIT president said.

"I doubt if this institution could have thrived or prospered in any other community."

Dr. Ellingson added, "I think the soil in this community has been well-cultivated by leadership in business and industry. The Rochester area is different from other areas because of the quality of the men and women who live here!"

He named the Industrial Management Council as one of the significant forces here. This association, made up of most of the businesses and manufacturers in the city, works closely with industry, is something which makes this community unique, he said.

Dr. Ellingson explained that RIT has been guided by a board of trustees, composed mostly of persons from business and industry.

"We have discussed what the community's needs are. Then, working with IMC, we have set up these programs."

In recalling those who have been instrumental in the institution's growth, Mr. Ellingson pointed out that from the beginning, "everyone had one foot in his industry and the other foot out in the middle of the community saying 'What can I do?' "

And they have maintained their interest. The late James Gleason was on RIT's board for 65 years and was 95 when the school made its move for a new campus.

He told us to get 500 acres, not 50 or 60, Dr. Ellingson recalled. "When we told him that we had 1,300 acres, he said, 'That's more like it.' "

"Those guys had characteristic greatness," declared the man who had guided RIT from 1936 until this week.

END OF AN ERA—ELLINGSON REALM AT RIT: "CHANGE—CHANGE—CHANGE"

(By Beatrice Collins)

Dr. Mark Ellingson of Pittsford, newly retired president of Rochester Institute of Technology, offered an explanation for the apparent minimum discontent on that campus.

"This is a professional school," he said.

When one finds students who have decided how they are going to make their career, they are less concerned with revolt and turmoil than those who don't yet know what they want to do.

Dr. Ellingson, sitting behind the massive desk in the contemporary office which he was about to vacate, discussed RIT and its students in an interview a week before his retirement yesterday.

The imposing but genial president, who characterized RIT as "not a traditional school," declared, "I have great faith in the American student—he is better educated and more sophisticated than before."

The key to the comparative calm on the RIT campus may lie in the fact that Dr. Ellingson and the administration have anticipated some of the demands being made by college students today.

On the RIT campus, students sit in on policy-making committees and they also handle 90 per cent of the discipline problems, Dr. Ellingson said. "It is easy to turn over a great many problems to our students."

He added that RIT's students are not passive, "they are very active and they do participate." He said he talked often with the president of student government whom he described as "a very able person."

The graying director of the Institute, which has attained world recognition in many fields, explained that most of the problems on campuses have arisen in the liberal arts colleges, particularly among the history and sociology majors "who don't know where they are going to fit in."

General studies were not ignored, but RIT has capitalized on work experience and was the second institution in this country to have a cooperative work program.

"We've been innovative and a pioneer in this field," Dr. Ellingson said.

He spoke proudly of RIT's School for American Craftsmen. "Few colleges have anything like it."

The visitor waiting to see RIT's president cannot help but be impressed by an unusual tapestry which covers a large wall area in the reception room. The work was designed and woven by Sheila Hicks, a graduate of the school for craftsmen.

Before 1950, RIT did not grant degrees. It was not until the state changed its rules in the system of granting degrees that the local professional school adopted the system.

It was not necessary for the Institute to change materially, said its president, because "there is now a lot of latitude in degree-granting in the state."

RIT has a different attitude from the traditional institutions of higher learning. "We do not admit students unless they are admitted to a specific department," Dr. Ellingson said.

"We take the attitude that it is better for a student to make up his mind and change it later than not to make it up at all," said the man who for many years also coached RIT's wrestling team.

Dr. Ellingson came to Rochester in 1924 to study voice at the Eastman School of Music. Twenty years old then, it took just one year to convince him that "this was a mistake."

He went back to study economics and was offered a job at RIT by a member of the faculty whom he had known in Idaho.

The year was 1926. Ten years later, Mark Ellingson, economics professor, wrestling coach and head of the photography department, was president of RIT.

Much of the emphasis at RIT has been on the position that no citizen can be a firstrate citizen unless he is a productive citizen, Dr. Ellingson pointed out.

"There is no moral equivalent for work—there is a sobering, steadying, maturing influence in work," he said.

He spoke of the continuing education program at RIT. Almost all local industries have encouraged employees to continue their education along with their employment, he pointed out. About 2,700 to 2,800 students are working on bachelor's degrees in continuing education alone.

"Education is the key to man's advancement," Dr. Ellingson said firmly, "Education is not like vaccine—one shot doesn't vaccinate you against ignorance."

Of the school's role in today's education, Dr. Ellingson said,"I think the things we are doing are relevant to how our students will live their lives.

"We've changed—changed—changed. This is one thing which has been most characteristic in the years I've been here. We've searched for new and different ways."

It's not difficult to understand why modest Mark Ellingson has been such a successful educator. At RIT he has been accessible to the students, both in the sports program and as president, and he obviously likes them.

"We have high quality students and they know what they want to do. I am filled with admiration and respect for the young people of today."

WHOSE CRIME IS PINKVILLE?

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, the facts about the alleged Pinkville massacre are still fragmented and incomplete. Moreover, in fairness to the accused, we cannot condemn in advance men who have yet to be tried.

Nevertheless, the apparent efforts of some military officers and Government officials also prompts one to be uneasy about waiting for the results of a trial. At the least, the specter of possible Pinkville should make all Americans of good conscience ponder the implications of our involvement in Vietnam.

Mike Royko recently raised in his column, "Whose Crime is Pinkville?" Mr. Royko's column makes you laugh—but painfully—with tears in your eyes. The column poignantly points up the immorality of a policy that frequently seems to be telling the South Vietnamese that we will save them even if this means destroying them in the process.

The column, which appeared in the Chicago Daily News on November 26, 1969, follows:

WHOSE CRIME IS PINKVILLE?

(By Mike Royko)

Americans should try to avoid getting a guilt complex about the Pinkville incident.

In the difficult process of spreading lasting freedom and peace to other countries, there are bound to be mishaps.

Because Americans are soft-hearted and sentimental, the thing that upsets them most is that a few babies, as well as many women and older children, were among those shot.

Naturally, it is always regrettable when babies are shot. I think most Americans agree that we did not go to Vietnam to shoot babies. That has never been our goal.

But if the majority of babies in Vietnam are to grow up free and in peace, some babies will have to make the supreme sacrifice. It cannot be avoided.

Even if we constantly cautioned our men not to shoot babies, or even adolescents and women (except when fired upon, of course), some babies would be killed.

That's because we must drop bombs and use cannon and rockets and other such weapons. And as precisely as we may aim them, it is very hard to avoid having them land on babies and women now and then.

We can take comfort, though, in knowing that most of the time our men are spared the discomfort of seeing it happen up close. That is one of the blessings of modern aerial warfare.

Something else Americans should keep in mind are the circumstances leading to the shooting of the Pinkville civilians.

It wasn't a case of our men simply walking into a day nursery and opening fire. That would have been intolerable, even if it had been a Viet Cong day nursery.

The Pinkville area is in a notoriously pro-Communist part of South Vietnam, which means those children might very well have grown up to be Communists, if they weren't already.

And surely some of the women and older children in Pinkville were part of the Global Communist Conspiracy to bury us, or at least were fellow travelers. What were they doing in Pinkville anyway?

Some people seem to forget that Marx, Lenin, Stalin, Mao, Ho and Claude Lightfoot were once babies, too. Would any true anti-Communist say he would regret it if Stalin had been a baby in Pinkville?

Another reason Americans became agitated by the Pinkville incident is that most of us have never witnessed the shooting of a child or even a grown woman.

It has been our good fortune and national destiny to have wars for peace and freedom in other countries, such as Vietnam, instead of here in our own land.

But people in many other countries that have had wars aren't nearly as surprised that babies and other such noncombatants die. The Vietnamese are probably less surprised at the Pinkville incident than we are, since such things have been happening to them ever since the battle for their peace and freedom began.

For this reason, Americans should try not to let the Pinkville affair upset them, especially before a holiday. Many babies and their mothers have been killed in Vietnam, and many more will be, before there is a just and an honorable peace.

The news media should try to show restraint. It would be a good idea if they didn't carry such stories at all. They only stir up dissent and make the job of our leaders more difficult.

But if the commentators must talk about the killing of children, the least they can do is be impartial. I have already seen one commentator shake his head and look glum while describing the shooting of those people.

Commentators should avoid looking glum, or raising their eyebrows or trying to sway opinion for or against the killing of babies. The people can decide for themselves if they want babies killed.

And the commentators should be fair and mention that the Communists also have killed a lot of women, children and babies in Vietnam, too.

And they weren't even doing it for peace.

PREVENTING CRIMINAL RECIDIVISM

HON. LOUIS C. WYMAN

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most important single question for society in relation to the continuing crime problem, is what to do with the convicted criminal in order that he—or she—may return to society as a useful citizen? Simple incarceration is not an answer. Neither is long-term confinement with its inevitable exposure to hardened, hopeless criminals.

Commission of crime should never be considered as an open ticket to free psychiatric care, or a prolonged tax-subsidized stay at Mother Uncle's rest home. At the same time there are many who commit crimes who have done so for reasons indicative of a justification in terms of understanding if not in law. When these cases require prosecution and result in conviction there ought to be a way to make it reasonably unattractive to prospective violators yet also reasonably certain that those who can be restored to society will at the very least have exposure to constructive character building during confinement.

In this connection the lead editorial in today's Wall Street Journal emphasizes society's continuing dilemma in an era of rapidly rising crime. I support constructive, broad-based legislation, encouraging and assisting increased Federal-State cooperation in meeting this challenge.

The editorial referred to follows:

UNGLAMOROUS BUT CRUCIAL

We're more than happy to see examples of increasing attention to prison reform. So unglamorous an issue seldom attracts lasting attention and support, but we are convinced it is one of the first prerequisites to any serious efforts toward reducing the problem of crime.

Within the past few weeks, President Nixon has directed the Attorney General to start a study intended to result in a total overhaul of the Federal prison system. The Joint Commission on Correctional Manpower and Training has recommended a considerable expansion of funding for the correctional process. Just as necessary as more money, though, is the kind of public thought and discussion that can clarify the nation's thinking on what prisons and corrections are all about.

Even within the legal process, there is no agreement on what real purpose is served by sending a man to prison. Is it punishment? Is it supposed to rehabilitate him? Is it merely a matter of protecting society by separating dangerous individuals? The metaphysical arguments on these questions can and do go on forever, and it's past time they yielded to cold pragmatism.

The overpowering pragmatic consideration is that a large share of all crime, probably most of it, is committed by repeaters. President Nixon says 40% of all convicts are returned to prison for a second offense. Lowering this repeat rate looms as one of the major keys—perhaps matched only by a more orderly approach to narcotics addiction—to reducing the crime rate. It stands to reason that reducing recidivism ought to be the cardinal objective of the correctional process.

Beyond that obvious line of reasoning, we sense that the fultility of corrections is poisoning the rest of the law enforcement process. The experience of apprehending and convicting criminals and repeatedly finding them back at the same crime certainly must erode the morale of police officers and judges; it's a wonder they are not even more cynical and pessimistic than they tend to be. We also suspect that the ease with which defense attorneys have recently gained rules making convictions more difficult is somehow related to the futility of gaining convictions in the first place.

The conventional wisdom seems to be that cutting the repeat rate is an impossible task. Most of those who assert as much add that the way to deal with crime is to solve all our social problems, as if that were a more feasible alternative. In fact, many other nations do much better in rehabilitating criminals than the United States does, and at least a few experiments in this country also offer some encouragement.

The United States has never, or at least very seldom, actually tried to reduce recidivism. At present a judge sentencing a criminal is typically faced with two alternatives. He can sentence a convict to prison, which scarcely seems the way to help him get along with normal society in a law-abiding way. Or he can grant probation or parole; with the casework loads of probation workers what they are, this usually means releasing the criminal with no effective supervision whatever.

Successful experience with rehabilitation points in quite an opposite direction—having the offenders operate in normal society but under the tightest supervision. The approach is to concentrate on juvenile offenders, get casework levels down to far lower figures, and establish far more programs where offenders are released for work or school during the day, but spend nights in correctional facilities.

These are rather new directions of the American criminal proces. They will not arise spontaneously from a divided sentiment, where half of the public blames society for forcing the poor criminal to break the law, and the other half thinks "getting tough" with criminals will solve everything. As the Nixon Administration studies reforming prisons, it ought also to give some thought to crystalizing public attitudes around rehabilitation as an entirely hardheaded and pragmatic response to the crime problem.

New facilities, more manpower and more funds will be needed, both at Federal and state levels. But they are not likely to come until there is a more cogent public sentiment, until there is a broader understanding that the weak link in law enforcement today is not catching the criminal or trying him, but doing something sensible after he is convicted.

U.S. ARMY DESERTERS

HON. STROM THURMOND

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is an alarming state of affairs when more than 56,000 are listed as deserters from the U.S. Army. In my opinion, these deserters are a disgrace to the uniform and to our Nation. They must be apprehended and punished severely for their crime.

Discipline must be maintained if our Nation expects our Armed Forces to be a potent force for the protection of our country. In my view, most of these desertions border on mutiny. These men are deliberately avoiding hazardous duty while more than 479,000 are serving our country in Vietnam with selfless devotion. When a member of the Armed Forces is absent more than 30 days, it should be prima facie evidence of an intent to remain away. He must be tried for desertion, for the punishment to be commensurate with the abhorrent offense. The penalty for servicemen's defiance of allegiance to our country must be sufficient to deter others.

Mr. President, those who have sought sanctuary in foreign countries rather than serve their country should get the message loud and clear that they face charges of desertion with maximum penalties. Every effort should be made to negotiate with these countries for the return of military deserters so that these criminals can be tried by courts-martial for desertion.

An editorial published in the November 24 issue of the State newspaper in Columbia, S.C., presents an excellent analysis of this national problem. I quote a key point in this fine editorial:

The best prevention is the sure knowledge that fast, firm and fair punishment awaits at the end of a trip over the hill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Extensions of Remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PATH OVER THE HILL MORE POPULAR THAN EVER

Pamper rhymes with scamper and, as far as the U.S. Army is concerned, the relationship seems to go much deeper than that.

One only has to drive out to Fort Jackson and note the attractive brick barracks and other facilities for housing, caring for and training recruits to realize that GI Joe never had it so good. Over and beyond the improved physical facilities the recruits get better pay, shorter hours, more passes or time off, less physical or verbal abuse and other blessings that were not available to his counterpart of a few years ago.

But, unfortunately no one has figured out how to modernize a foxhole or stiffen a spine or make the thought of combat pleasant. The prospect of going to war is apparently the No. 1 reason that the Army's absence-without-leave and desertion rates are the highest since George Washington's "summer soldiers" disappeared at the fall of the first leaf or the sound of the first musket.

When The Wall Street Journal checked into this AWOL derby recently, there were 23,000 men listed as deserters (missing 30 days or more). This is equivalent to a combat division with some support units thrown in.

The Journal cited other uninspiring figures: last year 56,600 soldiers deserted and more than 150,000 were AWOL at one time or the other during the period. This cost the Army 10,000 man-years, hurt morale and forced larger draft calls.

About a tenth of those who went over the hill last year disappeared between the time they finished recruit training and the time they were scheduled to leave for Vietnam. Of course, many leave for all the old familiar reasons—homesickness, dislike of regimentation, marital or financial troubles, etc.

But why is the desertion-AWOL rate twice as high now as it was during the Korean Conflict, another nasty, unpopular Asian war?

Most authorities point to the light punishments being meted out these days. Others put part of the blame on a society that sees nothing particularly wrong with Johnny going over the hill; he might even be a hero to the anti-war set. We might also suggest that these youngsters' parents, by failing to teach discipline and respect in the home, made their contribution.

It is quite possible that the absentee rate will do an about face when the new draft reform law is implemented, which it will soon. A draft lottery, concentrating on the 19-year-olds instead of the older draft eligibles, is fairer and should produce fewer malcontents. As a whole this age group is not beset with as many problems and commitments as the older guys. The late teen years are generally the most convenient for satisfying the military obligation.

But other than that, it's up to the army commanders to tackle this costly and debilitating service sickness. Improved prevention and counseling programs may help. But the best prevention is the sure knowledge that fast, firm and fair punishment awaits at the end of a trip over the hill.

WHAT IS YOUR CIVIC IQ?

HON. BILL NICHOLS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the honor of presenting to Dr. Houston Cole, president of Jacksonville State University, the distinguished George Washington Honor Medal, awarded by the Freedoms Foundation. Dr. Cole was presented this outstanding award for a patriotic speech he delivered last May to the Alabama Federation of Women's Clubs. I would like to share this fine speech entitled "What Is Your Civic IQ?" with my colleagues by having it printed in the RECORD at this point:

WHAT IS YOUR CIVIC IQ?

(By Dr. Houston Cole)

No greater compliment can be paid an individual than to say that he is a good citizen. The term "good citizen" embodies about all of the finer qualities of human nature. It involves gratitude to those in the past who sacrificed "life, fortune, and sacred honor" to provide us the freedom to live, move, worship, and to make our livelihood. It involves a willingness to contribute time, effort, and material substance for the good of all, and it signifies the moral qualities that are basic to civilization.

These are times that demand high-level citizenship. Daily our country faces problems at home and abroad that are complex and baffling. Locally, we must deal with taxation, education, highways, welfare, and many other issues that bear down with increasing intensity.

At the foreign level, the forces of danger constitute a constant threat to our safety and security. It would be unwise indeed for us to be lulled into complacency by the present easing of world tensions. We still face in Communism a determined and vigorous foe, fanatical in its belief in itself, and having world domination only as its religion, that is challenging us to a duel for the future. And there is no prospect in the foreseeable future for the danger to go away.

CIVIC INDIFFERENCE

In this modern world of higher mathematics, complicated technology, and mysterious economics, we cannot afford indifference to and ignorance of the issues that involve the destiny of the nation. Unfortunately, public opinion polls and casual observation would indicate that our civic IQ is not as high as circumstances would demand.

Surveys reveal that only about 10 percent of the American people exhibit any noticeable degree of political activity; about 20 percent can be described as taking some part in political and civic life, while the remaining 70 percent are characterized as dormant.

In one poll, 70 percent of those contacted did not know the length of the term of a U.S. senator, and 56 percent could not name the two senators from their home state. Six months prior to the death of President Kennedy, 45 percent of those polled by a radio station in the west could not identify Lyndon B. Johnson. It is a statistical fact that one-third of our voters do not go to the polls in a presidential election, and only about 50 percent participate in a congressional election.

Good citizenship starts at the community level. If a person demonstrates good qualities of civic responsibility in his own locality, it is a good bet that he will be a good citizen at the state and national levels.

It is not difficult to find examples of civic indifference. As you drive along the highways, take note of the empty beer cans, bottles, papers cups, scraps of paper, and other litter that have been thrown from passing cars. Our public buildings and parks are oftentimes the objects of vandalism, and in many communities there is a widespread reluctance on the part of many to participate in drives and other activities involving community betterment.

A conspicuous example of civic indifference can be found in the reluctance of the average citizen to assist in the enforcement of law. With our crime rate increasing four times that of the population, it would appear that a wide gap exists between the citizen and the police. Our law enforcement officers are handicapped in the performance of their duties because they do not receive the necessary aid and assistance from the public. Spectators will leave the scene of an accident to avoid being summoned into court as witnesses, and many people refuse to report speedsters, bootleggers, vandals and other law violators. It appears at times that our sympathies are more with the offenders than with the offended, more with the lawless than with the law. We might well reexamine our civic morality to determine which side of the law we are taking.

The home, the basic unit of our society, is making too little contribution to our civic welfare. A poll of young mothers with two or more children revealed that 87 percent admitted that they were actually encouraging poor citizenship, economic illiteracy, and a false sense of values on the part of their youngsters. A home in which adults have a healthy and outspoken respect for the law is rarely a home in which juvenile offenders live.

This is no time for the American people to substitute sawdust values for those fundamentals that gave birth, prosperity, freedom, and happiness to the nation. The present calls for a little more emotional attachment and a little less cynicism toward the principles that made this country great.

OTHER ASPECTS OF CITIZENSHIP

Competent citizenship involves more than voting, abiding by the law, and expressed concern for the public good. A person can do all of this and still be an incompetent citizen. Other considerations are involved.

Education is prerequisite to good citizenship. Not all educated people are good citizens, but today a person can hardly perform his civic duties effectively without education. The growing complexity of the problems with which government has to deal demands a high degree of enlightenment. If our is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, it logically follows that the level of governmental action will not rise above the intellectual and moral level of the people.

Another aspect of civic competence involves the habit of thrift. A good citizen is self-supporting. He does not look to relatives, local charity, or government for means on which to exist. This simply means that a person should spend less than he makes during his productive years. Mr. McCawber's theory of economics is still valid: "If a man had twenty pounds a year and spent nineteen pounds, nineteen shillings, and sixpence, he would be happy, but if he spent twenty pounds sixpence, he would be miserable." It has been aptly said:

If you want your father to take care of you, that's Paternalism.

If you want your mother to take care of you, that's Maternalism.

If you want Uncle Sam to take care of you, that's Socialism.

If you want your comrades to take care of you, that's Communism.

If you want to take care of yourself, that's Americanism.

It is a poor citizen who takes the attitude that one can have something for nothing, that success is assured, and that rights exceed responsibilities.

REKINDLE SPIRIT OF PATRIOTISM

There is a prevailing tendency in this country to regard demonstrations of patriotism as "old hat" or obsolete. Promoters of patriotic rallies are oftentimes looked upon as oddballs or seekers of the limelight. Flag waving is in bad taste and those who extol the original and basic principles of America become the butts of laughter or ridicule.

It is fashionable in some "intellectual circles" to debunk the founding fathers and subsequent leaders of the nation. A college professor went to great pains to eliminate the effectiveness of "Washington Crossing the Delaware," a picture that has hung in the classrooms of our nation for many decades. He told a high-school assembly that "it just wasn't so"!—any man who stood up in the boat as Washington was portrayed was sure to have rocks in his head. Another teacher dispelled the aura of the Gettysburg Address by stating Lincoln spent months in preparation rather than using the time that elapsed on the train ride from Washington to Gettysburg.

Is there no place in history for symbols? The play, "Mr. President," a highly patriotic performance, was presented on Broadway a few years ago. It didn't last long because the critics called it "corny."

Some argue that you cannot teach devotion to country. What about Russia? Communism has spread and attained strength because of the deep devotion of its adherents. The people of the Soviet Union have been brought to the point where they willingly forego creature comforts and work longer, harder, and extra hours when the nation calls.

We experience little difficulty in arousing youngsters to a high pitch over an athletic contest. Can we not use the same basic potential to develop in them an enthusiasm for their country so great that they would willingly sacrifice their personal comfort for it?

SUMMARY

Responsible citizenship involves, among other things, gratitude to those who established our freedom and to those who fought to preserve it, intelligent voting, respect for law, high moral values, educational competence, and economic independence.

This is the price the good citizen willingly pays for the freedom to work, to move, to grow, and to increase his status in life. A college student well defined Americanism as that which gives the individual the opportunity to rise as high in life as his ability and willingness to work will permit. In this country, anybody who has what it takes and is willing to give what it takes can rise from the bottom to the top.

SONGMY HORRIFIES THE WHOLE NATION

HON. HASTINGS KEITH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's newspapers have recently been filled with stories about the events in the Vietnamese village of Songmy, where hundreds of civilians were allegedly killed by American troops.

These events, if they are true, raise serious questions that must be answered. The American conscience has been aroused as never before, and the American people will not allow this atrocity to be swept under the rug.

Typical of the press reaction to this unprecedented massacre are two editorials recently run by the Cape Cod and New Bedford Standard-Times. They raise the questions that are gnawing at the mind of America in the aftermath of this event. I hope that my colleagues will read them—and more importantly, I hope that those in positions of responsibility in the military and in the administration will read them—and answer them.

The editorials follow:

SONGMY HORRIFIES THE WHOLE NATION

The massacre at Songmy has sickened and horrified the people.

From President Nixon to the man on the street, comments indicate shock, dismay and a wondering how could it happen.

While the picture is silll confused, and the question of who is to blame still unresotved, there seems no doubt that something appalling did take place at Songmy.

Too many servicemen have come forward telling of their own part in the killing for anyone to dismiss the reports as just another war story without basis or substance. The nation has seen ex-serviceman Paul Meadlo on national television saying that he witnessed the death of about 370 villagers and that he himself had killed 10 to 15 men, women and children in the first round of shooting but lost track afterward.

The Army has charged some with murder in the killing and may charge more. And it has now ordered those involved with the courts-martial to refrain from commenting on the incident.

Millions of innocent civilians have been killed in the wars that have raged around the world just in this century. But somehow, America has generally been immune to the brutalization of men who face to face indiscriminately kill anyone on the scene regardless of their status as combatant or noncombatant, or whether they are men, women or children.

White House spokesman have said that President Nixon has taken steps to see that Song My could not be repeated. But some hard questions remain.

It must first of all be established who was responsible for Song My? And if this was a deliberate and isolated incident or something that has happened before?

And why has it taken so long—some 18 months—for this to come to light? Was there a deliberate cover up by higher officers? If so, who were they, and what is going to be done about it?

But more important are the questions this is bound to raise about our policy of free fire zones in Vietnam. If an area of village is determined to be under the control of the enemy, does this give us the right to kill every living thing in it and destroy it utterly?

If a pilot can bomb a village in the free fire zone and kill men, women and children with immunity from a court-martial, can an infantryman do the same? If an artilleryman can shell a village in a free fire zone and kill men, women and children with immunity from a court martial, can an infantryman do the same? Is there any difference when the end result is the same?

If an officer orders his men to kill men, women and children in a free fire zone, can they refuse the order with immunity from a court-martial?

Millions of Americans, particularly the young who are called upon to do the fighting and dying, regard the Vietnam war as immoral, unjust, and without sense or purpose to American interests. In the rage and frustration many soldiers feel at the conflict of interest, it is no wonder that a Song My could happen. The only wonder is that it had not happened before.

GOOD WAR VERSUS BAD WAR

Much of the world has expressed shock at the possibility that some South Vietnamese civilians were deliberately massacred by American troops.

If there was, in fact, a massacre, it is shocking and deplorable.

Evidence thus far available is incomplete and contradictory, but it appears unquestionable that something appalling did take place.

If there was violation of the international rules of war, whether willful murder or something less, the guilty should be punished.

But there is much more to be said than just this. Millions of war veterans, as well as civilian residents of London, Berlin and Hiroshima, may be moved to wonder at what shocks the world and what does not.

Not that a Vietnam village massacre is less, but that what has not shocked the world is more.

The painful, halting revelations of these soldiers returned from Vietnam, detailing the slaughter of helpless women holding little children and pleading, "No! No!", offends all that is civilized within us. One understands the soldiers when they say they cannot rid themselves of these memories, that they cannot sleep because of them.

Yet the world might ask itself whether, except for an altitude of 20,000 feet, which serves as a psychological guilt shock-absorber for the trigger-puller, there is serious difference between bombing helpless women and children to their death in Western Europe and shooting them to death at 20 feet in Vietnam.

Moreover, in World War II, most civilians killed more properly could have been designated non-combatants since there was no guerrilla warfare. Thus, it might be argued, their deaths were even more inexcusable than in Vietnam where any man, woman or child may shoot an unsuspecting soldier or place a mine under his jeep.

Those who have been to war know that when you tell a man to forget everything his parents and teachers have told him, when you tell him he is under obligation to kill from one date until some other date, he is changed, at least temporarily, by the knowledge that life, including his own, is expendable by military order.

That is also shocking, whether is occurs in Vietnam, North Africa or Belleau Wood.

This editorial is not concerned with whether wars have been necessary, inevitable or desirable, or whether war ought to be abolished—which, of course, it should be. Nor is it an attempt to make barbaric deeds seem less barbaric, or more excusable because of a particular set of circumstances.

But it is an effort to point out what ought to be more obvious than it apparently is to many: There are no good wars or bad ones; they are all bloody and awful. There are no nice ways of killing people, and killing people is what wars are about.

Hollywood and television to the contrary, man in war is not magnificent; on the contrary, he is more likely to be frightened, confused, depressed, shocked, angry with an imperfect world that periodically reverts to such barbarism and is principally determined to survive, if possible, no matter what that requires. If there has been massacre in Vietnam, the world ought to be shocked. But let us put the matter in perspective and be shocked at all war and what it does to man and, for the immediate course, let us speed the withdrawal of Americans from Vietnam.

After that, if the shock has not run its course once the headlines are forgotten, let us support the strategic arms limitation talks in Helsinki, which are one immediate step toward avoiding more international massacres.

CORRECTING INEQUITIES IN THE FITZGERALD CASE

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today, in behalf of myself and 24 colleagues, a sense of Congress resolution calling upon the President to correct the gross inequities in the case of A. Ernest Fitzgerald, who was fired by the Air Force because he responded fully and fairly to a congressional inquiry about cost overruns on the C–5A transport. The text of the resolution is as follows:

To express the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should take prompt and effective action to correct all inequities in the case of A. E. Fitzgerald, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That (a) it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should take prompt and effective action to correct all inequities in the case of A. E. Fitzgerald, former employee under the Department of the Air Force.

(b) It is further the sense of the Congress that the correction of these inequities best can be achieved by the following actions and procedures:

(1) The abolished position formerly held by A. E. Fitzgerald—Deputy for Management Systems, Office of the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (Financial Management)—should be reestablished.

(2) A. E. Fitzgerald should be reappointed to that position, without loss of or reduction in pay and other employment rights, entitlements, and benefits.

(3) The reestablished position should be classified at GS–17 of the General Schedule of section 5332(a) of title 5, United States Code, and A. E. Fitzgerald should be paid at the rate of basic pay for step 5 of GS–17.

(4) The President should transmit a letter of commendation to A. E. Fitzgerald in appreciation of his past services to the United States.

As everyone now knows, Mr. Speaker, A. Ernest Fitzgerald was fired because his report to the Joint Economic Committee was an embarrassment to the Air Force. Although Air Force Secretary Seamans insisted that Fitzgerald had not been fired—that his job was abolished as part of an economy drive—it is apparent that Fitzgerald was indeed fired, and this was confirmed by the Secretary of Defense this week.

But the firing of Fitzgerald was far more than a reprisal aimed at one individual. It was a loud and clear message to all those involved in defense procurement: "This is a closed corporation. Don't rock the boat. Keep quiet at any cost."

This would be deplorable under any circumstances, but it is even more unconscionable at a time when Congress has just learned of fantastic cost overruns—in excess of $20 billion—in some 35 major weapons systems.

If the Air Force intends to use the Fitzgerald case as a warning, then it is up to us in Congress to use it as a warning, too. A warning that we insist on efficiency and economy in the use of public funds; that the military will not be permitted to erect a wall of silence around its programs and policies to shut them off from public and congressional scrutiny; that those who demonstrate initiative and courage in the conduct of the Nation's business will be rewarded, not punished.

I am pleased that four distinguished members of the Committee on Armed Services have joined me in sponsoring this resolution. The full list of cosponsors comprises the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHLEY); the gentleman from California (Mr. BURTON); the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. CLAY); the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS); the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN); the gentleman from New York (Mr. FARBSTEIN); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS); the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILBERT); the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HARRINGTON); the gentleman from Washington (Mr. HICKS); the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS); the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT); the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOWENSTEIN); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. NIX); the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE); the gentleman from California (Mr. REES); the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER); the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STOKES); the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. THOMPSON); the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. TIERNAN); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. VIGORITO); and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WHALEN).

We welcome additional cosponsors and urge speedy and favorable action on the resolution.

IS THE STATE FOULING ITS OWN SPRING?

HON. JEROME R. WALDIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, the importance of giving necessary consideration to the environmental aspects of all public works projects is nowhere more apparent than the $3 billion-plus California water project.

This massive project proposes the transfer of tremendous amounts of water from the northern part of the State to the water deficient, but heavily populated, southern area.

While it is true that there may be surplus waters running from the northern rivers to the Pacific Ocean, principally through the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta and the San Francisco Bay Estuary, a full and complete study to determine the environmental and ecological aspects of this diversion has not yet been undertaken.

Despite this glaring and incredible lack of research, State and Federal officials are pledging to go ahead with this project so that commitments entered into some years ago, when knowledge was insufficient and concern absent, will be met—no matter the consequences.

I have opposed the continuation of this project without the necessary studies, Mr. Speaker, and I am highly gratified by the great numbers of concerned Californians who have joined in opposition.

Among these citizens is the great nature writer, Harold Gilliam, whose books, essays, and articles on environmental matters and the threats to nature posed by man have focused the attention of the Nation on the plight of the bay and delta area.

In the November 23 edition of the Sunday San Francisco Examiner-Chronicle, Mr. Gilliam wrote an excellent review of the California water project and the threats it poses to the bay and delta.

The article, "Is the State Fouling Its Own Spring?" follows:

IS THE STATE FOULING ITS OWN SPRING?

(By Harold Gilliam)

California's man-made water system may well be the climax of all of man's amazing efforts to reengineer the face of the earth for his own convenience.

To convey water from the wet northern end of the State to the dry south and make the deserts blossom, Californians and the Federal Government have built some of the biggest dams on earth, have constructed canals longer than Suez or Panama, have altered the drainage systems of mountain ranges, have transplanted rivers over distances of hundreds of miles.

Surely this achievement is a triumph of energy, skill and technological power at least as significant as man's venture into space. Yet the system is in deep trouble and may never be completed as planned. Its difficulties stem in part from man's increasing understanding of the world in which he lives.

CONQUEST OF NATURE

This series of colossal engineering projects was conceived and begun in an era when Americans universally assumed that man's primary mission on earth was the conquest of nature. It is still under way and reaching a climactic stage in an era when men are beginning to understand that their proper relation to nature is not conquest but cooperation.

It is conceivable that completion of the State Water Project as planned would be a monstrous, irreversible error.

The basic elements of the plan are simple: The focus of the system is the Delta, beginning 50 miles northeast of San Francisco, where the waters of the Sacramento river from the north and the San Joaquin from the south, plus all their tributaries and several non-tributary streams, combine in a 1100-square-mile region of braided channels before gradually joining the salt waters of San Francisco bay.

SINGLE SYSTEM

The peat islands of the Delta, once impenetrable marshes, have been reclaimed and contain some of the most productive agricultural land on earth.

The Delta and the bay together constitute a single ecological system. The transition from the fresh waters of the rivers to the salt waters of the bay has produced one of the continent's richest estuarine environments.

Salmon, striped bass and steelhead by the thousands swim up from the ocean and bay into the Delta and its tributaries. Migratory birds and hundreds of forms of marine and estuarine life swarm in the tidal marshes, where each species finds the precisely proper proportions of fresh and salt water.

Thousands of yachtsmen, fishermen, duck hunters, swimmers, water skiers and bird watchers engage in recreational activities in the Bay-Delta system.

RIVER DIVERSIONS

In recent years, however, increasing diversions of Sacramento and San Joaquin river water by irrigation districts and cities upstream have greatly diminished the inflow of fresh water and on occasion have allowed salt water to penetrate the lower Delta, threatening the island farmlands and the region's ecosystem. Shasta dam and other dams of the Federal Government's Central Valley Project have alleviated the situation, controlling winter floods and storing water for release in the dry summer and fall months.

But the CVP also sends large quantities of water out of the Delta south to the dry San Joaquin valley. In addition, California voters in 1960 approved a $1.75 billion bond issue for the State Water Project, designed to send additional millions of acre feet of water south to the San Joaquin and to Southern California.

An original Delta fresh water flow of 30 million acre feet per year has been reduced to about 18 million acre feet. When (and if) the State Water Project is completed, the flow will drop to 7 million acre feet, with a possible dry-year low of 2.5 million.

FRESH WATER DIMINISHED

Thus the flow of fresh waters through the Delta and bay continually diminishes as further units of the Federal and State water systems are completed. At the same time urban sewage and pesticide-loaded agriculture waste waters have increasingly poured into the Delta and bay, threatening to turn both into a dead sink. Dozens of large-scale fish kills have occurred; tens of thousands of ducks have been eliminated; swimmers in the Bay-Delta waters risk typhoid; and salt water threatens to ruin Delta farmlands.

In effect the State has been fouling its own spring. Water pumped out of the Delta near Tracy for export south has been of deteriorating quality.

The water engineers in Sacramento have proposed a "solution": a Peripheral Canal would divert fresh water from the Sacramento above the Delta and transport it directly to the pumping plants without mixing it with the polluted Delta water.

SUFFICIENT WATER?

To avoid turning off the Bay-Delta's freshwater spigot entirely, the engineers promised that sufficient water to preserve the ecosystem and farmlands would be released down the Sacramento and at certain intervals along the Peripheral Canal.

Delta users, particularly in Contra Costa county, were skeptical about what the engineers meant by "sufficient water." It turned out that they meant about 1500 to 1800 cubic feet per second (csf)—a mere dribble from the standpoint of worried Contra Costa officials.

The Federal Water Pollution Control Administration was also dubious and has not given approval.

The Bay-Delta Water Quality Control Program (a special State agency set up to examine the problem) last March released a report by Kaiser Engineers also questioning that amount and recommending a flow of 3000 to 5000 cfs.

But the Delta people were still not happy. Marine Biologist Joel Hedgepeth deplored the canal's potential biological impact. Regardless of the amount released, the Delta salmon runs, for example, would probably be wiped out.

CANAL'S "MENACE"

"The menace of the Peripheral Canal," said Contra Costa Congressman Jerome R. Waldie, "lies with the fact that it gives virtual control of the entire Sacramento river and Delta to the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation and the State Department of Water Resources . . . We fear that almost the entire flow of the Sacramento river will be diverted southward . . . with tragic consequences to the Bay-Delta area."

ANOTHER SUBSIDY

The Kaiser report did not deal with the basic issue in the controversy—whether vast amounts of water should be exported southward from the Delta.

About half of the water planned for delivery by the State Water Project is scheduled to go to agricultural-users in the San Joaquin valley, much of it to large corporations growing subsidized cotton on tens of thousands of acres each. The water itself would be a further subsidy, averaging, says U.C. Economist Paul S. Taylor, an incredible $1000 per acre. (Taylor proposes strict enforcement of the 160-acre limitation on the delivery of subsidized water).

The other half of the water would go through the Tehachapi range to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California.

But why does that region need more water? Present supplies will amply provide for the present population; the additional water is for the projected doubled population of the future. There can be little doubt that the residents of Los Angeles, given a choice, would overwhelmingly reject the idea of doubled population.

THE GROWTH MYTH

It would be simple enough to deny extension of water mains to new areas.

Why should the Bay-Delta area be sacrificed to accommodate a doubled Southern California population desired by nobody but real estate promoters?

The answer, of course is in the obsolete myth that the goal of every community must be galoping growth. To grow, we must continue to "conquer" nature, which means filling the bays, leveling the hills, paving the deserts.

Fortunately, this pernicious assumption is begnning to be questioned by Californians bedeviled by smog, noise, pollution congestion and urban chaos.

The basic propositions of ecology are becoming public knowledge: Every species must live in balance with its natural environment.

A finite space cannot accommodate infinite growth.

Limited resources cannot support unlimited expansion.

There is a point at which the conquest of nature becomes overkill. At that point man jeopardizes his own life-support system.

It is time to find out whether we have reached that point. The State Water Project is a good place to begin.

SCHOOL BUS AIRLINES OF AMERICA, INC.

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, America is well into the space age, and air travel and commerce have become as essential to society today as ships of the ancient traders, or the prairie schooners of the pioneers who pushed the Nation's borders westward during the 19th century.

It is important that America's youngsters learn about the Nation's tremendous air industry, which has such a vital impact on our daily lives, if they are to grasp its real significance.

The first project in the Nation to give schoolchildren this knowledge has been undertaken in Lucas County, Ohio, where fifth graders at Sylvania's Sylvan School made the first flights 3 weeks ago aboard School Bus Airlines of America, Inc., of Dayton, Ohio.

In addition to giving many youngsters their first experience of flying in an airplane, the project also gives children a much wider view of the world in which they live—another essential if they are to fully comprehend the size and complexity of our vast society. I hope programs of this nature can be expanded throughout the Nation in the future so other youngsters may share in this unique experience.

In order that my colleagues may learn more about the Lucas County project, I include the following article from the November 15, Toledo Blade in the RECORD:

FIFTH GRADERS TRY HIGHER EDUCATION: 90 CHILDREN GET NEW VIEW OF AREA FROM PLANE WINDOWS

It was up, up, and away for fifth graders of Sylvania's Sylvan School as School Bus Airlines of Lucas County started educational flights for area pupils this week.

Ninety were taken aloft in a DC-3 equipped with earphones at each seat for briefing the youngsters.

Similar flights also started for 1,000 county preschool children in the Head Start program.

The Federal Government will pick up the bill for the latter. For the school program, each child pays $3. Flights are made by classrooms, and efforts are made to raise funds for children unable to pay.

FIRST IN NATION

Sylvan School's four flights from Toledo Express Airport made Lucas County first in the nation to start a School Bus Lines of America program of air education.

The Dayton-based national company plans to offer airplane field trips to millions of schoolchildren. It provides the two-engine propeller plane, its crew, preflight classroom lessons, insurance, and planned field trips.

Kits provided each teacher cover such areas as air occupations, weather, area geography and history, and energy forces and motions in aviation.

Thomas Myers and David Zak hold the franchise for the Lucas County educational air excursions. They are considering purchase of the franchise for Wood County, which is discussing reopening the old Toledo Municipal Airport. Franchises for other area counties also may be acquired later.

About half of the Sylvania children who made the flights had never before been in an airplane. One little girl claimed to be a veteran, but said she didn't remember much about her first flight, when she was only six months old.

VIEWS OF AREA

One boy in the group became ill, but he had expected it since it happened on a previous flight. Stewardess Jeanne Bailey came to his aid.

The children had birds-eye views of downtown Toledo, ships in port, the Maumee River, Fort Meigs, Toledo Zoo, and even Sylvan School.

The 25-passenger plane may be a retired airlines veteran, but the young passengers thought it was wonderful.

One boy was delighted because he had "a perfect view of the engine."

Most termed the trip "real cool."

"We'll see you again next year," Benjamin Stearns, of Dayton, founder and president of the national undertaking, told the children at flight's end.

"We have many schools to visit and hope to fly a million schoolchildren in 1969–70. We are trying to introduce students to the aerospace world through participation education."

ERNIE PYLE COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

HON. WILLIAM E. MINSHALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. MINSHALL. Mr. Speaker, one of the most memorable personalities of World War II was the great war correspondent, Ernie Pyle, whose death in the Pacific theater on April 18, 1945, was like a personal loss to the millions who read his column and was, indeed, a personal loss to the thousands of GI's he befriended, helped, and wrote about.

Nunzio R. Calvo of Cleveland, Commissioner of Soldiers Relief for Cuyahoga County and president-elect of the Greater Cleveland Veterans Council, is working hard for an Ernie Pyle commemorative postage stamp, as the following articles evidence. Mr. Calvo is distinguished by his energy and patriotism and is winning wide support for the commemorative stamp. I understand that the idea now is on the agenda for consideration by the Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee of the Post Office Department. If it is approved, Nunzio Calvo's efforts will have played an important role.

The articles follow:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Nov. 1, 1969]

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On April 18, 1970, it will be 25 years since one of America's greatest and most beloved personalities was lost. Ernie Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The memory of Ernie Pyle will continue to inspire today's war correspondents who are again bravely accompanying our fighting men into the swamps and jungles of Vietnam.

Ernie Pyle was responsible in World War II for combat infantrymen and medics receiving an extra $10 a month in pay—he was responsible for the wearing of overseas bars on the left sleeve of uniforms. He was beloved by the men in combat, as well as the people back home.

The late General Eisenhower said of Ernie Pyle, "we have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "no man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen." These remarks are a lasting tribute for a great person.

Ernie Pyle still has our gratitude, and next April will be the month to remember him. What better way could this be done than to have a commemorative stamp issued to honor this outstanding individual? Next year will be the 25th anniversary of his death. This would be the ideal time to pay homage to him. All former GIs who knew him and served with him, as well as those back home to whom he reported, should entreat the Post Office Department and the Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington now to authorize the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle.

ERNIE PYLE STAMP CONSIDERED

Veterans organizations are being asked to support a proposal which has lead to bills being introduced in Congress to provide for the issuance of a commemorative stamp honoring World War II correspondent Ernie Pyle.

Having been referred to the committee on Post Office and Civil Services, one of the bills calls for date of issuance on April 18, 1970, the 25th anniversary of the death of Ernie Pyle.

Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans, as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The memory of Pyle will continue to inspire today's war correspondents who are again bravely accompanying our fighting men into the swamps and jungles of Vietnam.

Pyle was responsible in World War II for combat infantrymen and medics receiving an extra $10 a month in pay and he was responsible for the wearing of overseas bars on the left sleeve of uniforms.

The late General Eisenhower said of Pyle, "We have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "No man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen."

The original proposal for the stamp was the idea of N. R. Calvo of Cleveland—a veteran of World War II. He has contacted members of the House and Senate in Washington, and received written approval from several. Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount also has been contacted. The proposal has been placed on the agenda for consideration by the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee.

Calvo is urging veterans organizations and all former GIs who knew Pyle and served with him, as well as "those back home" to whom he reported, to contact the Post Office Department and the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington to authorize the issuance of the commemorative stamp.

Calvo is a life member of VFW Post 5799 of Cleveland, and serves as commissioner of Soldiers Relief for Cuyahoga County in that city. He is active in veterans affairs and a member of other veterans organizations.

ERNIE PYLE COMMEMORATIVE STAMP BOOSTED BY NUNZIO CALVO

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—An all-out effort is underway for the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle. The project is spearheaded by Nunzio Calvo of Cleveland, Ohio, a member of Avanti Amerita Lodge No. 133.

Bills have been introduced in Congress to provide for the issuance of the stamp to honor the World War II correspondent. Having been referred to the committee on Post Office and Civil Service, one of the bills calls for date of issuance on April 18, 1970, the 25th anniversary of the death of Ernie Pyle. On that date, it will be twenty-five years that one of America's greatest and most beloved personalities was lost. Ernie Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The memory of Ernie Pyle will continue to inspire today's war correspondents who are again bravely accompanying our fighting men into the swamps and the jungles of Vietnam.

Ernie Pyle was responsible in World War II for combat infantrymen and medics receiving an extra $10 a month in pay—he was responsible for the wearing of overseas bars on the left sleeve of uniforms. He was beloved by the men in combat, as well as the people back home.

The late General Eisenhower said of Ernie Pyle, "we have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "no man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen." These remarks are a lasting tribute to a great person.

Ernie Pyle still has our gratitude, and next April will be the month to remember him. What better way could this be done than to have a commemorative stamp issued to honor this outstanding individual? Next year will be the 25th anniversary of his death. This would be the ideal time to pay homage to him.

The original proposal for the stamp was the idea of Nunzio Calvo of Cleveland, he himself a veteran of World War II. He has contacted members of the House and Senate in Washington, and received written approval of the idea from several, two of which introduced the legislation. He has received some national publicity on the project and received enthusiastic replies from individuals throughout the country. Postmaster General Winton W. Blount has also been contacted. The proposal has been placed on the agenda for consideration by the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee.

Calvo is urging all former GIs who knew Ernie Pyle and served with him, as well as "those back home" to whom he reported, to contact the Post Office Department and the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington by letter now to authorize the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle.

Nunzio Calvo serves as commissioner of Soldiers Relief for Cuyahoga County in Cleveland, Ohio, where he is active in veteran affairs and a member of veteran organizations.

NOT YOURS TO GIVE

HON. WILLIAM E. MINSHALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. MINSHALL. Mr. Speaker, a thoughtful and concerned constituent, Mr. Bernard C. Sauer, Jr., of Rocky River, Ohio, has sent to me a copy of remarks made in the House of Representatives by Davy Crockett during his term of office as a Congressman from Tennessee in the 23d Congress. Colonel Crockett's remarks carry a timely message for those of us who are charged with expenditures of public funds. They follow:

NOT YOURS TO GIVE

(From "The Life of Colonel David Crockett," compiled by Edward S. Ellis)

One day in the House of Representatives, a bill was taken up appropriating money for the benefit of a widow of a distinguished naval officer. Several beautiful speeches had been made in its support. The Speaker was just about to put the question when Crockett arose:

"Mr. Speaker—I have as much respect for the memory of the deceased, and as much sympathy for the suffering of the living, if suffering there be, as any man in this House, but we must not permit our respect for the dead or our sympathy for a part of the living to lead us into an act of injustice to the balance of the living. I will not go into an argument to prove that Congress has no power to appropriate this money as an act of charity. Every member upon this floor knows it. We have the right as individuals, to give away as much of our own money as we please in charity; but as members of Congress we have no right so to appropriate a dollar of the public money. Some eloquent appeals have been made to us upon the ground that it is a debt due the deceased. Mr. Speaker, the deceased lived long after the close of the war; he was in office to the day of his death, and I have never heard that the government was in arrears to him.

Every man in this House knows it is not a debt. We cannot, without the grossest corruption, appropriate this money as the payment of a debt. We have not the semblance of authority to appropriate it as a charity. Mr. Speaker, I have said we have the right to give as much money of our own as we please. I am the poorest man on this floor. I cannot vote for this bill, but I will give one week's pay to the object, and if every member of Congress will do the same, it will amount to more than the bill asks."

He took his seat. Nobody replied. The bill was put upon its passage, and, instead of passing unanimously, as was generally supposed, and as, no doubt, it would, but for that speech, it received but few votes, and, of course, was lost.

Later, when asked by a friend why he had opposed the appropriation, Crockett gave this explanation:

"Several years ago I was one evening standing on the steps of the Capitol with some other members of Congress, when our attention was attracted by a great light over in Georgetown. It was evidently a large fire. We jumped into a hack and drove over as fast as we could. In spite of all that could be done, many houses were burned and many families made houseless, and, besides, some of them had lost all but the clothes they had on. The weather was very cold, and when I saw so many women and children suffering, I felt that something ought to be done for them. The next morning a bill was introduced appropriating $20,000 for their relief. We put aside all other business and rushed it through as soon as it could be done.

"The next summer, when it began to be time to think about the election, I concluded I would take a scout around among the boys of my district. I had no opposition there, but, as the election was some time off, I did not know what might turn up. When riding one day in a part of my district in which I was more of a stranger than any other, I saw a man in a field plowing and coming toward the road. I gauged my gait so that we should meet as he came to the fence. As he came up, I spoke to the man. He replied politely, but, as I thought, rather coldly.

"I began: 'Well, friend, I am one of those unfortunate beings called candidates, and—'

"'Yes, I know you; you are Colonel Crockett. I have seen you once before, and voted for you the last time you were elected. I suppose you are out electioneering now, but you had better not waste your time or mine. I shall not vote for you again.'

"This was a sockdolager . . . I begged him to tell me what was the matter.

"'Well, Colonel, it is hardly worth-while to waste time or words upon it. I do not see how it can be mended, but you gave a vote last winter which shows that either you have not capacity to understand the Constitution, or that you are wanting in the honesty and firmness to be guided by it. In either case you are not the man to represent me. But I beg your pardon for expressing it in that way. I did not intend to avail myself of the privilege of the constituent to speak plainly to a candidate for the purpose of insulting or wounding you. I intend by it only to say that your understanding of the Constitution is very different from mine; and I will say to you what, but for my rudeness, I should not have said, that I believe you to be honest. . . . But an understanding of the Constitution different from mine I cannot overlook, because the Constitution, to be worth anything, must be held sacred, and rigidly observed in all its provisions. The man who wields power and misinterprets it is the more dangerous the more honest he is.'

"'I admit the truth of all you say, but there must be some mistake about it, for I do not remember that I gave any vote last winter upon any constitutional question.'

"'No, Colonel, there's no mistake. Though I live here in the backwoods and seldom go from home, I take the papers from Washington and read very carefully all the proceedings of Congress. My papers say that last winter you voted for a bill to appropriate $20,000 to some sufferers by a fire in Georgetown. Is that true?

"'Well, my friend; I may as well own up. You have got me there, But certainly nobody will complain that a great and rich country like ours should give the insignificant sum of $20,000 to relieve its suffering women and children, particularly with a full and overflowing Treasury, and I am sure, if you had been there, you would have done just as I did.'

"'It is not the amount, Colonel, that I complain of; it is the principle. In the first place, the government ought to have in the Treasury no more than enough for its legitimate purposes. But that has nothing to do with the question. The power of collecting and disbursing money at pleasure is the most dangerous power that can be intrusted to man, particularly under our system of collecting revenue by a tariff, which reaches every man in the country, no matter how poor he may be, and the poorer he is the more he pays in proportion to his means. What is worse, it presses upon him without his knowledge where the weight centers, for there is not a man in the United States who can ever guess how much he pays to the government. So you see, that while you are contributing to relieve one, you are drawing it from thousands who are even worse off than he. If you had the right to give anything, the amount was simply a matter of discretion with you, and you had as much right to give $20,000,000 to $20,000. If you have the right to give to one, you have the right to give to all; and, as the Constitution neither defines charity nor stipulates the amount, you are at liberty to give to any and everything which you may believe, or profess to believe, is a charity, and to any amount you may think proper. You will very easily perceive what a wide door this would open for fraud and corruption and favoritism, on the one hand, and for robbing the people on the other. No, Colonel, Congress has no right to give charity. Individual members may give as much of their own money as they please, but they have no right to touch a dollar of the public money for that purpose. If twice as many houses had been burned in this county as in Georgetown, neither you nor any other member of Congress would have thought of appropriating a dollar for our relief. There are about two hundred and forty members of Congress. If they had shown their sympathy for the sufferers by contributing each one week's pay, it would have made over $13,000. There are plenty of wealthy men in and around Washington who could have given $20,000 without depriving themselves of even a luxury of life. The congressmen chose to keep their own money, which, if reports be true, some of them spend not very creditably; and the people about Washington, no doubt, applauded you for relieving them from the necessity of giving by giving what was not yours to give. The people have delegated to Congress, by the Constitution, the power to do certain things. To do these, it is authorized to collect and pay moneys, and for nothing else. Everything beyond this is usurpation, and a violation of the Constitution.

" 'So you see, Colonel, you have violated the Constitution in what I consider a vital point. It is a precedent fraught with danger to the country, for when Congress once begins to stretch its power beyond the limits of the Constitution, there is no limit to it, and no security for the people. I have no doubt you acted honestly, but that does not make it any better, except as far as you are personally concerned, and you see that I cannot vote for you.'

"I tell you I felt streaked. I saw if I should have opposition, and this man should go to talking, he would set others to talking, and in that district I was a gone fawn-skin. I could not answer him, and the fact is, I was so fully convinced that he was right, I did not want to. But I must satisfy him, and I said to him:

" 'Well, my friend, you hit the nail upon the head when you said I had not sense enough to understand the Constitution. I intended to be guided by it, and thought I had studied it fully. I have heard many speeches in Congress about the powers of Congress, but what you have said here at your plow has got more hard, sound sense in it than all the fine speeches I ever heard. If I had ever taken the view of it that you have, I would have put my head into the fire before I would have given that vote; and if you will forgive me and vote for me again, if I ever vote for another unconstitutional law I wish I may be shot.'

"He laughingly replied: 'Yes, Colonel, you have sworn to that once before, but I will trust you again upon one condition. You say that you are convinced that your vote was wrong. Your acknowledgment of it will do more good than beating you for it. If, as you go around the district, you will tell people about this vote, and that you are satisfied it was wrong, I will not only vote for you, but will do what I can to keep down opposition, and, perhaps, I may exert some little influence in that way.'

" 'If I don't,' said I, 'I wish I may be shot; and to convince you that I am in earnest in what I say I will come back this way in a week or ten days, and if you will get up a gathering of the people, I will make a speech to them. Get up a barbecue, and I will pay for it.'

" 'No, Colonel, we are not rich people in this section, but we have plenty of provisions to contribute for a barbecue, and some to spare for those who have none. The push of crops will be over in a few days, and we can then afford a day for a barbecue. This is Thursday; I will see to getting it up on Saturday week. Come to my house on Friday, and we will go together, and I promise you a very respectable crowd to see and hear you.'

" 'Well, I will be here. But one thing more before I say good-by, I must know your name.'

" 'My name is Bunce.'

" 'Not Horatio Bunce?'

" 'Yes.'

" 'Well, Mr. Bunce, I never saw you before, though you say you have seen me, but I know you very well. I am glad I have met you, and very proud that I may hope to have you for my friend.'

"It was one of the luckiest hits of my life that I met him. He mingled but little with the public, but was widely known for his remarkable intelligence and incorruptible integrity, and for a heart brimful and running over with kindness and benevolence, which showed themselves not only in words but in acts. He was the oracle of the whole country around him, and his fame had extended far beyond the circle of his immediate acquaintance. Though I had never met him before, I had heard much of him, and but for this meeting it is very likely I should have had opposition, and had been beaten. One thing is very certain, no man could now stand up in that district under such a vote.

"At the appointed time I was at his house, having told our conversation to every crowd I had met, and to every man I stayed all night with, and I found that it gave the people an interest and a confidence in me stronger than I had ever seen manifested before.

"Though I was considerably fatigued when I reached his house, and, under ordinary circumstances, should have gone early to bed, I kept him up until midnight, talking about the principles and affairs of government, and got more real, true knowledge of them than I had got all my life before.

"I have known and seen much of him since, for I respect him—no, that is not the word—I reverence and love him more than any living man, and I go to see him two or three times every year; and I will tell you, sir, if every one who professes to be a Christian lived and acted and enjoyed it as he does, the religion of Christ would take the world by storm.

"But to return to my story. The next morning we went to the barbecue, and, to my surprise, found about a thousand men there. I met a good many whom I had not known before, and they and my friend introduced me around until I had got pretty well acquainted—at least, they all knew me.

"In due time notice was given that I would speak to them. They gathered up around a stand that had been erected. I opened my speech by saying:

" 'Fellow-citizens—I present myself before you today feeling like a new man. My eyes have lately been opened to truths which ignorance or prejudice, or both, had heretofore hidden from my view. I feel that I can today offer you the ability to render you more valuable service than I have ever been able to render before. I am here today more for the purpose of acknowledging my error than to seek your votes. That I should make this acknowledgement is due to myself as well as to you. Whether you will vote for me is a matter for your consideration only.'

"I went on to tell them about the fire and my vote for the appropriation and then told them why I was satisfied it was wrong. I closed by saying:

" 'And now, fellow-citizens, it remains only for me to tell you that the most of the speech you have listened to with so much interest was simply a repetition of the arguments by which your neighbor, Mr. Bunce, convinced me of my error.

" 'It is the best speech I ever made in my life, but he is entitled to the credit for it. And now I hope he is satisfied with his convert and that he will get up here and tell you so.'

"He came upon the stand and said:

" 'Fellow-citizens—It affords me great pleasure to comply with the request of Colonel Crockett. I have always considered him a thoroughly honest man, and I am satisfied that he will faithfully perform all that he has promised you today.'

"He went down, and there went up from that crowd such a shout for Davy Crockett as his name never called forth before.

"I am not much given to tears, but I was taken with a choking then and felt some big drops rolling down my cheeks. And I tell you now that the remembrance of those few words spoken by such a man, and the honest, hearty shout they produced, is worth more to me than all the honors I have received and all the reputation I have ever made, or ever shall make, as a member of Congress.

"Now, sir," concluded Crockett, "you know why I made that speech yesterday.

"There is one thing now to which I will call your attention. You remember that I proposed to give a week's pay. There are in that House many very wealthy men—men who think nothing of spending a week's pay, or a dozen of them, for a dinner or a wine party when they have something to accomplish by it. Some of those same men made beautiful speeches upon the great debt of gratitude which the country owed the deceased—a debt which could not be paid by money—and the insignificance and worthlessness of money, particularly so insignificant a sum as $10,000, when weighed against the honor of the nation. Yet not one of them responded to my proposition. Money with them is nothing but trash when it is to come out of the people. But it is the one great thing for which most of them are striving, and many of them sacrifice honor, integrity, and justice to obtain it."

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I insert a letter from a constituent of mine concerning certain proposed amendments to the Economic Opportunity Act:

The OEO extension and authorization bill will soon be coming to a vote, and I write you with grave concern over the "Murphy Amendment" that will be proposed in some form. This amendment, drafted by Senator Murphy the day before the bill reached the Senate floor, gives state governors the power to veto Legal Services programs in whole or in part at the time they are refunded. It removes the existing power of the OEO Director to override such a veto. Though more subtle, this amendment is equally damaging to the Legal Services programs as the unsuccessful attempt two years ago by Senator Murphy to prohibit antipoverty lawyers from filing suits against government agencies.

The imminence of political interference with a Legal Services program for bringing an unpopular suit or opposing governmental action creates a conflict between the interests of the attorney over the future of his job and program and the interest of his client in the unrestrained assertion of his rights. Without the threat of being overruled by the OEO Director, governors will have a free hand in curtailing legal services activities. Full and vigorous legal representation of the poor will surely continue to alienate many state officials. Yet, surely it strikes at the heart of an advocacy system of justice to give the head of these state officials the power to cripple the opposing representatives who may challenge state actions hindering the poor.

The threat to Legal Services pregnant in the Murphy Amendment will cause a severe morale crisis among legal services attorneys, destroying their confidence and job security necessary for unwaivering legal representation of all their clients. This detrimentally weakens vigorous legal services programs and guarantees that the less effective programs will forever remain so. It will cause a rush of resignations of the best talent in the Legal Services programs who no longer feel they can adequately represent their clients or do anything to help improve the social order. Presently, the most talented of the law school graduates are competing to obtain jobs with Legal Services programs. The Murphy Amendment surely will end this.

More important than the loss of security by the lawyers, will be the loss of faith by the poor resulting from the Murphy Amendment. These we encourage to channel their grievances, frustrations, and discontents into the courts of law and administrative hearings instead of street and sidewalk confrontations. A right without the capacity to effectuate a legal remedy is no right at all. Orderly institutional change in the framework of the continuity of the law is made impossible if access to the full use of the institutions is restrained. The OEO has made great strides in bringing about the American promise of Equal Justice Under Law. Intimidation and restraint of the lawyers for the poor, making them second-class citizens in legal bargaining and litigation, will destroy many of the gains already made.

OEO Director Donald Rumsfeld, Legal Services Director Terry Lenzner, The American Bar Association, the National Legal Aid and Defender Association as well as many other legal and non-legal organizations have expressed their strong opposition to the Murphy Amendment for the threat it imposes to competent legal representation of the poor. I join these groups in opposing the amendment, and I ask you to give this amendment the serious consideration it deserves.

THE U.N. AND THE ENVIRONMENT: HOPE FOR THE FUTURE

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Star, in a recent editorial, says this country should begin now to prepare carefully for the United Nations Conference on Problems of the Human Environment, set for 1972 in either Geneva or Stockholm.

The story points out, quite correctly, that "we need the knowledge that the conference will generate" and that "we need the pledge of all nations to work together to solve the monumental problems we have created."

Through international cooperation at the 1972 conference, we should make the most of this chance "to rescue our polluted planet."

The text of the editorial follows:

A CHANCE TO RESCUE OUR POLLUTED PLANET

When all the world was young and truth in every ruler's tongue, many of us confidently watched the founding of the United Nations at San Francisco in the expectation that the world had entered a new age. Permanent peace, and therefore permanent plenty, were at hand, to be established and maintained by the new organization, where the nations could sit down together and resolve their differences across the table rather than on the battlefield.

A sad thing happened on the way to the millenium. China got taken over by people who were not invited to the christening of the new world and they turned into wicked fairies. The Russians have successively invaded most of the East European nations, sometimes, as in Czechoslovakia, as a firm but unbloody army of occupation, sometimes, as in Hungary, with fire and death in hand. The United States has fought long wars in Korea and in Vietnam. India and Pakistan have indulged in mutual slaughter and threaten to again. The Turks and Greeks from time to time resume their ancient feud. Even defeat cannot keep the Arabs from trying to wipe out Israel. In Central America tiny and fragile republics have at it and at each other when the mood strikes them. There is no peace. War and rumors of war have set the pace for the age of the United Nations as they did for the age of the League of Nations.

But if the new peace-keeping organization has not kept the peace, it has accomplished a number of other things, desirable goals originally undertaken merely as auxiliary to the central task. Through various agencies it has furthered scientific knowledge, elementary education, preventive health measures, artistic appreciation and improved agriculture, to name a few.

It may well be that the U.N. will be one of those historical phenomena that earn human gratitude for their side-effects, like the Counter-Reformation, which did nothing at all about restoring religious unity to Europe but which created, as a by-product of the effort, one of the most exhilarating and engrossing styles of architecture in the world. It may even be that if the nations pursue these U.N. side-effects with enough determination and cooperation, they will, all unknowing, take some giant steps toward the central goal, peace.

The possibility is particularly pertinent right now because the Secretary General has issued a report and a call for a United Nations Conference on Problems of the Human Environment. The conference will take place in 1972 at either Geneva or Stockholm and, it is hoped, will be attended by representatives of all member-states, a large number of specialists in the various fields of knowledge concerned, and representatives of appropriate agencies both public and private. The report makes it amply clear why such a conference is desperately needed, how it will be organized and what we may hope for from it.

The need should be evident to anyone who pauses on the banks of the Potomac on a summer day and looks at the water. It is not very attractive. The recreational use being made of it is minimal and just about restricted to boating, although there is still some fishing. But to enjoy the pleasantest thing you can do with water, total immersion, Washington area people have to resort to pools or to travel considerable distances to lakes or the ocean.

The Potomac, like most rivers, has long been unsafe for drinking and a little less long for swimming. Unless some action is taken soon, the still surviving fish can't last much longer. Boating is still O.K. as long as you don't fall overboard, the main peril of which is not drowning but gulping in the rich content of decay and disease with which the river is loaded.

Also like most rivers, the Potomac is not the concern of one single jurisdiction. It flows through or borders three states and the District of Columbia and past or through innumerable cities, towns, villages and counties, all of which contribute to its pollution and all of which suffer from its condition.

Other rivers are international in their length or borders, such as the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes system, the Rio Grande and the poor, poisoned Rhine. All of the seas and oceans are of international concern. The air moves freely over frontiers, as we learned early in the nuclear age. Radioactive clouds are not the only man-made pollutants falling as the gentle rain on those beneath, irrespective of pollutant authorship. Detroit sends its poisons into lungs in Ontario, and Belgium suffers from Dusseldorf. Then there are the more exotic and possibly more deadly effects of the way we live now, most of them thoroughly international. The report notes that "the reliance of modern technology upon the combustion of fossil fuels has brought a 10 percent increase in atmospheric carbon dioxide over the past century" which "could rise to 25 percent by the year 200. The consequence of such an increase upon world weather and climate . . . could eventually be catastrophic."

The report accurately labels industrialization, urbanization and exploding population as the main causes of the evils increasingly infesting our environment. It notes that many of the individual problems are susceptible to technical control or solution but that such control or solution usually lags far beyond the creation of the problem for obvious economic reasons.

The report further notes that some individual, isolated efforts at control have been successful, but that the whole body of knowledge in the field has neither been brought together for the benefit of all who need it nor given the kind of quantum jump that physics and engineering have received from modern weapons development and that is undoubtedly needed to cope with our self-created problems of environment.

The report analyzes the present situation into "human settlements problems," which may be left to individual nations, "territorial problems," which call for regional, international solutions, and "global problems," which will require world-wide agreements and actions in concert for the common good.

The conference, essentially, will present to the delegates the conclusions to be reached by two sets of four commissions. The substantive bodies will consider human settlements and industrial development; rational use and development of natural resources; environmental pollution; and the maintenance of values of the human environment. The "strategic" commissions will devise the legal, economic, social and diplomatic arrangements by which the recommendations or the substantive commissions can best be put into effect.

The subject is made for the machinery, the methods and the best hopes of the United Nations. It is true that none of the nations has yet paid anywhere near enough attention to the environmenttal problems on its own doorstep, but that is a reason for, not against, convening the United Nations Conference. We need the knowledge that the conference will generate. We need the pledge of all nations to work together to solve the monumental problems we have created.

Here in the United States, we have the special advantage that, since the year of the conference, 1972, is also a presidential election year, reflections from Geneva or Stockholm may well turn up in public discussions and debates in Boston and Los Angeles and, after November of that year and January of the next, here in Washington.

This country should back the conference as fully as possible and begin now to prepare carefully so that contributions in skills and knowledge will be equal to our needs and obligations.

REMARKS BY VICE PRESIDENT AGNEW BEFORE THE GOVERNORS CONFERENCE

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Vice President AGNEW addressed the Governors Conference called by President Nixon today and once again his comments on this question of a so-called "generation gap" contain a message for all of us to heed and I include a copy of his remarks in the RECORD at this point:

REMARKS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT TO GOVERNORS AND THEIR FAMILIES, WASHINGTON, D.C., DECEMBER 3, 1969

It has frequently been stated that the strength of a nation depends upon the strength of its people. But people are not born strong. A young person draws his strength from the teaching and example of those closest to him. In most cases, this means the family. So it would not be inaccurate to say that the strength of a nation depends upon the strength of its families.

The President of the United States is a family man. Because he is, and because he believes you are family-oriented, we are here today—as the French say, "en famille."

Since so many of you have brought your youngsters with you, today I would like to talk about young people, about the silent majority and the vocal minority of youth. I would like to discuss shallow demonstrations and profound demonstrations, and a way for men and women of good will, and of all ages, to begin to bridge the generation gap.

For some time now, I have been speaking out against the cause that some people have been demonstrating about. As a result, I have been charged with being "against the right to demonstrate."

For some time now, I have been reminding parents and young people alike that self-respect begins with mutual respect, and that order in society begins with discipline and authority in the home. As a result, I have been charged with being "against young people."

(I've also made a couple of speeches about the media, but nobody paid any attention to those.)

Now, anybody who knows me, or has taken the trouble to read what I have to say, knows that I respect the right of dissent in America, and knows that I admire and respect the great majority of young people in America today.

But the fact of the charges illustrates a phenomenon of our times. Too many of us are unwilling to argue a point but are too willing to point at an arguer. Too many of us stand ready to evade a debate by challenging the motives of the debater. Why bother to come to grips with a real issue, they ask, when a strawman of your own offers such an inviting target?

That kind of evasion results in "ricochet rhetoric"—when people do not respond to what is said, but to what other people say you meant. There is nothing wrong with joining an issue, but there is something very definitely wrong in two sides deliberately missing each other's point.

That is why there is so little real communication between those who demonstrate and those who are the targets of demonstration. That is why what should be a "meaningful dialogue" has become all too often a cacophony of meaningless monologues. That refusal to approach an issue with an open mind, that refusal to entertain a spirit of compromise—that is what is building barriers between the young and the not-so-young, between an outspoken minority and a soft-spoken majority. That is the barrier we must begin to dismantle—from both sides.

Freedom of speech is useless without freedom of thought. And I fear that the politics of protest is shutting out the process of thought, so necessary to rational discussion. We are faced with the Ten Commandments of Protest:

Thou Shalt Not Allow Thy Opponent to Speak.

Thou Shalt Not Set Forth a Program of Thine Own.

Thou Shalt Not Trust Anybody Over Thirty.

Thou Shalt Not Honor Thy Father or Thy Mother.

Thou Shalt Not Heed the Lessons of History.

Thou Shalt Not Write Anything Longer than a Slogan.

Thou Shalt Not Present a Negotiable Demand.

Thou Shalt Not Accept Any Establishment Idea.

Thou Shalt Not Revere Any but Totalitarian Heroes.

Thou Shalt Not Ask Forgiveness for Thy Transgressions,

Rather Thou Shalt Demand Amnesty for Them.

In the face of these Commandments of Protest, how do we establish communication? How do we reach out without caving in? How do we talk to each other instead of just at each other?

Fortunately, the true believers in these Commandments are relatively few. And fortunately, we have an Administration in this country, ready to listen to the legitimate needs of the young, and even more important, ready and able to respond to those needs in significant ways.

You have already seen this morning how we are tackling the problem of dangerous drugs, which are more of a threat to our young people than any other segment of the population. And right across town this week, a White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health is taking place; this Administration has thereby provided a forum and a focal point for constructive controversy on a subject of deep concern to millions of our committed young people.

To a young person's question, "What have you done for us lately?" the obvious answer is "reform the draft." Certainly this long-overdue reform ends the terrible uncertainty that hung over millions of young lives. By and large, most young people of draft age can now make plans for their lives with a big question mark removed. And now that the President has demonstrated his credibility in this area, I think most young people believe he means what he says about an all-volunteer army in the future, and an end to the draft.

But let us look beyond the issues of immediate concern to young people, and look into the events of the past month that may affect their lives for years to come.

We have signed a treaty that limits the spread of nuclear weapons, and reduces to some degree the threat of holocaust to future generations. The diplomatic negotiations that led to this signing are for historians of the future to detail, but there was far more to the signing of the Non-Proliferation Treaty than the stroke of a pen.

We have announced our intention to return Okinawa to Japan, in a generous rather than a grudging spirit, thereby laying the basis for a harmonious long-term relationship with the third most important industrial nation in the world, and increasing the chances for stability in the Far East in the generations to come.

We have unilaterally renounced the use of germ warfare, and by setting this example to the world, we have added to the environment of peaceful negotiation as we lessen the terror of war to future generations.

We have begun Strategic Arms Limitation Talks with the Soviet Union, and the depth and extent of our preparation for these talks cannot help but impress the other side of the table with our seriousness of purpose. And on the outcome of these negotiations hang so many of the hopes of tomorrow's generation of Americans.

Consider for a moment what those four acts last month mean to young people in America: The NPT, the return of Okinawa, the renunciation of germ warfare, the opening of the SALT talks.

I believe that when future historians look at the month of November, 1969, they will not consider it to be the month of the March or the month of the Moratorium. I believe they will consider November, 1969, to be a turning point in the history of the 20th Century—a month in which President Nixon led the way toward world peace.

Since I mentioned the demonstration of last month, let me address myself to the focal point of the protest of so many of our young people: Why are we Vietnamizing the war in an orderly way—why don't we just pull out right now?

Here is the straight answer: We are being steadfast in Vietnam because we do not want the next generation of Americans to have to fight another war. If America were to cut and run, we would be cutting the chances for peace in the Seventies, and running out on the children in school today who would have to fight a war tomorrow.

This generation is charged with the responsibility of dealing with the real world, with life as it is. The power and pressure and suspicion of the real world cannot be dispelled by wishful thinking, or by turning inward, or by doubting our ideals, or by blaming ourselves for all the ills of mankind.

By following the path of appeasement, this generation could accomplish "peace in our time." But we say to the next generation—"We are just as much concerned with peace in your time." We refuse to accept a solution that says "Peace Now—Pay Later." Because it is our children—the younger generation—who would have to pay later the price of surrender now.

More than anything else, the desire to transmit a better and a safer world to the next generation motivates the men at the center of decision today.

Why are we overhauling our welfare system—if not to build a better life for children who would otherwise be doomed to lives of poverty?

Why are we taxing ourselves at the highest rate in America's history—if not to avoid the deficits that would bankrupt the next generation?

Why are we turning the flow of power away from Washington and back toward the States—if not to enable the adults of tomorrow to have a greater say in managing their own destinies?

This is our way of "demonstrating." This is our demonstration of good faith toward the young Americans who are far more the objects of our hopes than our fears.

In this demonstration, the only signs we carry are the signs of the times—the hard evidence of action, the deeds you can see and the reform you can feel.

And the march we are most interested in is the march of progress—the progress that comes from respect for each other, respect for our free institutions, respect for new ideas.

I believe that we will see young people tomorrow dedicating themselves more profoundly than by the simple drama of demonstration. I believe we will see them involving themselves in community action against pollution—organizing clean-up brigades, buttonholing civic and political leaders, pressing their cause with cogent argument, and mobilizing support by the power of their example. By working within the system, they can change the system.

Why do I believe this? Because sooner or later, you face the choice in life between getting something off your chest and getting something done. That's the choice that determines maturity.

I think the vast majority of the young activists in America are mature enough to want to get something done. In that cause—as in every positive cause—they will find an Administration, and an older generation, with them all the way.

HUDSON LEADS WAY TO POLLUTION CONTROL

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, the continued and growing problem of water pollution in these United States rightly concerns us all. As a matter of fact, it has become a national disgrace in many areas.

Unless this Nation reverses this trend, future generations will suffer irreparable damage from the uncontrolled pollution of business and government.

While we are quick to point out the problems, we seldom take the time to pay tribute to those who are doing something about this menace.

It is for this reason that I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Hudson Pulp and Paper Corp., of Palatka, Fla., on its plan for a waste-water treatment plant.

This is the second phase of the company's water improvement program at this huge facility. Cost of the entire Hudson project is $3,200,000.

The new treatment plant will bring Hudson into compliance with the January 1969 Florida environmental protection laws by late 1971—well in advance of the January 1973 requirement.

It was a red letter day for industry when Hudson vice president, John H. Trescot, Jr., made formal announcement of the project at a meeting of State and county civic and governmental leaders.

In 1961, the company installed its primary waste treatment clarifier. The new treatment facility will return oxygen to the mill effluent prior to its introduction into Rice Creek with 900 acres of oxidation ponds required along with the auxiliary piping and pumping equipment.

The company has noted that the waste water will flow through the ponds where natural aeration will reduce the odor and replenish the waste with oxygen.

Construction is scheduled to begin in September of next year with an expenditure of approximately $1 million. It is scheduled to be completed in late 1971, after an expenditure of an additional $2,200,000.

I might add that Hudson's interest in pollution control dates back many years. In 1950, the company cooperated with the State board of health in one of the first comprehensive stream quality surveys in the State.

The primary clarifier which removes the solid material from the mill wastes was placed in operation in 1961 and contributed greatly to the improvement of water quality in Rice Creek.

Here is a corporation that is doing something—and they deserve commendation from everyone for their public-spirited attitude.

I believe they are pointing the way for other industries to control pollution. It can be done, and it must be done.

Congress has passed legislation which will allow the States to establish water quality standards and I am proud of Florida for having taken the lead in this endeavor.

I am doubly proud that Hudson, whose plant is located in our district, has taken the lead among industry.

The management and all of the fine people who have made this corporation great have justifiable reason to be proud.

Further, I know that the citizens of Palatka and Putnam County take justifiable pride in this announcement by a corporation which is vital to their economy—and has proven once again that it is a partner and friend in the development of this area.

ALLEGED MASSACRE AT MYLAI

HON. ALBERT W. WATSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, no sooner had the Green Beret case been put to rest by the Department of the Army and all at once we have got the so-called "massacre" at Mylai. Like the Green Beret situation, the alleged killing of civilians at Mylai is surrounded by contradictions and inconsistencies. Quite frankly, the Army has done precious little to clear up either matter, and the American people are naturally confused. I know I am.

Mr. Speaker, it would be presumptuous of me to give an opinion of just who and who is not guilty of the Mylai tragedy. The facts thus far have not been established. All we know is what we have read—a young Army lieutenant stands accused of ordering his men to kill Vietnamese civilians in the little village of Mylai in South Vietnam about 20 months ago. There will be a trial, and under our judicial system, a man is considered to be innocent until proven guilty by a court of law.

It is this basic constitutional principle which causes me concern. Despite the fact that Lieutenant Calley's trial has not even started, for the most part the national news media in this country have already condemned him, and not only him but President Nixon, the American fighting men in Vietnam, and the entire Vietnam war itself.

Already the Senator from South Dakota, and other antiwar critics are using Mylai as an excuse to renew all-out attacks on this country's involvement in Vietnam. To them, Mylai is a symbol of the frustration of the Vietnam war, and in my judgment, they will squeeze this terrible tragedy for everything it is worth in order to downgrade the President and our fighting men. Backed by Time magazine, Newsweek, the Washington Post, newspaper, national television correspondents and the like, the Senator from South Dakota and others like him have already found Lieutenant Calley and the men guilty, guilty by innuendo and insinuation. How can this young soldier possibly receive a fair trial because of such adverse publicity? It is obvious to me that, for the liberals, he is going to become the symbolic scapegoat for all the horrors of the Vietnam war.

Mr. Speaker, it seems very strange that after 20 months, the alleged massacre is just coming to light. Why are we learning about it at a time when the great majority of the American people are showing their support for the President's policy in Vietnam? There is no doubt that something terrible happened at Mylai, but it would be even more tragic for the cause of world peace and freedom in Southeast Asia if the events in that village caused this Nation to abandon its commitment in South Vietnam, and desecrate the memory of American soldiers who have paid the supreme sacrifice there.

No one abhors the idea of war more than I. The taking of a human life under any circumstances is hard to justify. In this Nation alone, the American people have killed and have been killed to prevent evil forces from destroying freedom. War is not a pleasant thing. Like so many of my colleagues, I discovered that in World War II. Yet, when we are called upon to protect freedom, American fighting men will have to engage in the tragic business of death.

I do not defend Lieutenant Calley nor do I condemn him. If he is guilty, he should be punished. But we must put this whole episode in its proper perspective. Some accounts say that the people of Mylai were responsible for killing American soldiers in Lieutenant Calley's command. Others say that not as many villagers were killed as news reports indicated. Hopefully, many of these points will be clarified at the trial. But even if this soldier is guilty, how can anyone who believes in justice and fair play condemn all American fighting men and the American people in general for this one event? It is reported that about 100 villagers were killed. Let us not forget that 40,000 young Americans have died defending villages and their inhabitants throughout South Vietnam.

Two wrongs do not make a right. But, before any apologist for America starts getting involved in a guilt complex, think for a moment how many Vietnamese civilians have been killed by the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese regulars. No one knows for sure, but 100,000 is a conservative estimate. Long before we sent fighting units into South Vietnam, I recall an American military adviser telling me how sick he became after visiting a little village that the Vietcong had just departed. The villagers failed to cooperate with the Vietcong. They paid dearly. Every little child in the village, from 1 week to 14 years, 150 in all, were decapitated and laid in a neat row for the parents to see.

Mr. Speaker, this is no time to cast aspersions on our fighting men, the President and ourselves for that matter, as some members of the national news media and a few demogogs are doing because of Mylai. It is time for us to renew our efforts to help assure South Vietnam that its future will be secure from further atrocities, regardless of who may commit them.

FOR BLACK INITIATIVE IN CRIME CONTROL

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, a frequently exploited misconception is that crime is a racial problem. But crime is not a white problem. Neither is it a black problem. It is a human problem. As such, it deserves and demands the concerted attention of all men of good will.

It behooves us to hear and to heed all thoughtful proposals for crime control. One such set of recommendations was outlined in a speech by our colleague, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. CLAY).

His trenchant and cogent proposals require little by way of introduction. I insert at this point in the RECORD the text of the address, delivered at a meeting of the National Council of Negro Women at St. Louis, November 24, 1969.

The address follows:

FOR BLACK INITIATIVE IN CRIME CONTROL—IF LEFT TO WHITES, IT WILL BE AN INSTRUMENT OF REPRESSION

(By Representative WILLAM L. CLAY)

Far too many politicians use crime as a political issue. They talk in generalities about a "return to law and order," to domestic tranquility—about the threat of this permissive society. And though it is never spelled out, it is made quite clear that social reform has no place in the kind of social order they seek.

When claims are made about their ability to "control crime," it usually means they will maintain the status quo—economically, socially, and politically. Too often, what is meant is that they will stifle dissent and rid this land of the notions of justice for all. Implied in these demands for law and order is police repression of attempts by blacks and other minorities to effectuate social change.

Black people have no quarrel with the need for protecting the population from criminals. It is the black population which suffers most from street crimes. We are the ones who are victimized. Our brothers and sisters and children are the ones being shot down on the streets—our homes are being burglarized—our wives and sisters raped—our businesses robbed and bombed.

Black people must find a way to show our concern for crime, our own fear of criminals, but in a way that is not interpreted as a step toward condoning a police state.

At the root of crime are the desperate conditions of the ghetto; the inadequate, overcrowded, ill-equipped schools; the unbearable, dilapidated overcrowded housing; the unemployment; the broken families—all the vicious forces that push the poor urban black outside of society.

But there are glaring misconceptions about crime in black communities. Too many believe that drug addiction and poverty are the causes of most of the crime. Drug addicts usually commit passive crimes such as shoplifting and prostitution. The poor who are desperately trying to make ends meet commit very few crimes. But the crimes against persons—muggings, robberies, bombings are usually committed by hardened criminals who should be dealt with as such. They have created a reign of terror and a climate of fear which has changed our lives.

We no longer take strolls at night, shop at night, and we are afraid to use the city parks. We are victims of fear, we are victims of crime. And, by and large we have not been the ones to raise our voices in protest. The people screaming law and order are the suburbanites detached from the realities of the crime problem by superhighways. I am amazed by the notions held by many white people that the ghettos are safe if your skin is black.

The choice for black leaders seems clear. We must speak out to change the system so that the law respects and protects us as it is meant. When our elected officials, our police commissioners, our circuit attorneys, our judges and our juries treat crime by black people against black people as seriously as they treat crime which affects the white middle-income communities then we will be on the road to a solution.

In my view, the following recommendations must be made a part of any reasonable and comprehensive solution to crime:

First, and of prime importance, the conditions of the inner city, the slums which breed crime, must be eliminated. Until this nation gives priority to these tragic domestic ills, the probability for curbing the wave of crime will be remote.

Second, the law must be applied equally—across the board—to black and white. Equal rights and equal protection under the law must be assured and crime, wherever it occurs and whomever it strikes, must be considered a matter for law enforcement and prosecution.

Third, the quality of law enforcement agencies and personnel must be uplifted. The attitudes of law enforcement personnel must be free of prejudice. Citizens must play an important role in crime detection, but will do so only if they have no reason to mistrust the motives of the police.

Fourth, the total thrust of penal institutions must be revised. The job is to rehabilitate—not isolate—criminals. The quality of prison personnel, the conditions of prisons and the methods of prisons must be drastically improved.

Fifth, our court system must be expanded, and a more equitable system for the appointment of judges must be established.

Finally, crime, its prevention and control, is a community problem. All forces and resources of individual communities must be brought to bear on crime. Community efforts must be aimed at community institutions so they can be made responsive to community problems. Poverty and deprivation must be driven out with the realization that the conditions for breeding crimes are being eradicated.

For too long, we have allowed those political opportunists in all parties to obscure this issue with hysteria and prejudice. Make no mistake, if we fail to advance concrete actions on this matter, we shall continue to see the issue dishonestly exploited by every backward element on the political scene.

"CHICANO" VOTING POWER

HON. JOHN V. TUNNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. Speaker, we must not slacken speed in the task of securing equal opportunities for all Americans. The Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 provide a strong basis for action, but constant work is required to make existing legislation effective and to broaden available protection.

Something like 800,000 Negroes have registered to vote in the States of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina since the Voting Rights Act of 1965 eliminated literacy tests in those States as a condition for registration. Fairminded people rejoice that black Americans can make their presence felt increasingly in politics on the local, State, and Federal levels.

But the Voting Rights Act overlooks another minority group—Mexican Americans—great numbers of whom are disenfranchised by literacy requirements for voting. It is fair estimate that something like 150,000 Mexican Americans are prevented from voting in California alone because of the English-language literacy requirement for registration.

The fact that the Voting Rights Act overlook disenfranchised Mexican Americans exemplifies the situation of this group of citizens.

Not long ago the head of a Mexican American social agency said:

The problems of our Mexican Americans are unique and plead for a clearer understanding by government agencies.

We can get an idea of how unique are the problems of Mexican Americans and of how difficult it must be for Government to understand these problems clearly if we should run through the list of basic policy aims determined at a recent nationwide conference of Federal officials and 1,500 Mexican Americans. The conference projected the following basic aims:

The cultural differences and background of the Mexican American community must be acknowledged and understood;

Bilingual education in all phases of instruction should be developed;

Federal agencies must develop and practice an "outreach" philosophy in bringing services to the Mexican American community;

Federal employment opportunities must be opened further to the Mexican American community;

The community must be involved in all aspects of program planning whether it is in school activities or model cities programs;

Problem solving must be undertaken through the cooperation of Government, private industry, and Mexican American civic and service organizations.

Government has tended to recognize inadequately the unique problems of Mexican-Americans because Mexican-Americans are grievously underrepresented in Congress, in State legislatures, and in administrative agencies. They are grievously underrepresented despite the fact that 85 percent of Mexican-Americans are native-born U.S. citizens. And they are grievously underrepresented because, for one reason, so many are disenfranchised by literacy requirements for voting.

One Mexican-American said:

You have a lot of problems and they always go back to a problem being solved for the Mexican by another group, by Anglos, by another minority. That is the main problem I think we have.

Mexican-American citizens ought, in justice to be adequately represented in Congress and in State legislatures. They urgently require spokesmen of their own who understand their problems and aims.

Among Mexican-Americans there is increasing determination to unite in order to bring about changes through political action. Mexican-Americans are concerned to exercise their potential voting power.

A recent report published by the Civil Rights Commission stated:

The most pervasive force among Mexican Americans today is a growing sense of identity and a quest for unity to achieve equality for opportunity in every phase of life. In cities and towns throughout the Southwest, Mexican Americans are coming together in issue-oriented and action-committed organizations. The effects of these efforts for unity have not been lost on Federal agencies and private organizations.

* * * * *

The level of organization, of awareness, and of identity is constantly rising. The impact of improved communications through an increase in the chicano press, a struggling network of barrio newspapers and magazines, is a significant addition to the effort to develop philosophy and ideology among chicano groups. In fact, every aspect necessary to the development and sustaining of a movement is being activated and, most importantly, obtaining financial stability.

It is urgent, Mr. Speaker, that we make possible the political expression of this movement by enfranchisement of chicanos, who are literate in Spanish but who cannot now vote.

Today, I am introducing legislation to amend the Voting Rights Act to correct a long-standing inequity which has served to disenfranchise thousands of American citizens—primarily Spanish-speaking Americans.

My bill would amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965 to broaden the prohibition against the use of certain English language literacy requirements as a prerequisite to the right to vote.

Briefly stated, the amendment seeks to end the long-standing discrimination against certain groups of persons in California and other States who are literate in a foreign language such as Spanish.

It is estimated that in California alone the amendment would enfranchise over 150,000 people. These people are literate in Spanish rather than English. They have access to Spanish-language information and most are very much aware of political issues.

In America there can be no such thing as second-class citizenship. I promise that I will fight to assure that literate, Spanish-speaking Californians are made first-class citizens by giving them the right to vote just the same as other Californians. I urge all Californians to support my amendment to the Voting Rights Act of 1969 and help me bring an end to second-class citizenship in our State.

BARBADOAN INDEPENDENCE DAY THIRD ANNIVERSARY

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, today we pause to honor the third anniversary of the independence of the beautiful island of Barbados: a gentle land of golden sandy beaches and rolling green hills, set in the sparkling blue Caribbean.

Settled by British colonists in 1627, the island holds fast a tradition of 300 years of parliamentary democracy, marked by continuing peace and political stability. After centuries of democratic and evolutionary progress toward self-government, this island people achieved internal autonomy from Britain in 1961, and declared total constitutional independence on November 30, 1966.

Upon attaining its sovereignty, the Barbados Government, under the able leadership of Prime Minister Errol W. Barrow, declared its commitment to working through international organizations toward the goals of world peace and rapid economic growth for all underdeveloped countries. To implement its ideals, this energetic little nation has taken an active role in the United Nations and the Organization of American States, as well as actively participating in British Commonwealth activities, and the West Indies Association of States.

Its major impetus has been directed toward fomentation of economic development both internally and within the Caribbean region as a whole. Since independence, Barbados has sought to diversify its own economy through encouraging manufacturing and light industry. At the same time, the island has taken the lead in forging a regional economic partnership with its Caribbean neighbors. Barbados is wholly committed to the concept of strength and human progress through economic unity, and as such has had a decisive role in the developing and strengthening of the Caribbean Free Trade Association and the Caribbean Regional Development Agency.

Our two peoples share a deep sense of friendship, united by traditions of democracy, justice and belief in the dignity of mankind. Today we salute the 250,000 citizens of Barbados, and fondly dedicate to them these words, spoken by the late President John F. Kennedy:

All the world owes much to the little "five feet high" nations. The greatest art of the world was the work of little nations. The most enduring literature of the world came from little nations. The heroic deeds that thrill humanity through generations were the deeds of the little nations, fighting for their freedom.

A NEW SOFTWOOD LUMBER STANDARD

HON. JOHN DELLENBACK

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Speaker, on December 1 the Secretary of Commerce announced that a revised softwood lumber standard sponsored by the American Lumber Standards Committee would be published in the Federal Register on December 5.

This important announcement culminates a 9-year struggle to have the present softwood lumber standard updated under the voluntary product standard program established by the Department of Commerce.

The current standard was published approximately 16 years ago and has long been inadequate, principally because it failed to relate size to moisture content. This made questionable the performance of various lumber items being sold in the marketplace.

I commend the Secretary of Commerce for taking this crucial step. I also commend those members of the American Lumber Standards Committee who persevered during the 9 years of effort to modernize a standard affecting all users of softwood lumber.

Because this is a landmark decision for the producers, users, and consumers of softwood lumber, I am today inserting into the RECORD a copy of the Secretary's announcement which briefly outlines the basis for his decision to publish a modern softwood lumber standard:

SECRETARY STANS ANNOUNCES NEW LUMBER STANDARD

Secretary of Commerce Maurice H. Stans today described "as an important step for the consumer of lumber" a revised softwood lumber standard which will soon go into effect as a result of Department of Commerce procedures for developing voluntary product standards.

"The new standard we are about to publish will replace the current standard, published 16 years ago, which has long been considered inadequate for consumers," the Secretary said. "The old standard failed to relate size to moisture content, so that the lumber user could never be sure of the performance of the product he was purchasing."

Two previous attempts to correct the acknowledged deficiencies of the old standard failed for want of agreement within the industry. The present revision stems from a recommendation supported by 21 of the 22 voting members of the American Lumber Standards Committee and approved by 87 percent of producers, distributors and users-consumers of lumber.

The Secretary added: "The public interest required this truly national standard. Such a standard enhances the consumer's security in selecting the type of lumber to satisfy his needs."

The Secretary pointed out that the new standard does permit slight reductions in several sizes of lumber. However, it avoids the present situation where seasoned and unseasoned lumber start off with the same dimensions but wind up having different dimensions because of different shrinkage rates. The new standard takes account of the fact that lumber shrinks as it dries by requiring green lumber to be finished to a size sufficiently larger than dry lumber so that both will have the same dimensions after seasoning. The Secretary expressed the hope that the reduced sizes being permitted under the standard would increase the supply of lumber to meet consumer and other national needs.

"I am also hopeful that we will have widespread acceptance of an optional provision in the new standard which authorizes the machine grading of lumber," the secretary said. Machine grading will enable consumers to know the precise characteristics of each piece of lumber being purchased.

Still to be worked out, the Secretary noted, is the continued use of nominal designations, such as 2x4, rather than actual lumber sizes. "I am concerned about this practice which has come about through common usage and I am pleased that the American Lumber Standards Committee, which has done a fine job in the revisions announced today, has agreed to focus its attention on the nomenclature problem."

The Committee has plans for a broad educational campaign designed to acquaint all consumers, including the do-it-yourself occasional purchaser, of the actual dimensions of "standard" lumber.

Secretary Stans offered the full cooperation of the Commerce Department to the Federal Trade Commission in the development of appropriate trade regulations which might be necessary to protect consumers from the misgrading of lumber.

About five months ago the National Bureau of Standards, responsible for implementing the Department's Voluntary Product Standards program, requested the Bureau of the Census to conduct a statistical survey to determine the acceptability of the revision.

The Census Bureau report indicates that the revision is acceptable to 87 percent of the producers, distributors, and users-consumers of softwood lumber. Under the Department's procedures, an average acceptance of not less than 75 percent is required before a standard may be published.

The new softwood lumber standard will be identified as Voluntary Product Standard 20–70, "American Softwood Lumber Standard". It will become fully effective on March 1, 1970. No lumber will be graded under the existing Standard (SPR 16–53) after that date.

MRS. WILLIAM N. PATMAN—TEXAS' NEW NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEEWOMAN

HON. J. J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, soon Washington will become acquainted with a charming and energetic woman whom I have had the pleasure of knowing for quite some time. Mrs. William Patman, as I advised you earlier, has been appointed the new national committeewoman from the Texas State Democratic Executive Committee.

She is exceptionally well qualified for the job and will breathe a new exhuberance into this position. In the November issue of Texas Today, Carrin Patman's lifetime interest in politics and public service is described in detail.

Carrin Patman has a living tradition of public service on both sides of her family. Her husband is State Senator William N. Patman and her father-in-law is the distinguished dean of the Texas congressional delegation, the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN—and she is the daughter of former State Senator Fred Mauritz.

With this backdrop, I insert a reprint of the article:

NEW NATIONAL COMMITTEEWOMAN

Mrs. William N. (Carrin) Patman, the SDEC's choice to serve on the National Democratic Committee as Texas' committeewoman, has a unique political heritage.

She is the daughter of a State Senator, the wife of a State Senator, the daughter-in-law of Texas' ranking member of the U.S. Congress, a former member of the State Democratic Executive Committee—and a lifelong campaigner.

Mrs. Patman was born March 1, 1932, and grew up in Ganado and Austin. Her parents were Mr. and Mrs. Fred Mauritz of Ganado, both of whom are now deceased. He was a farmer, rancher and businessman who served in the Texas House of Representatives from 1935 to 1939 and then in the Texas Senate from 1941 until his death in 1947.

Her husband is an attorney who has represented the 18th Senatorial District in the Senate since 1961. They live in Ganado and are the parents of a daughter, Carrin Foreman, who is 13.

After being an honor graduate of Austin High School in 1949, Mrs. Patman won honors at the University of Texas in 1953 with a BA degree in Philosophy and English.

She has had an avid interest in politics all her life, springing—no doubt—from the times she campaigned door-to-door for her father when she was a little girl.

She was, of course, extremely active in her husband's two hotly contested races for the State Senate. She enthusiastically tackled a wide variety of political jobs from making speeches to writing ads to pounding the pavement in behalf of her husband's candidacy.

"I enjoy it all," she says, "but I think the political pastime I find most rewarding is visiting personally with the voters."

During her husband's first two sessions in the Senate, she wrote a weekly newspaper column for the district called "Austin Diary," which described life-behind-the-scenes at the Capitol. She now is the incoming president of the Senate Ladies Club.

Active in every Democratic presidential campaign since 1960, Mrs. Patman worked almost full-time in State Headquarters as a volunteer during the 1969 Humphrey-Muskie campaign.

She was especially active in helping and encouraging Young Democratic groups and has organized corps of teenagers to work in several presidential campaigns.

Despite her dedication to the Democratic Party, she has found time to become involved in a wide variety of church and civic activities.

Her proudest civic accomplishment in recent years was a two-year campaign which she started and led, resulting in a national award-winning elementary school library for the public schools of Ganado.

For this achievement, Mrs. Patman was made an honorary member of the area chapter of Delta Kappe Gamma, international honor society for outstanding women educators.

She has served as president of the Jackson County Hospital Auxiliary and of the Ganado Federated Women's Club.

She also has served on the boards of the Texana Scholarship Foundation, the Jackson County United Fund, the boards of stewards and trustees of the First Methodist Church of Ganado and the executive committee of the Ganado PTA.

Her hobbies are water skiing, piano and folk guitar and horseback riding.

In accepting her latest honor, Mrs. Patman said:

"I am certainly thrilled and grateful to have this wonderful opportunity. I think this is an especially exciting time to be a Democrat in Texas. The Party obviously faces new challenges with great opportunities for growth and creative change.

"And the Democratic Party has always been at its best in rising to challenge. It will be great to have a seat on the 50-yard line as it happens.

"I also appreciate, particularly, the chance to serve in this capacity during Governor Smith's administration. I don't think Texas has ever had a governor who felt more respect for the power and authority of the 'grassroots' or made himself more accessible to people at that level.

"This coincides exactly with my own philosophy of politics and government. I am and, I guess, always will be at heart a precinct worker.

"That's where democratic government begins and ends. And, to me, it's where you find the strength and glory of the Democratic Party.

"As Texas' Democratic National Committeewoman, my main hope and concern will be to try to help bring the thinking of the 'grass-roots' into the national councils of the Party—and vice versa."

"Well, how about a definite plan—a formula—to aid our Democratic nominees in their races against Republican opponents next Fall.

"And how about the possibility of building our own state headquarters here in Austin to serve the Democratic Party of Texas?

"Impossible dreams? No.

"Ambitious goals? Yes.

"And the way to take care of tomorrow—is to work hard today.

"This committee will be composed of all the subcommittee chairmen now serving on our State Committee.

"They will be aided by the advice and counsel of outside experts: elected public officials, Democratic county chairmen from all across Texas, authorities, in many different fields . . . specialists in many techniques.

"Now let me emphasize this:

"This group will have no other function than to advise our State Committee and to acquaint our committee chairmen with new possibilities which will give stronger direction and continued strength to our Party.

"Now, I know it is easier to criticize than to construct. It's easier to tear down than to build up. Easier to argue why something shouldn't be done than to figure a way how it can be done.

"You members of this committee were elected by your Democratic neighbors because they had confidence in your ability to do a good job for Texas. They have faith in your capacity to succeed.

"We are all different. We come from different parts of Texas. We represent different points of view. But we are united in the common goal of giving new strength to the Democratic Party of Texas, new vision to our future, new vitality to our leadership, new confidence of success.

"In January, when we last met, I said this to you: Coming together is a beginning, staying together is progress, working together is success."

"And the success of the Democratic Party of Texas truly is in your hands.

"And I want you all to know, that I think our future is in very good hands."

MARIHUANA AND THE LAW

HON. EDWARD I. KOCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, recently the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence made a number of suggestions with respect to eradicating the violence which besets our society by confronting the sources of alienation and the causes which manifest themselves in acts of violence, especially as this concerns the young people of this country.

Among the proposals offered by Dr. Milton Eisenhower and the Commission are two which are especially important to this Congress. They deal with marihuana. The first recommendation is that the National Institutes of Health, working with selected universities, greatly expand research on the physical and psychological effects of marihuana use. The second recommendation is that Federal and State laws make use and incidental possession of marihuana no more than a misdemeanor until more definitive information about marihuana is at hand and the Congress and State legislatures have had an opportunity to revise their laws in light of this information.

Both recommendations are similar to my proposal, H.R. 10019, which establishes a President's Commission on Marihuana. However, my proposal goes further by including a Presidential Commission examination of the broad social consequences of marihuana use.

Possession of marihuana is a felony, and present penalties for a first offense involving possession under Federal law range from a minimum of 2 years to a maximum of 10 years in prison. The sentence corresponds with a conviction for manslaughter. In many States a felony conviction, as the Commission points out, results in the loss of voting rights, jury service, and the right to enter various professional occupations, whereas a misdemeanor does not. The Commission's statement does not recommend a similar reduction in the penalty for those who traffic in marihuana for profit until further study has been made into the possible dangers of the drug, and I concur.

I can cite the growth percentagewise of the use of marihuana to substantiate a call for the investigation of physiological and psychological effects of marihuana, as well as the broader social consequences stemming from its use. Present harsh penalties seem to have had little effect thus far in abating marihuana use, while at the same time, imprisonment is doing great damage to our young people who in many cases have merely experimented with this drug. As the Commission's report so amply states:

> The present harsh penalties for possession and use of marihuana are a classic example of what legal scholars call "overcriminalization"—treating as a serious crime private personal conduct that a substantial segment of the community does not regard as a major offense.

And in the context of the Eisenhower report on violence such a condition contributes to a general disrespect for the law, while the questions with respect to the possible dangers and hazards of marihuana use remain unanswered.

With the hope that it will interest my colleagues and encourage them to support H.R. 10019 now cosponsored by 77 Members of this House, I am submitting the report by Dr. Eisenhower's Commission on the subject of marihuana:

COMMISSION STATEMENT CHALLLENGING OUR YOUTH

(Submitted by Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, Chairman, National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence)

Our main concern in this statement is to stress the importance of challenging the young people of the nation to become full partners in the enterprise of building a better society. But we must also add a word on one increasingly acute aspect of the present "generation gap"—the problem of drugs, particularly marijuana.

The development of drug subcultures among many of today's youth is particularly troubling to those who are older. Increased education about the physical and psychological hazards of the use of addictive drugs, LSD, the amphetamines and other dangerous substances is essential if the health of young people and their children is to be properly safeguarded. In addition, the older generation must answer, in good faith and on the basis of better knowledge, the question raised by many young people as to whether present proscriptions on marijuana use go too far.

The startling recent increase in marijuana use by many young people has intensified the conflict between generations and posed enormous problems in the enforcement of drug laws. Possession and/or use of marijuana is treated severely by the law. In most states such possession or use is a felony, whereas the use or possession of the more dangerous LSD is only a misdemeanor.[1] This lack of elementary logic and justice has become a principal source of frustration and alienation contributing markedly to youth's often bitter dissatisfaction with today's society. We believe that action must be taken to put the whole situation into rational perspective.

Scientific knowledge about marijuana remains sparse, but some of its pharmacological properties have been established: marijuana is not a narcotic or an opiate and is not addicting.[2] There is as yet no evidence as to the relationship it bears to the use of harder drugs.[3]

We recommend that the National Institutes of Health, working with selected universities, greatly expand research on the physical and psychological effects of marijuana use.[4]

The Congress should enact laws and appropriate adequate funds for this purpose. Much remains to be learned about the drug's psychological effects, particularly with respect to the expectation and personality types of users and the total emotional mood of the environment and the persons in it. Many experienced users have had at least one "bad trip" and some cases have been reported of extremely traumatic reactions to marijuana. It may be that marijuana use can be damaging to individuals with a history of mental instability or other personality disorders. Similarly, little is known about its possible psychological effects, including psychological dependency, on adolescents who are in the process of learning to cope with the demands of adult life. And we most assuredly need to know if marijuana users have a predisposition to use harder drugs.

Despite all existing evidence to the contrary, state and federal laws alike treat marijuana as a narcotic, and penalties for its sale and use in some states are extreme. In one state, the penalty is two years to life imprisonment for a first offense of possession. In at least two others, the penalty for an adult convicted of selling marijuana to a minor is death. According to the latest available Justice Department figures, the average length of sentence imposed for violation of state laws was 47.7 months. In 1967 the fereral government made 706 arrests for marijuana offenses, as compared to the State of California alone which made 37,513 arrests, 10,907 of them juveniles under eighteen.

Erroneously classifying marijuana as a narcotic, this patchwork of federal and state laws, inconsistent with each other and often unenforceable on their merits, has led to an essentially irrational situation. Respect for the law can hardly be inculcated under these circumstances. Since many of our youths believe marijuana to be relatively harmless and, yet, are faced with legal sanctions, they are led into a practice of law evasion which contributes to general disrespect for the law. Furthermore, enforcement of laws generally deemed harsh and unjust seen nonetheless to encourage police practices—e.g., raids without probable cause, entrapment—which infringe on personal liberties and safeguards. The situation is reminiscent of the problems encountered in enforcement of Prohibition during the 1920's. The present harsh penalties for possession and use of marijuana are a classic example of what legal scholars call "overcriminalization"—treating as a serious crime private personal conduct that a substantial segment of the community does not regard as a major offense; prosecutors, judges and juries tend to moderate the severity of the statutory sanctions, and the resulting hypocrisy of all concerned diminishes respect for the law.

In view of the urgency of the marijuana problem, we believe that legislative reform of the existing marijuana penalty structure should not wait several years until further rsearch is completed.

We recommend that federal and state laws make use and incidental possession of marijuana no more than a misdemeanor until more definitive information about marijuana is at hand and the Congress and State Legislatures have had an opportunity to revise the permanent laws in light of this information. (Pending further study, we do not recommend a similar reduction in the penalty for those who traffic in marijuana for profit.)

Instead of the existing inequitable criminal penalties (including imprisonment) for mere possession and use of the drug, interim legislation might well provide only for civil penalties such as the confiscation of the drug and fines. If the interim legislation does provide for prison sentences, it should at least grant wide discretion to the trial judge to suspend sentence or release on probation.

We were heartened by the recommendation recently submitted to the Congress by

[1] A felony is a serious crime usually punishable by imprisonment for an extended period (under federal law for a year or more); a misdemeanor is a lesser offense punishable by fine or imprisonment of less than a year. In many states, a felony conviction results in a loss of voting rights, jury service, and the right to enter various professional occupations; a misdemeaner conviction does not.

[2] Addiction is a physiological and psychological dependence on a drug, with definite symptoms occurring when the drug is withdrawn.

[3] In testimony on October 14, 1969 before the House of Representatives Select Committee on Crime, Dr. Roger O. Egeberg, Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for Health and Scientific Affairs, stated that "there is no scientific evidence to demonstrate that the use of marijuana in itself predisposes an individual to progress to 'hard' drugs."

[4] A similar provision is contained in H.R. 10019 by Rep. Edward Koch, N.Y.

several leading officials of the Executive Branch of the government—recommendations which seek immediate change in the provisions of federal law affecting drug use. Among other things, these officials indicated that use and incidental possession of marijuana should be declared to be no more than a misdemeanor.

The above recommendations should not, of course, be taken as suggesting either that we approve the use of marijuana, or that we favor any relaxation of society's efforts to discourage the use of the clearly dangerous drugs.

Expert testimony offered to this Commission indicates that the so-called hard drugs, such as heroin, do not in themselves make users prone to commit other crimes, but that the daily use of such drugs involves exorbitant costs; hence users often undertake lives of burglary and armed robbery in order to obtain funds for the continued purchase of drugs. Further, drug importation and distribution, like certain forms of gambling, constitute part of the life-blood of organized crime—an empire of its own, ruthless, rich, pervasive, corrupting, and skillful at avoiding the reaches of the law.

We cannot usefully add to all that has been written by other Commissions, the Department of Justice, and many State authorities about the need for stopping the importation of the hard drugs, and for vigorously prosecuting the traffickers in these drugs. Nor can we add to the urgent recommendations that have been made by others to eliminate from our society the empires of organized crime.

But we do most emphatically declare that classifying marijuana users with the users of the hard drugs is scientifically wrong, a wrong recognized by the young, a wrong that makes them contemptuous of the drug laws and to some extent of all law. They wonder why the federal and State Governments do not insist upon more widespread research to establish facts and to change laws in harmony with the facts as developed.

THE RETURN OF OKINAWA TO THE JAPANESE

HON. STROM THURMOND

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the President's recent negotiations on Okinawa with Premier Sato of Japan have been hailed as an act of statesmanship resulting in a net gain for American security in the Far East. The reversion of Okinawa to the Japanese has been presented as a logical action with both tactical and strategic benefits to the United States.

While there is no doubt that there are benefits, particularly short-term benefits, to the Okinawa agreement, at the same time we must recognize that the President has taken a calculated risk. Out of a myriad of disagreeable choices, the President has opted for the course of action which will maximize the benefits. Nevertheless, we must not delude ourselves. The Okinawa agreement is based upon some shaky premises, and we must be prepared to revise our policy at the first sign of a disintegrating situation.

The first point we must remember is that the Okinawa issue in Japan is not based upon reason, or historical principles, but upon emotion and manipulated propaganda. To say this is not to disparage the Japanese people; we have seen a great deal of the same kind of activity applied to other issues right here at home. It is simply part of the modern phenomenon of mass manipulation. Even though the Okinawa agreement will temporarily defuse the emotionalism, we must realize that the same techniques can generate hysteria again when the time comes, for example, to claim some of our mutual security rights under this agreement.

The second point is that we have no guarantee that the Sato government will be reelected in 1970. The American press has widely predicted that this agreement will help Sato and his colleagues to defeat the leftwing socialist and Communist parties. The agreement may do so. On the other hand, politics is an unpredictable business. We may very well find ourselves wtihout Sato and without Okinawa, too.

Mr. President, wise voices in the press have been warning us to keep the Okinawa question open. Among them is the distinguished editorial page of the State, the morning newspaper in Columbia, S.C. The State has a fine reputation for reasoned and moderate editorials. On the Okinawa question, The State argues that reversion prompts both hope and fear. The State says:

> The feeling persists that President Nixon may have undercut the United States' military posture in the Far East by agreeing to return Okinawa to Japanese sovereignty in 1972.

Although The State is pleased with the support the agreement gives to the Sato government, the editorial is worried about the possibility of growing Communist influence in Japan. The State says:

> Japanese resistance to Communism is nothing like as strong or effective as that of South Korea or Nationalist China, the two real bastions of the Free World against Communist aggression in that part of the world. Japan's overwhelming concern with economic development makes her a logical and desirable target for Communist agitation, whether of the Russian or Chinese persuasion. Unless and until the Japanese develop an internal resolve and capacity to cope with Communism—militarily and ideologically—the Free World has cause of unease.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "The Return of Okinawa Prompts Hope and Fear," published in The State of November 28, 1969, be printed in the Extensions of Remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RETURN OF OKINAWA PROMPTS HOPE AND FEAR

The feeling persists that President Nixon may have undercut the United States' military posture in the Far East by agreeing to return Okinawa to Japanese sovereignty in 1972, but the issue is too complex for a hasty judgment based on incomplete information.

For one thing, it is apparent that the President's action greatly strengthens the position of Prime Minister Sato within his own government and assures the United States of a friendly regime. Mr. Sato's political neck was on the block as he negotiated with President Nixon, and there are strong indications that his government may have fallen in the absence of favorable and affirmative action leading toward the reversion of Okinawa.

For another, the U.S. agreement to return Okinawa to Japan in 1972 and to remove nuclear weapons from the island imposes a new and substantial responsibility upon the Japanese to help provide for their own defense. Ever since the end of World War II, the Japanese have prospered in peace under the protective military shield maintained by the United States.

During that period, and partly because of the absence of any appreciable allocation of national funds toward national defense, Japan has grown into the foremost industrial country of Asia and one of the three largest in the world. One ironic by-product of this rapid and remarkable growth is the fact that Japanese exports to the United States now threaten the stability of a number of American industries, notably textiles.

Another irony lies in the fact that the Japanese leftists, who long have clamored for a return of Okinawa from U.S. control, are making no such fuss over Russia's continued possession of four major islands of the Kurile chain. Russia, by the way, has steadfastly refused to even discuss the possibility of a reversion of those holdings to Japan.

What worries us is the possibility that Communist influence in Japan, already strong, will continue to grow at the expense of U.S. interests in that country and in all of Asia. Japanese resistance to Communism is nothing like as strong or effective as that of South Korea or Nationalist China, the two real bastions of the Free World against Communist aggression in that part of the world.

Japan's overweening concern with economic development makes her a logical and desirable target for Communist agitation, whether of the Russian or Chinese persuasion. Unless and until the Japanese develop an internal resolve and capacity to cope with Communism—militarily and ideologically—the Free World has cause for unease.

THINGS OF GOOD REPORT

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, as the President's first year in office nears an end, it is well to look back on his accomplishments.

And there have been many.

Columnist Roscoe Drummond takes a look at the situation in his column of November 29 in the Christian Science Monitor which I call to the attention of my colleagues, as follows:

THINGS OF GOOD REPORT

(By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—Let's come right out and say it: Some important things are going very well—quite a few things:

1. With great tact and boldness the United States had dissolved the festering crisis of Okinawa which was at the point of undermining our vital partnership with Japan. The agreement showed great wisdom and maturity in high places in both countries.

2. In the contest for public opinion with the extremist, get-out-now doves—in Congress and in the country—the President is continuing to win ascendant national support for his steady and staged reduction of the American role in Vietnam.

NEGOTIATING

3. The United States-Soviet nuclear arms control talks have begun. That's pretty sensational in itself. They are going forward in a good atmosphere. That's good. Both sides are negotiating quietly and seriously, seeking progress not propaganda. That's even better.

4. Moscow and Washington already have agreed on a draft treaty to ban nuclear weapons from the seabed. And the nuclear nonproliferation treaty comes nearer to reality with the United States and the Soviet Union having just signed it.

5. Vice-President Agnew is stirring a valuable self-examination on the part of the TV network news reporters and commentators. It should have a beneficial effect because the networks already do too good a job to not want to do better.

Some commentators seem to think that if anything is going right, they must find something that's going wrong to prove how "realistic" they are.

DURABLE DECISIONS

All of these five events are in the right direction and, together with the Apollo 12's round trip to the moon, they constitute the biggest package of good news in a single week in a very long time.

Let's reverse the belief that nearly everything has to go wrong. It doesn't.

The Nixon-Sato talks didn't go wrong. Rarely, if ever, has territorial status achieved in war been peacefully altered. That is what Nixon did in returning sovereignty over Okinawa to Japan and in doing so he looked beyond next year in order to enable the Japanese to maintain a free and voluntary allegiance with the United States to keep the peace in the western Pacific. Now Japan is free to choose, and only freely accepted decisions are durable. Now Japan offers to help provide mutual peace-keeping machinery and affirms it is ready "to take a leading role" in providing economic aid to "the nation-building efforts of the Asian countries."

If the Nixon-Sato negotiations had not been wisely handled, none of this would be possible. They were wisely handled.

Nixon's exposition to the nation of his plan for steady and staged withdrawal of United States combat ground troops isn't going wrong. It is going very well. It is true that some of the bitter-end Senate critics, like Fulbright, Gore, Church, McGovern, McCarthy, are planning further harassment of the President, but public opinion is continuing to isolate them. In addition to decisive majority support in House and Senate for Nixon's way of ending the war, in addition to the polls which showed overwhelming public endorsement of his Nov. 3 Vietnam speech, comes the latest Gallup survey which finds 68 percent of the American people approving his handling of the presidency with only 19 percent disapproving. This poll was taken during and after the Nov. 15 peace demonstrations and marks a 12 percentage point rise since Oct. 17.

BALANCED APPRAISAL

As to Spiro Agnew and TV news, it is true that some of the criticisms and replies simply pass each other in the headlines without touching. But Agnew has touched the networks on the quick by stirring public alertness to one-sidedness. They often provide a very lopsided picture of America, making government look most of the time as bad as it is some of the time. What is needed is not "garlands of flowers" from the TV commentators but balanced appraisal. These TV men are very able and intelligent. They know they can do better.

I KNEW E. M. MARTIN

HON. JAMES H. (JIMMY) QUILLEN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 3, 1969

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to submit the following eloquent remarks of Lt. George W. Lee, a friend of mine and one of the South's most widely known Negro gentlemen.

As a follower of Lieutenant Lee's colorful career and being fully aware of his background as a soldier, author, lecturer, civic leader, and successful businessman, I am pleased to share his remarks with the readers of the RECORD.

Lieutenant Lee always has warm, kind words for his friends and his remarks in the eulogy of his colleague, Mr. E. M. Martin, who was vice president and secretary of the Atlanta Life Insurance Co., are no exception. As a vice president and member of the board of directors of the Atlanta Life Insurance Co., Lieutenant Lee became closely associated with Mr. Martin, both as a friend and business associate, and therefore his remarks are only proper. Lieutenant Lee's magnificent oratorical ability is most certainly exemplified in this eulogy. I submit the following remarks:

I KNEW E. M. MARTIN

(By George W. Lee)

The passing of Mr. E. M. Martin, First Vice President and Secretary of the Atlanta Life Insurance Company is more than death. It is robbery by time of its noblest aspect. "In the hour of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing." He needs no praise, but he is a study in the achievement of character. During the time God gave him to live he has been like an oak, planted by the rivers of water, unmoved by the ceremonies of human judgment. He has carried with wisdom the understanding of unspeakable divinity and built his fortunes in the hearts of men. He has extended a hand as ancient as the sun and comforted an oppressed people in a land of liberty. He organized his ideas of the life insurance business and directed them with the sagaciousness of an outstanding success. He has supplied a name to a nation of great names and has written his where few others have ever been traced. We thank the Eternal God that Mr. Martin came along at the right time to serve us and along with us the nation, at a time when black men are struggling for a kindly but vigorous way of life in which the problems of second-class citizenship might be neutralized in the brilliant sunshine of a democratic tomorrow. He takes his special place with those illustrious few in the business of life insurance who have given an enduring example of leadership in effecting significant change in making equal opportunity available to all so that an inspiring democracy will constitute the divine fire that will illuminate our presently fearful future. I know that his wife and family are conforted in the knowledge that their loss is shared by all in the industry of life insurance and that his mourners are as thick as grief. Surely they may find consolation, not only in the assurance of faith, but also in the honored memory of his life, a life characterized by ideals which in every generation constitutes a noble legacy to us all.

History will record him as a giant in his day and generation for he had a blend of talent and personality that made him unique and distinctive in the eyes of his fellowman. He had the depth of understanding that comes only to those who have labored long and hard in the vineyards of life insurance. He had the rare ability to pinpoint the meaningful, and in effect, to separate the chaff from the wheat. Although he was plagued by a long illness that dragged on through the years he had a heart stout enough to cast off the frustration of pain and perform nobly and effectively the duties of his office. As a person he had compassion and understanding, but he could be as hard as steel towards those who had strayed from the path of rectitude. He had a deep conviction that principle was an honored objective that must never be surrendered upon the altar of opportunitism.

And now he has come to the end of his journey, weary of life and the battle is won, carrying the staff and the cross of redemption. My faith mothers the belief that somewhere beyond the purple horizons the Lord will understand and say, "Well done." Well done because he lit a million lamps for the hills of loyal and sublime devotion and kept them burning with the oil of human courage. A great soul like E. M. Martin is never forgotten.

His ideals will forever echo. Echoes will build on top of echoes like winged music through eternity. His success in the choice realm of business or in the battle to rescue black people from that strangling gulf of racism, is a shining, loving symbol that only the heart of red-blooded men can understand. Patience, determination, self discipline, work, love, and faith made his life deep and strong. Through the power of his creative imagination he played a significant role in helping to lift Atlanta Life up from the runways to oblivion to one of the nation's greatest businesses.

I think I know when Mr. Martin first caught a vision and dreamed a dream. It was when he met the late A. F. Herndon and became inspired by the founder's life and work, achieved in the never-ending shadows of suffering and agony. The spiritual essence of A. F. Herndon gave Mr. Martin the bold sweeping stroke of one increasing dynamic purpose.

The lines from Hamlet are appropriate in bringing down the curtain of his life: "Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, Sweet Prince, and flights of angels sing thee to thy rest."
